TO THE QUEENES MOST EXCEL-LENT MAIESTIE, OVR MOST REDOVTE, MOST HAPPIE, AND TRVE SOVERAIGNE LADIE ELIZABETH, BY THE grace of God Queene of England, Fraunce and Ireland, principall defender of the faith, and next vnder God, the onely, absolute, and full supreme head ouer all causes Ecclesiasticall and temporall through her Maiesties dominions :

*Geffray Fenton prayeth a perpetuall increasing of the spirite of Gods holy feare, and a continuall going on and confirmation of that godly course, wherein with so long peace and happinesse, her Maiestie hath gouerned the subiects and peoples of her Realmes

IT is not without reason nor contrary to example, that I presume to offer vp to the peculiar & graue view of your Maiesty, these my compositions and labours : for that the generall argument being historically, a doctrine wherein your Maiestie farre aboue all other Princes hath a most singular insight and iudgement, and the particular partes containing discourse of state and gouernement, in which God hath expressed in the person of your Maiestie a most rare and diuine example to all other Kings of the earth, for matter of pollicie and sound administration : All law of reason, of equitie, and of other impression whatsoe-uer, do challenge to appropriate the addresse and iustification of this worke to your Maiestie onely, in whom, for your inspired science and spirit to iudge of Monuments and euent of times, and for the felicitie of your gouernement in seasons so perillous and conspiring, all Kings, and kingdomes, and nations round about you, rise vp to reuerence in your forme of gouerning, that propertie of wisdom and vertue, which it seemes God hath restrained to your Maiestie onely, without participation to anie of them. And in that regard they hold you that sacred and fixed Starre, whose light God will not haue put out, though the deuises of men on all sides are busie to draw cloudes and darke vailles to obscure it.

THE EPISTLE

I am also encouraged to make this oblation to your Maiestie, by the example of many notable writers, both of the primitiue times and in all ages and posterities succeeding, such as for the grauitie and fidelitie of their pen and style, were cherished with the greatest Princes of those dayes, and vnder the authoritie and countenance of their names, their workes were with reputation and credit insinuated into many peoples, nations, and regiments: the same being an effect due to the vertue and pietie of great Princes, for that as it is God that giueth wisdom and science to men, so it is authoritie that chiefly sheweth it to the world, euen as the earth nourisheth the roote of a tree, but the comfortable Sunne doth much to bring forth the blossomes. So many are the testimonies and examples of this, and so familiar with your Maiestie is the doctrine of histories and information of times, that by so much lesse need I to stand vpon authorities of antiquitie, or declarations relative, by how much more is knowne to be happily laied vp in your Maiesties breast, and effectually expressed in the forme of your gouernment and reigne, all that which learning and bookes can set downe by rule and precept, your Maiestie being the onely consecrated lampe from whom all other dominions about you do draw their light, or rather that terrestriall Sunne, vpon whose influence God hath appointed to depend the motions of all the Regions and Climats of the whole common weale of Christendome: A calling and authoritie which all other Potentates do honor in you, with so much the more merite and reuerence, by how much amid so many occasions and oportunities to ambitio, they proue your equitie, pietie, and moderation of mind, to exceede all examples of former Princes and times, and farre surmount all humane expectation: for that hauing as it were a soueraigne power ouer them & theirs, you do notwithstanding dispose of things according to the law of measure and right. In regard of which diuine properties, accompanied with your Maiesties other vertues which God hath made infinite in you, and your felicitie which is the reward & effect of the same, I may with good comelineffe resemble the gracious reigne of your Maiestie touching these regions of Christendome, to the happie time and dayes of Cæsar Augustus Emperour of Rome: who, after a long and generall combustion and harrying of the whole world with bloud and warres, did so reforme and reduce the regions confining his Empire, that with the Scepter and seate of peace he much more preuailed, then euer he could haue done with the sword: by his clemencie he brought to submission his neighbour that stood out against him; and by his constancie held them assured being once reconciled: his wisdom seemed an Oracle to the Nations about him to dispose of their counsels and sway their enterprises. And touching quarrels and controuersies of state, either for his grauity and iustice, the only arbitration and resolution was referred to him, or at least for the awe that was had of him, the factions durst not burst out to further limits then he liked of. Lastly, it was an approued Monarchie of God, for that Christ the sonne of God amid such an vniuersall malice of man and mankinde, was contented to shew himselfe in flesh in the dayes of his reigne. Euen so though the singular persons be chaunged, yet the effects and blessings of this time do nothing vary vnder the happie rule of your Maiestie, whom God hath raised & established a soueraigne Empreffe ouer seuerall nations and languages, and with the frutes of a firme and continued peace, hath plentifully enriched the peoples of your Dominiõs, restored Religion and the Church of Christ to dwell anew amongst vs, made your authoritie awfull to all your neighbours and borderers: and lastly hath erected your seat vpon a high hill or ~~sanctuarie~~, and put into your hands the ballance of power and iustice, to poise and counterpoise at your wil the actions and counsels of all the Christian kingdoms of your time: wherein sure according to the course your Maiestie holdeth, much lesse that either for the present or in posterities to come, can be iustly objected anie matter of imputation against you, seeing of the contrarie, most of them that be wise and true obseruers of your dealings, do daily confesse and publiſh, that in your Maiestie hath bene orderly fulfilled all lawes and offices of a deuout Neutralitie. For that like as amid their heauie afflictions wherein successiuelly hath bene offered you no small causes to ambition, your Maiestie hath neuer stopped or cut from them the refuge of your amity and mercie: So neuertheless your compassion hath principally respected the equitie of the complaints of such as implored it, esteeming it not agreable to the law of vertue and account of your conscience, to make your profit vpon the diuisions of your neighbours, though there haue not wanted reasons and titles to induce your desire.

I forbear to make declaration to your Maiestie of the life and learning of the first Author of this booke; a matter testified with sufficient credit and reputation in the high negotiations and emploiments which he managed long time vnder great Princes, Popes, & common weales: and I am bold (contrarie to the custome of some writers) to leaue to particulate in my Epistle and part of the argument which with so great grauitie he hath digested at large in so great a volume: Onely the man for his integritie and roundnesse was such a one, as whose vertues were farre from all suspicion of partialitie, fauour, hatred, loue, reward, or any other propertie of humane affection, which might haue force to corrupt or turne from the truth the mind of a writer. And for the generall matter of his worke, it doth not onely containe the warres and diuerse accidents hapned in Italie and other parts for almost fortie yeares, but also he doth so distinctly set downe the causes, the counsels, and the fortunes of euerie principall partie introduced into those actions, that by his studie and iudgement, is traced and made easie to the reader, the way to all those sweete and plentifull frutes which with painfullnesse are sought for in Histories of this nature.

And for mine owne part, where in all my dedications heretofore, not my will which was alwayes warranted by the gracious demonstrations of your Maiestie, but my maner of life instituted vpon priuate customs and exercises, hath holden me from approaching the authoritie of this place, afore which nothing ought to be presented which hath not a full perfection of spirit and studie: yet now, taking my reason of the worthinesse of the worke, and obseruing the examples and inducements of others in like oblations, I am bold vnder feare and humilitie to prostrate these my last paines afore that diuine moderation of mind which alwaies hath holden for acceptable all things respecting learning or vertuous labours: humbly beseeching your right excellent Maiesty, that where the worke is now to appeare in the open view of the world, and stand before the vncertaine iudgements of so manie sundrie and straunge humours of men, you will vouchsafe to let it passe vnder the happie name of your Maiestie, and vnder your gracious authoritie to giue it defence & fauor against the emulation of such as either through malice or ignorance may rise vp to interpret me and my labours sinisterly. The Lord blesse your Maiestie with a long and a peaceable life, and confirme in you to the comfort of your people, that course of well tempered gouernement, by the benefite whereof they haue so long time liued vnder the felicitie of your name. At my lodging neare the Towre of London,

THE ARGUMENT.

Lodowicke Sforce uncle and tutor to Iohn Galeas Duke of Millan, fearing least Ferdinand king of Naples would make warre upon him, breaketh off from the league that had bene renewed betwene the sayd Ferdinand, Iohn Galeas, and the common weale of Florence, against the Venetians: he procureth the French King Charles the viij. to passe into Italy to conquer the Kingdome of Naples: Pope Alexander the sixt allyeth him selfe with the King of Naples: The French King, hauing ordered th'affaires of the kingdome, descendeth into Italy, where he taketh many townes: Diuerse emotions happen in the kingdome of Naples: the Pope is in great perplexitie and tranell: Pisa rebelleth against the Florentines: the French King entrencheth into Florence and Rome, and from thence passeth to Naples.

HAVING in hand to write the affaires and fortunes of Italie, I iudged it conuenient to draw into discourse, those particularities that most nearest resemble our time and memorie, yea euen since the selfe Princes of that country calling in the armies of France, gaue the first beginning to so great innouations. A matter, for the varietie, greatnesse, & nature of such things, verie notable, and well worthie of memorie: and for the heauie accidents, hatefull, bloudie and horrible: for that Italie for manie yeares was trauelled with all those sorts of calamities, with the which, principalities, countreys, and mortall men, are wont to be afflicted, aswell by the iust wrath & hand of God, as through the impietie and wickednesse of other nations. The knowledge of these things so great and diuerse, may minister many wholesome instructions, aswell to all men generally, as to euery one in particular, considering that by the trial, consent and demonstration of so many examples, all Princes, people, and patrimonies may see (as a sea driuen with diuerse winds) to what inconstancie humane things are ordeined, and how harmefull are the ill measured counsels of Princes, many times preiudiciall to themselues, but alwayes hurtfull to their people and subiects, specially when they are vainely caried away, either with their singular errorrs, or priuate couetousnesse, without hauing any impression or remembrance of the ordinarie chaunges of fortune, whereby turning to the domage and displeasure of others, the power which is giuen them for the safetie, protection, and pollicie of the whole, they make themselues, either by want of discreffion, or too much ambition, authors of innouations and new troubles.

But the better to make knowne the state and condition of Italie at that time, together with the occasions of so many afflictions happening, it is to be considered that their calamities begun with so much the more displeasure and astonishment in mens minds, by how much the vniuersall estate and multitude of things stood quiet, pleasant & happie. For, it is true and well assured, that since the Romane Empire (weakened chiefly by the chaunge of auncient manners and customes) began a thousand yeares afore to decline from that greatnesse whereunto it was raised by a wonderful vertue and fortune: the principalities of Italy had not tasted of so great and generall prosperitie, nor reioyced in a condition so happy, plawfible and well gouerned, as was that whereon it was with great suretie reapposed the yeare of grace 1490, and certaine afore and after: for that being on all sides reduced into peace and tranquillitie, the hilles and barren places tilled, & made no lesse fruitful, then the valleys and regions most fertill, and no potentacie or communaltie subiect to other Lords or rulers then their owne: It was not onely plentifully replenished with people, societie, and riches, but also greatly honored with the estates and maiestie of many Princes, goodly aspect of sundrieright stately cities, and with the seate and residencie of the throne of Religion: it flourished in men rare and excellent in administration of common weales, and infinite in good wits, science and studied in all sciences and artes of excellencie and industrie: lastly, bearing also no small praise and glorie for the service in warre, according to the use and discipline of that time, it retained iustly (by these gifts and blessings) a peculiar merit and reputation amongst all other nations. The felicitie being gotten with diuerse occasions, there were many things to entertaine and preserve, and amongst others, common voice and consent gaue no small praise and deserving to the industrie and vertue of Laurence de Medicis a citizen of Florence; in whom was expressed such an excellencie of spirit and authoritie about the other citizens of that regiment, that vpon his counsell was reapposed the gouernement of the affaires of that common weale, which was at that time more mightie for the oportunitie of his situation, for the excellent wits and inuentions of men, and for the readie meanes and mines of siluer and metals, then for the greatnesse and circuite of Lordship or dominion: And by reason he was lately ioyned by parentage with Pope Innocent the viij. whom he had brought to reappose almost an absolute faith and credit in his counsels, his name was great through all Italie, and his authoritie mightie in the deliberation of common affaires. He knew well that it would be a thing preiudiciall to the common weale of Florence, and no lesse hurtfull to him selfe, if anie of the great Potentates of that nation stretched out further their power, and therefore he employed all his deuises, meanes, and directions, that the things of Italie should be so euently ballanced, that they should not weigh more on the one side then on the other. A thing which he could not make to succeed, without the preferuation of peace, and a perpetuall care, diligence and watching ouer all accidents, yea euen to the least, basest, and most inferior.

In the same inclination to common tranquillitie, was also concurrant Ferdinand of Aragon king of Naples, a Prince for his counsels deliberate, in his actions resolute, and touching his affections verie moderate, notwithstanding often times before, he had shewed many ambitious thoughts, and farre off from all counsel to peace. Wherein he was much gouerned in that time by Alphonso Duke of Calabria, his eldest sonne, who vnwillingly suffered that John Galeas Sforce his sonne in lawe Duke of Millan, more then twentie yeares of age, but of a iudgement verie incapable and vnapt to great affaires, and retaining onely the name of Duke, should be suppressed, and as it were kept smothered by Lodowike Sforce his vncle, who, more then ten yeares afore, by the misgouernment and vnchast life of Madame Bonne, mother to the said Galeas, was seized vpon his minoritie, and by that meanes, had reduced by liue and liue into his power the strong holds, men of warre, tributes and treasures, and all other the grounds and foundations of the state of Millan, persueuing in the gouernement not as tutor and regent, but (except the onely title of Duke) with all demonstrations and actions of an absolute Prince. Ferdinand, with whom was more familiar the impression of present vilitie, then his ancient inclination, or the indignation of his sonne (how iust so euer it were) desired that nothing should be innouated in Italie, nor the present policie fall into alteration: perhaps he had regard to the experience of the yeares before, wherein (to his great daunger) he had proued the hate of his Barons and vniuersal subiects: and happily he had not forgotten (by the memorie of things past) what affection a great part of his people bore to the name of the house of Fraunce: which iust and wise coniectures drew him to suspect least the discords of Italie might breed occasion to the French to inuade the kingdome of Naples: or perhaps, to make a counter strength against the might of the Venetians, (at that time redowted throughout all Italie) he iudged it necessarie to ally himselfe with others, and chiefly with the estates of Millan and Florence. Touching Lodowike Sforce, notwithstanding he was possessed with a mind traouelling, busie, and ambitious, yet by the necessitie of his condition, he was criuen to embrace the inclination and purpose to peace, as well for that they which commanded at Millan were no lesse threatened then others, with the danger which the residue feared, touching the greatnesse of Venice: as also for that it was more easie for him by the benefit of tranquillitie and peace, to keepe the authoritie he had vsurped, then by the trauels and troubles of warre. And albeit he kept a continuall drede, icalousie and suspicion ouer the thoughts and deuises of Ferdinand and Alphonso, yet waighing with the disposition of Laurence de Medicis to peace, the icalousie he had likewise of their greatnesse, and perswading himselfe also that for the diuersitie of affections and auncient hatreds betweene Ferdinand and the Venetians, it was a thing vaine to feare that betweene them should be contracted anie amitie firme and well assured: he held for certaine that they of Aragon could not haue the strength, societie, or assistance of others to enterprise against him that, which alone and of their singular power power they were not sufficient to obtaine.

Thus Ferdinand, Lodowike, and Laurence hauing one equall will and deuotion to peace, partly for the perswasions aforesaid, and somewhat for other inducements and considerations: the league and confederation contracted in the name of Ferdinand King of Naples, Iohn Galeas Duke of Myllan, and the common weale of Florence, was easily recontinued: it was begunne manie years before, and afterward broken by many accidents, and now effsoones renewed in the yeare 1486, for xxv. yeares, being competitors and parties therein almost all the meaner Potentates of Italy, in whom was any principall ende and purpose not to suffer the Venetians to become great: The Venetians (for their partes) being in deede more mighty and greater then any particular of the confederates, but farre lesse and inferior to them all together, held their counsels separate from the common counsell of the league, and watching to rayse and encrease their estate by the discord and trauels of others, they had a continuall preparation and readines to take the oportunitie of all occurrants and times, which might open vnto them the way to the Empire and Monarchie of all Italy: whereunto it was clearly seene that they did aspire in diuerse seasons, but chiefly when abusing the occasion of the death of Philip Maria Viscount Duke of Myllan, they attempted vnder colour to defend the libertie of the people of Myllan, to make themselues Lordes of that state, conspiring in like sort (but of late memory) to bring the Duchie of Ferrara by the way of open warre, to their seruitude and subiection.

A league for 20. yeares betwene the king of Naples, Duke of Myllan, and the common weale of Florence.

The ambition of the Venetians, & what occasions they sought to defend the Confederates.

This confederation did easily bridle the couctousnesse of the Senate of Venice, but it could not entirely knit the confederats in a true and faithfull amitie, for that being indifferently replenished with enuie and ielousie, they ceased not to keepe a continuall care, obseruation, and eye ouer the thoughts and behauiours of one an other, breaking mutually all their resolutions and plots by the which might come to any one of them enlargement of estate or reputation. A thing which made not the peace lesse stable, but reuiued in them all a generall readines to be careful to quench all such sparkes and brondes as might be the cause of new fires and burnings.

Such was the estate of the affaires, such were the foundations of the tranquillitie of Italy, disposed and counterpoised in such sort, that much lesse that there was any doubt of present mutation, seeing the wisdom of man could not easily make coniecture, by what counsels, by what accidents, or with what innouation or armies, so great a tranquillitie could be troubled, when in the moneth of Aprill 1492. chaunced the death of Laurence de Medicis: a death very pitifull for him in respect of his age (hauing not yet fortie foure yeares) but more bitter and intollerable to his countrey, which, for the wisdom and reputation of the man, together with the naturall volubilitie of his wit, rayfed to all things concerning honour and greatnesse, flourished plentifully with riches, loue, and ciuilitie, and with all other benefits and felicities, which in the assayres of the world are wont to accompany a long concord and peace. This death hapned also very ill for the residue of Italy, as well for his generall deuises, cares, and actions for the common sewertie, as also for that he was a meane in particular to moderate and bridle the differences, counsels, and suspicions, which for diuerse occasions, were often kindled betweene Ferdinand and Lodowike Sforce, Princes equall in ambition, and nothing inferiour in power. Like as when aduersities happen, it is seldome scene that one ill comes alone: So a litle after the death of Laurence (the time preparing euery day occasions to the calamities to come) chaunced the death of the Pope, whose life being in other things vnprofitable to the common weale, was at the least conuenient in this, that leauing sodainly warre and armes vnappily rayfed in the entry and beginning of his Popedom against Ferdinand, at the incensing of many barons of the realme of Naples, hee turned soone after all his facultie, affections and spirite, to pleasures, vaine, dissolute, and idle, not acquainting his thoughts (neither for himselfe nor frinds) with any enterprise which might trouble the rest, felicitie, and good accord of Italy. To Innocent succeeded Roderyk Borgia borne at Valence, one of the chiefe cities of Spayne: he was an auncient Cardinall, and one of the greatest in all the court of Rome: one meane that raised him to the seate of the Pope, was the difference betweene the Cardinals Africanus Sforce, and Julian S. Petri ad vincla: but the chiefest thing that accomplished his election, was, that with a new example for that time, he bought by the consent and knowledge of euery one, partly for money, and partly with promises of offices and great dignities, many voyces of the Cardinals, who reiecting the instruction of the Gospell, were not ashamed to passe to him by sale, an authoritie and power to make marchandize of the holy treasures, and that with the name of the celestiall authoritie in the most high and eminent part of the temple. To which abominable negotiation many of them were induced by the Cardinall Ascanius, but that was not more with perswasions and sutes, then with his example: for that being corrupted with the infinite desire of riches, he made the Pope promise him for his hyer and recompence of so great wickednesse, the office of vicchauncellorshippe, (the principallest place in the Court of Rome) together with benefices, castles, and his pallace of Rome full of moueables of great valour. But the Pope for all this, could not auoyde neither for the time to come, the iustice and iudgement of God, nor for the present, the infamy & iust hate of men, in whom for this election, was no small impressions of astonishment and horror, not onely for that it was entangled with meanes dishonest, but also because the natures and conditions of the man chosen, were, (for the greatest part) knowen to many: many sentences and coniectures were made of his successe, and amongst others, Ferdinand King of Naples, dissembling openly the griefe he had of that election, signified to the Queene his wife with teares (which he was wont to forbear euen in the death of his children) that there was created a Pope, who would be most hurtfull to Italy, and the whole common weale of Christendome. A iudgement not vnworthy of the wisdom of such a Prince: for that in Alexander the sixt (for so would this new Pope be called) was a subtiltie, sharpenes, and expedition of wit most singular, a counsell excellent, a wonderfull efficacie in perswasion, and in all great affayres a iudgement and care incredible. But these vertues were maruellously defaced by his vices, for, touching his manners and customes, they were very dishonest, in his administrations he expressed little sinceritie, in his countenance no shame, in his wordes small trueth, in his heart little faith, and in his opinion lesse religion. Of the contrary, all his actions were defiled with an insatiable couetousnesse, an immoderate ambition, a barbarous crueltie, and a burning desire to rayse and make great (by what meanes so euer) his children; who were many in number, and amongst others, one, no lesse detestable then the father, to whose cursed counsels he became a wicked instrument. Great was the chaunge in the affayres of the Church by the death of Innocent the eight, but no lesse resolution happened in the common weale of Florence, by the taking away of Laurence de Medicis, to whose greatnesse (without contradiction) succeeded Peter the eldest of his three sonnes, who as well for his age being yet young, as also for his other qualities was not fit for the gouernement of so heauie a charge, and lesse capable to manage the affayres with that moderation which his father was wont to vse in businesse both forraigne and domestically, and knowing discretely howe to temporise betweene Princes confederate, he had whilest he liued augmented greatly the conditions and faculties both publike and priuate, and at his death, left vnto euery one a firme opinion that the peace of Italy was principally preserved by his meanes.

Lod. Sforce.

Peter was no sooner succeeded to the administration of the common weale, then with a course directly contrary to the counsels of his father, and not communicating with those auncient citizens which were wont to be called to the deliberation of businesse of importance, he ioyned himselfe so straitly with Ferdinand and Alphonso, perhaps by the perswasion of Virginio Fra- sin his parent depending wholly vpon them, that Lodowyke Sforce had iust occasion to feare, that as often as the Aragons would annoy him, they should be ayded (by the authority of Peter de Medicis) with the forces of the common weale of Florence. This intelligence, seminary, and origi-nall of all the troubles, albeit at the beginning was debated with no lesse iudgement & wisdom; then the resolution secret and priuate: yet by certayne obscure coniectures, it beganne euen in the beginning to be suspected by Lodowyke, a Prince very watchfull and of right subtle vnderstanding: for, as it hath beene an auncient custome in Christendome to send Embassadours to congratulate with the newe Pope, as Christes Vicar on earth, and to offer him obedience: So Lo- dowyke Sforce, who appropriated to himselfe this peculiar custome to study to shewe him selfe more wise then the rest, and of inuentions straunge and vnaduised to others, had giuen counsell that the Embassadors of the confederats, should all enter Rome in one day, and presenting themselues altogether in the publike consistorie afore the Pope, the Oration should be expressed by one of them onely in the name of them all: for that by that forme and order of doing, besides the encrease of their common reputation, it should appeare to all Italy that there was amongst them not onely a good will and confederation, but rather so great a coniunction, that they seemed as one body, one Prince, and one inuested corporation. To this he adioyned, that as touching the

utilitie of this counsell, it was not onely exprest with the discourse of reason, but iustified with a late and familiar example, for that (as was beleueed) the last Pope taking argument of the disunion of the confederates, in that at severall seasons, and with counsels separate, they had done him obsequie, he was the more readie to inuade the kingdom of Naples. Ferdinand approued easily the aduise of Lodowyke: the Florentines allowed it for the authoritie of the one and other: and Peter de Medicis was not against it in open counsell, albeit in particular, the deuise was nothing agreeable to him: for that being one of the elect Embassadors for that common weale, and hauing an intention to make his legation glorious with proud and gorgeous demonstrations, he feared that if he should make his entry into the citie and the Popes presence amongst the other Embassadors of the confederates, the magnificencie of his traine would not be scene, no more then a little candle amidst a choyse sort of greater lights. This vanitie of the young man was confirmed by the ambitious counsell of Genill Bishoppe of Arze, the other coembassador for Florence: to him belonged the authoritie of the oration in the name of the Florentines, by reason of his dignitie and profession in the studies of humanitie. And seeing by this manner no lesse vnlooked for then alwayes vnaccustomed, he saw himselfe depriued of the occasion to publish his eloquence in an assembly so honorable & solemne, he complayned as if he had suffered wrong in his perpetuall reputation. For this reason, Peter de Medicis, pushed on partly by his proper vanitie and lightnesse, and partly by the pompe and ambition of the other, required the King of Naples (albeit with this caution, to keepe from Lodowyke that he did impugne his counsell) to consider, that that forme of legation could not be executed in common without great confusion, and therefore that he would take vpon him to perswade, that the expedition might be separate, and passe according to the examples passed. The king of Naples desiring to gratifie him in his demaund (but yet not without the displeasure of Lodowyke) satisfied him in the effect, but not in the manner, plainly declaring to Lodowyke, that he did not discondescend from the first plot and resolution for the Embassadors, for other occasion then at the instance and solicitation of Peter de Medicis. Lodowyke for this suddaine mutation, declared more perplexitie and trouble of mind, then the nature and importance of the thing could deserue, and amid his complaintes, he impropriated to himselfe this degree of iniurie, that to diminish his reputation, they reuoked the first deuise, whereof he was author, and already had communicated it with the Pope and the whole court of Rome. But the point wherein he felt his most trouble and trauell of mind was, for that in this litle and vaine accident, he saw tokens, argument, and coniectures, that Peter de Medicis had secret intelligence with Ferdinand, which by the euents that followed he discovered daily more apparantly. Langulare, Cernietre, and other small castles neare to Rome, were in the possession of Francisquin Cibo, a Genoway, bastard sonne to Pope Innocent, and he after the death of his father being gone to dwell at Florence, perhaps vnder the fauour and societie of Peter de Medicis, brother to M. his wife: sold immediatly after his coming thither to Virginio Vrsin by the negotiation of Peter, those castles for the price of forty thousand duckats. A thing debated chiefly with Ferdinand, who lent him most part of the money, perswading himselfe that it could not but turne to his profite, if the greatnesse of Virginio, who was his parent and in his pay, should enlarge and stretch farre about the confines of Rome. The king considered that the power of the Popes was an apt instrument to trouble the Realme of Naples (an auncient freeholder & chiefe of the Church of Rome) both for that it had large borders vpon the ecclesiasticall territories, and he had not yet forgotten what differences he & his father had with them: and also he wisely foresaw that there is alwayes some occasion of new contentions about the iurisdiction of Confines, both for tributes & collation of benefices, and for regard of entercourse of barons, with many other quarrels hapning many times amongst estates borderers, and no lesse often betweene the vassall and the Lord Peramount: for which reasons, he held alwaies for one of the firme foundations of his securitie, that all or the greater part of the mightiest barons of the territory of Rome, should depend vpon him. A thing which in that time he wrought with so much the more care and diligence, by how much the world iudged that the authoritie of Lodowyke Sforce was like to be great with the Pope by the meane of Cardinall Acanin his brother: And as many beleueed, he was perhaps not the least pushed forward with feare, least in Alexander were concurrant the conuictiounes & hatred of his vnckle Pope Calixtus the third, who, (sauiug that death gaue impedimēt to his counsels) had immediatly after the decess of Alphonso father to Ferdinand, taken armes to dispoyle him of the kingdome of Naples, (reuered as he said to the Church). He did not remember (so little force amongst men hath the memorie of benefits receiued) how by the meane of Alphonso (in whose kingdome he was borne, and to whom he had bene a seruant long time) he had obteyned other ecclesiasticall dignities with a liberall fauour and aide to aspire to the pope-doine. But it hath beene alwaies a thing very true, that wisemen haue not at all times a discretion or iudgement perfect, seeing it is necessary, that the signes of the weakenesse and fraillie of mans vnderstanding should many times be discouered. The king of Naples, notwithstanding he was recommended for a Prince watchfull, politike, & forseeing, yet did he ouerse himselfe to consider how much this deliberation deserued to be reiected, for that conteyning in no accident or fortune any other hope then of a small vtilitie, it bred on the other side, many degrees and properties of milchiefes and harmes irreparable, for that in the sale of those small castles was no little oportunitie to innouate to new things, the minds of those to whom it did either appertaine, or had interest of profite to looke to the preseruacion of the common peace & concord: for the Pope pretending that by such alienation made without his knowledge, they were diuolued to the sea Apostolike by the disposing of the lawes, seemed not a litle iniuried: and looking withall into the ends and purposes of Ferdinand, filled all Italy with complaintes against him, Peter de Medicis, and Virginio, whom he assured that so farre as his power would stretch, he would not spare any thing nor let passe any meane to preserue the dignitie and right of the sea of Rome. Lodowyke Sforce was no lesse moued, to whom were alwayes suspected the actions of Ferdinand, and who, for the false opinion he had that the Pope would be gouerned by the counsels of Ascanius & himselfe, esteemed it his proper losse, if any thing should be diminished of the greatnesse of Alexander. But that which vexed him most, was that he could not but doubt, that betweene the Aragons and P. de Medicis was contracted a secret and an assured league, drawing his coniecture from this, that in that action they had proceeded wholly, vniformely, and reciprocally: And therefore to raise impediments to those plots and determinations as most daungerous to his affayres, and to make this occasion conuenient to winne the Pope, he stirred him vp as much as he could, to protect his proper dignitie: he perswaded with him that there was not so much necessitie to set before his eyes things that were done presently, as to consider how much it imported him, to suffer in the first dayes of his pontificacie, to be despised the Maiestie of such a degree, euen by his proper vassals: he told him, he had not to beleue that the couetousnesse of Virginio, or the importance of the castles, or other reason of that nature, had moued Ferdinand: but a certaine languishing desire (which he could no longer keepe smothered) to assay his patience & courage, with iniuries bearing litle face and shew at the beginning, but afterwarde (if he would ioyne sufferance to those inferiour wrongs) he would not be without boldnesse to tempt him euery day with offences of far higher and greater qualitie: he aduised him to beleue, that the ambition of Ferdinand did nothing differ from his auncestors kings of Naples, and perpetuall enemies to the Church of Rome, who had not forborne to persecute the Popes with warres and armies, and sometimes had occupied Rome:

That the example is fresh and Greene, that the king now reigning, in the person of his sonne, dispatched two armies at two seuerall times against two Popes, and made inuasion euen to the waies of Rome: That he hath bene alwaies exercised in malice, conspiracies, and warres against his predecessors: And now not only the example of other kings, not onely his naturall couetousnesse to beare rule, did stirre him vp against him, but rather an olde infected desire of reuenge nowe burst out by the memorie of iniuries receiued of Calixtus his vnckle. Therefore he aduised him with great diligence to looke into those things, least by giuing sufferance and patience to these first wrongs, he were not the breeder of his proper dishonour and derogation, making himselfe to be honoured with ceremonies and vaine titles, and in effect followed with dispite, derision, and contempt of euery one. He tolde him that in this vnworthy tolleracion was secretly many oportunities of courage & boldnes to the partie to conspire against him many daungerous enterprises: where, if he would take this to hart, and call things into correction and iustice, he should with more facilitie preserue the auncient maiestie and greatnesse, with the true reuerence due by all the world to the Popes of Rome. To these perswasions he ioynd many offices and promises of no small importance, but farre greater in efficacie and effect, for that he lent him readily forty thousand duckets, and leuyed with him at their common charge three hundred men at armes, vnder this condition, that they should be employed where it best pleased the Pope. Notwithstanding all

all this, Lodowyke, desirous to shunne the necessitie to enter into newe troubles, communicated with Ferdinand, and councelled him to dispose Virginio to appease the Pope by some honest meanes, least vpon so slender beginnings, there arose not displeasures and troubles heauy and • flaunderous. But with greater libertie and efficacy, he admonished often times Peter de Medicis, that considering how conuenient it was for the common peace of Italy that his father Laurence was alwayes as the mediator and indifferent friend of Ferdinand and him) he would rather take the wayes, examples, and directions of his father, specially touching a personage of so great valour, then beleeuing new counsels, to be driuen to giue occasion to another, to make deliberations which in the end would proue hurtfull to euery one: he willed him to remember what great reputacion and sewertie the Sforces and Medicis had giuen reciprocally to their houses: and with what wrongs and iniuries the familie of Aragon had obtruded vpon his father, his auncestors, and common weale of Florence: and lastly by how many meanes and times Ferdinand and Alphonso his father had conspired some times by armes and open force, and often by traines and subtelties, to make them selues Lordes of Tuskane.

These counsells or aduertisements brought forth litle fruite according to the expectation of the author, for that Ferdinand, esteeming it much to his indignitie to giue place to Lodowyke and Ascanius, by whose workings he supposed the Pope was setled into those discontentments and indignations which he shewed: gaue secret counsell to Virginio by the incitation of his sonne Alphonso, not to delay to take by vertue of his purchase, the possession of the castles, promising to defende him against all displeasures that might happen. And on the other side, gouerning him selfe with his naturall indutrie, he communicated with the Pope diuerse meanes of composition, secretly incensing Virginio notwithstanding not to consent to any but such, as might keepe the castles in his possession, satisfying the Pope with some portion of money: which comfortes set Virginio into such a courage and resolution of mind, that many times afterwards he refused certaine of the conditions, euen such as Ferdinand (not to incense the Pope too much) solicited him instantly to be accepted. By these actions it was plainly perceiued that Peter de Medicis persevered to follow the authoritie of the king, and that all that was done to draw him away, was in vaine and without fruite: therefore Lodowyke Sforce deeply reuoluing how much it imported that the citie of Florence should be at the deuotion of his enemies, whose temperature and good gouernement was wont to be the principall foundation of his securitie, and seeming to see in his secret cogitation many impressions of daungers threatening him on all sides, determined to provide for his proper safety, and to those new perils to appropriate newe remedies, specially his conscience interpreting vnto him with what vehement desire the Aragons thirsted to take from him the gouernement of his Nephew: which iust ambition, albeit Ferdinand (to whom nothing was more familiar then to dissemble his intentions) had sought to couer in all his actions, yet in Alphonso, of nature more open and liberall, was not so great continencie and moderation, but that he complained publicly of the oppression of his sonne in law, pronouncing with more great libertie of wordes, then temperance of discretion, many iniurious speeches tending to manifest threatening. To these coniectures, Lodowyke added this argument of suspicion: He knew well that Isabell wife to Iohn Galeas, a young Ladie of high stomacke, would vse a perpetuall diligence to incense her father and grandfather, that if thindignitie which was done to her husband and her, would not moue them, at least the consideration of the perils whereunto their own liues were exposed, together with the lamentable ruine of their children, might draw them to compassion. But that which chiefly occupied his mind with perplexitie & torment, was, that by the suggestion of his proper conscience, he knew how hateful his name was to the subiects of the Duchie of Myllan, as well for the grieuous and vnaccustomed money tributes which he had imposed vpon them, as also for the compassion that euery one had of Iohn Galeas their rightfull Lord. And although he trauelled by all his best wayes to make them of Aragon suspected of a desire to impatronise themselves of that estate, as though they did assume a title by the auncient rights of the testament of Philip Maria Viscount, who had instituted his heire Alphonso father to Ferdinand, and vnder that pretence ment to wrest from him the gouernment of his Nephew: yet, he found him selfe vnable by all these meanes to remooue the hatreds that were conceiued against him, and much lesse so to satisfie the world, but that all men might consider to howe many miseries and wickednesses the ambition and wretched desire to beare rule, leades mortall men. Therefore after he had made discourse and conference with a small studie and trauell of minde of the state of things present, and the daungers likely to happen, casting aside all other thoughts, his deuiles at last brought forth this resolution, to search new confederates and new friends. Touching this resolution he found a great oportunitie in the Popes disdain against Ferdinand, and in the desire which he beleueed the state of Venice had, that this confederation should chaunge & alter, which of long time had giuen no small impedimentes to their purposes: he made solicitation to both these to contract in common a new confederacie for the publike benefite.

*The impuden-cie of the Pope to iustifie his

The plaine subtlety of popes to call their sons nephews.

But the Pope reiecting all passions of anger, and all other affection, had his mind onely possesed with an vnbrideled couetousnesse to rayse and make mightie his sonnes, in whom hauing sedled a blind fancie, he was not ashamed, contrarie to the custome of former Popes (who to cast some cloke ouer their infamy were wont to call them their Nephewes) to call them his children, and expessed them to the world for such. And not finding as yet other fit occasion to giue beginning to his ambitious intention: he made instance to marry one of his two sons to the bastard daughter of Alphonso, demaunding a dowrie of some rich estate in the kingdome of Naples: from which hope so long as he was not excluded, he harkened rather with his eare then his heart to the confederation offered by Lodowyke. And if in this desire he had beene satisfied, the peace of Italy had not perhaps falne into so sodaine alteration and trouble.

Pope embraceth
the coun-cels of Sforza.*

Ferdinand happily had not his minde much estranged from that motion: but Alphonso to whom was hatefull the ambition and pride of the Pope, denyed constantly his consent, and yet keeping his intentions dissembled, they made no open chalenge or dislike to the marriage, but laying all the difficulty vpon the qualitie of the dowrie that was demaunded, they satisfied not Alexander, who rising for this cause into discontentment, resolved to embrace the counsels of Lodowyke, his humors being turned all into disdain and ambition, and his minde trauelled with feare, for that not onely Virginio Vrsin was mercenarie to Ferdinand, and for the many fauours he had receiued of him and them of Florence, and being withall of the faction of the Guelffes, was at that time very mightie throughout the whole dominions of the Church: but that which more was, Prosper and Fabricius principall heads of the family of the Collonnos, and the Cardinall of S. P. ad uincula, a Cardinall of great reputation (then rettyred to the Castle of Ostie, which he held as Bishop of the place, least the Pope should dresse some ambush against his life:) was now become a great friend to Ferdinand, to whom before he was a professed enemy, and had many times stirred the Popes Sixtus and Innocent against him. But the Senate of Venice contrary to the opinion and expectation of the world, made no great shew of readines to this confederation: for, albeit they tooke it to happen to their commoditie, and held withall very agreeable the disunion of others, yet they tooke occasion in the infidelitie of the Pope, being euery day more suspected to euery one, to be slow to harken to the league, the remembrance of the alliances made by them with Sixtus and Innocent the Popes latest predecessors, seruing much to their present distrust. This was when the warre was most hoat against the Duke of Ferrara, whereunto after he had prouoked them, and intangled them with the quarrell, receiuing of the one great displeasures without any profit, and for Sixtus, he did not onely chaunge purpose, but also recompensed them with his spirituall curses, and (together with the residue of all Italy) he proceeded against them with his temporall corrections: But notwithstanding all these, the industrie and diligence of Lodowyke continually soliciting the Senate, and priuately working with many in particular, all these difficulties were vanquished, and at last was contracted in the moneth of Aprill 1493. betweene the Pope, the Senate of Venice, and Iohn Galeas Duke of Myllan (for all expeditions were dispatched in his name) a new confederation, for their common defence, and particular preservation of the gouernement of Lodowyke: one of the conditions was, that the Venetians and Duke of Myllan, and euery of them should send immediatly to Rome for the seruicie of the Pope and state ecclesiastike, an hundred men at armes, as well with those, as with greater forces (if neede required) they should ioyne with him for the recouerie of the castles deteyned by Virginio.

and wise proce-ding of the Venetians.*

*Confederation
betweene the Pope, the Venetians & the

These new counsels moued not a little the mindes of all Italy, for that the Duke of Myllan remayned now deuided from that league, by the which for more then a dozen yeares, their common securitie was mainteyned, being in it expressly defended that none of the confederates should enter any new alliance without consent of the residue. And therefore seeing that vnitie was broken with vnequall diuision, wherein consisted the equalitie of their generall and cōmon busines,

and the mindes of the Princes replenished with suspitions and displeasures, there could be no expectation of other successe, then that to a generall and common hurt, there would resort fruites equall and conformable to such seedes. Now, the Duke of Calabria and P. de medicis, iudging it more for the sewertie of their estates to preuent, then to be preuented, inclyned easly to Prosper and Fabricius Colonne, who being also secretly incensed by the Cardinall S. P. aduincla, offered to surpriue the towne of Rome with their companies of men at armes and the aide of the faction of the Gebelyns, so that the Vrsins would follow them, and the Duke of Calabria march so neare, that he might reskeue them within three dayes after their entry into Rome.

the surprise of Rome.

But Ferdinand, who nowe desired no more to vexe but to appease the courage of the Pope, and to correct that which heretofore had beene done by a rash counsell and without discreffion, reiected altogether those counsels wherein he iudged was infection of commotion, and carried not intention and matter to breede securitie, but to raise and nourish greater troubles and daungers: he determined now, not fainedly, but with all his hart, to do all he could to compound and accord the controuersie of the castels, perswading himselfe, that that occasion of so great emotion and change being taken away, Italy would speedily returne with little or no trauell, to her first estate. But it hapneth not alwayes, that in taking away the occasions, the effects doe cease, hauing had of them their first beginning: for, as it often times hapneth that resolutions made by feare, seeme to him that feareth, lesse then the perill: so Lodowyke had no great confidence in that he had found a remedie sufficient for his securitie: But doubting, by reason the Pope and the Venetians had intentions and ends other then his, that his foundation could not long last, which he had layd vpon the confederation lately made with them, and that therefore his affaires by diuers accidents should be in daunger to be reduced into hard termes and many difficulties: he applyed all his thoughts, more to cure euen to the roote the originall ill that he set before his eyes, then to provide a salue for such accidents as might happen by it, neither remembring how daungerous it is to vse a medicine stronger then the nature of the disease or complexion of the patient will suffer, nor that to enter into greater perills can be the onely remedie for daungers present. And to the end to build his sewertie vpon forreine strength, seeing he had no confidence in his owne forces, and lesse expectation of trust in the Italian amities, he determined to doe all that he could to stirre vp the French King Charles the viij. to assaile the kingdome of Naples, which he pretended to appertaine to him by the auncient rights and discentes of the house of Aniow.

The kingdome of Naples, which, in the inuestitures and bulls of the Church of Rome, whereof it is an auncient freehold, is absurdly called the Realme of Sicile on this side the riuier of Far, and being vniuersally vsurped by Manfroy bastard sonne to the Emperour Fredericke the second, was giuen in chiefe together with the Ile of Sicile vnder the title of both Sicules, the one on this side, and the other beyond Far, by Pope Vrbyn the fourth, to Charles Earle of Pronence and Aniow, brother to that Lewys king of the french, who, much renowned for his power and strength, but more recommended for the holinesse of his life, deserved (according to the vaine affections of the Frenchmen) to be translated after his death into the number of Saintes. This Charles with force of armes, obtained effectually, that, which by title was giuen to him with the authority of the Church: after his death, succeeded to the kingdome, Charles his sonne called by the Italians (to distinguish him from his father) Charles the second, who left the inheritance of the Realme to Robert his sonne. But because Robert dyed without issue male, Iohane daughter of Charles Duke of Calabria sonne to Robert, who dyed in young age before his father, aspired to the kingdom: but her authoritie beganne immediately to be deiectioned, no lesse for the infamie of her life and conditions, then for the common imbecillitie of that sexe: whereupon, with the increase of time, the Realme being throwne into many discordes and warres, not with straungers, but amongst the selfe successors of Charles the first, descending of diuerse children of Charles the second: Iohane despayring not to be able to defend her selfe, adopted for her sonne, Lewys Duke of Aniow, brother to the french King Charles the fift: he to whom the frenchmen gaue the surname of wise, for that he had obtained many victories without feeling the power of Fortune. This Lewys, after he had passed into Italy with a mighty armie (Iohane being aforehand decessed by violent means, and the kingdome transferred to Charles called Durazzo, descending likewise of Charles the first) died of a feuer in Apulia euen when he was almost in possession of the victorie: so that there came no other thing to them of Aniow by his adoption, then the earledome of Pronence, which had bene alwayes possessed by the issues of Charles the first. But yet of that rose the originall of the colour vnder the which afterwards, both Lewys of Aniow, sonne to the first Lewys, and at another time a sonnes sonne of the same name both stirred vp by the Popes, being then in variance with the same kings, to make many inuasions vpon the kingdome of Naples, but with great misfortune and preiudice. Touching Charles Duraazo, Ladislaue his sonne succeeded him, who dying without issue in the yeare 1414. the crowne diuolued to his sister Iohane the second, A name much accursed for the kingdome of Naples, and no lesse vnhappy to both the one and other of the women, resembling one an other in dissolute gouernement and wanton customes of life: for this Iohane putting the pollicie and direction of the Realme into the hands of those persons with whom she communicated vnchastly her bodie, was immediatly brought into such straites and difficulties, that being tormented with Lewys the third, with the aide of Pope Martyn the fifth, she was at last constrained for the last refuge, to make her sonne by adoption, Alphonso king of Aragon and Sicile. But entring soone after into contention with him, she brake that adoption vnder colour of ingratitude, and made a new adoption, calling to her succours, the selfe Lewys, who persecuting her with warre, compelled her by necessities of warre, to make the first adoption. In so much as hauing with force chased Alphonso wholly out of the kingdome, she enioyed it in peace, all the residue of her life: And dying without issue, she instituted for her heire (as the brute went) Rene Duke of Aniow and Earle of Prouence, brother to Lewys her sonne adoptyfe, who perhaps died the same yeare. But the succession of Rene displeasing much the Barons of the realme (besides a brute running that the testament was forged by them of Naples) Alphonso was reuoked by a part of the Barons and people: and from thence kindled the fire of the warres betwene Alphonso and Rene, which by many yeares brought many afflictions to that noble realme, and yet the accidents and actions of the warre, were more by the proper forces of the realme, then by the strength of the parties. In this sort (the wils of men being different and contrary) were kindled the factions not altogether in that time quenched betwene the Aragons and them of Aniow, their titles and colours of rights chaunging with the time, for that the Popes following more their customes of couetousnes, or the propertie of times, then iustice or equitie, consented diuersely to the inuestitures of them. But touching the warres betwene Alphonso and Rene, the victory remained to Alphonso, a Prince for his valure, more renowned, for his power, more mighty, and for his fortune, better fauoured: who dying soone after without lawfull heires, and without making any mention of Iohn his brother and successor to the realme of Sicile & Aragon, bequeathed by testament the kingdome of Naples to Ferdinand his bastard sonne, as a iust reward and testimonie of his proper getting and conquest, and therefore he iudged it could not appertaine to the crowne of Aragon. This bastard, notwithstanding he was immediatly after the death of his father, inuaded by Iohn the sonne of Rene, and that by the supportation of the principall barons of the realme: yet with his fortune & vertue he maintained not only good defence, but also so chased his aduersaries, that neuer after during the life of Rene (suruiuing many yeares his sonne) he neither had to debate with those of Aniow, nor yet stode in feare of their inuasions. In the end Rene dyed, and hauing no issue male, he established as heire ouer his whole estates, Charles the sonne of his brother, who dying soone after without children, left by his wil his inheritance to the french king Lewys the xj. to whom did not only returne as to his Lord soueraigne the Duchie of Aniow (which suffreth no capacity of succession in the women, for that it is a member of the crowne) but also he put himselfe in the possession of Prouence, notwithstanding the Duke of Lorraine descending of one of the daughters of Rene, iustified the inheritance of his estates to appertaine vnto him. And the said Lewys by iust vertue & prerogatiue of the same testament, had good power to pretend that the rights which those of Aniow had to the kingdome of Naples, should be appropriated to him. All which inheritances being passed and continued after his death to the person of Charles the viij. his sonne, Ferdinand king of Naples began to haue a mighty enemy, besides the oportunitie generally offering to who soeuer desired to annoy him. For, at that time, this was the state of the realme of Fraunce: it was very populous in multitudes of men, for wealth & riches euery particular region most fertill and plentifull, for glory in armes most flourishing and renowned: a pollicy well directed, discipline administred, an authoritie dreadfull, and in opinion and hope most mightie, lastly their generall conditions and faculties so well furnished, as perhaps it was not more happy in these mortall felicities since the daies of Charlemaine. It was newly amplified amplified in euery one of the three parts, wherein all Gauls stood deuided by the annuities: for, xl. yeares before vnder Charles the vij. (a Prince for his victories obtained with great daungers called happie) Normandie and the Duchie of Guyen holden by the English, were reduced to the obedience of the french crowne. And in the last dayes of Lewys the xj. the Earledome of Provence, the dukedome of Burgondy, almost all Picardie, together with the Duchie of Britaine, were by a new mariage inuested in the power of Charles the viij. There was no want of inclination in this king to aspire to conquere by warre and armes the kingdom of Naples, as iustly appertaining to him: which continuing from his infancie by a certaine naturall instinct, was entertayned and nourished by such as were about him, and for the conformitie of humours, very agreeable with him: they raised his thoughts into vaine regions, and made him glorious about the triumphes of Cesar and Alexander: they told him that with his heroicall minde, vertues, and disposition, did concur a present occasion to make him surmount the renowme of his predecessors, for that in the conquest of Naples was a readie way for him to bring vnder his subiection the Empire of the Turkes.

These things being knowne to many, brought many hopes to Lodowyke Sforce, to perswade easily the thing he desired, who also reapposed much in the friendship and familiarity which the name of Sforce had in the french Court: for, both in him and in his brother Galeas afore him, was continued by many demonstrations and good offices, the amitie begunne by Francis Sforce their father, who xxx. yeares before hauing receiued in fee of Lewys the xj. (whose mind abhorred alwaies the things of Italy) the citie of Sauone, with the right which he pretended to haue to Genes possessed aforetime by his father, neuer failed him in his daungers, neither with counsell, succors, nor affection.

But Lodowyke to sollicite in France with more credite and authoritie, and iudging himselfe vnable alone, both for the importance and daunger of the thing, to handle so great an enterprize: sought to communicate and perswade all things with the Pope, in whom he knew had most dominion to stirring humors, ambition and disdain: he told him that not by the fauors of the Princes of Italy, and much lesse by the meane of their armies and helpes, he should be reuenged of Ferdinand, nor haue hope to compasse estates worthy and honorable for the aduancement of his honours. He found the Pope to beare a vehement and ready will to the matter, perhaps for a desire to innouate and alter things, but more likely to constraîne the Aragons by feare to come to that, which by consent and will they would not accord to him. After they had communicated their counsels, they dispatched secretly into France, personages of trust, to sound the will of the king and such as gouerned him: who shewing them selues not farre from their intention, Lodowyke turning his whole wits to the deuise of this enterprize: sent in the sight of all the world (but shadowing it with other occasions) one Charles Balbian Earle of Beloyense, who soliciting the king certaine dayes in priuate audience, and working particularly with sundry of his principall fauorites, was at last introduced into open counsell, the king present, where in a publike hearing of the Prince, his Lords and Prelates of the Court, he deliuered this forme of discourse.

Most Christian King, The experience of the disposition of hearts diuersly inclined, makes me doubtfull, whether vnder a direct and absolute forme, I should begin my discourse, or vsing the custome of Orators, bring into question such obiections as may be opposed against the present matter: for, in causes of perswasion, the one with the other must orderly concur, least for want of due office in the speaker, the matter seeming to suffer imperfection and error, do not bring forth resolution and effect according to the expectation of the parties for whom he sollicitates. And albeit the vniuersall coniecture and opinion of your Maiesties maiesties vertues, and the graue aspect and face of your right wise counsell here assembled, promise no lesse ready consent and liking, then the matter is iust and innocent: yet for your Maiesties better inducement, and generall satisfaction of your Lords and Prelates assisting, I will ioine my selfe to the refutation of that generall doubt which in negotiations of this nature, are commonly objected, more by custome, then iust cause arising. If therefore (right Christian king) any man for what occasion so euer, will hold for suspected the integritie of mind and faith, with the which Lodowyke Sforce comes to counsell you to beare armes to conquere the kingdome of Naples: he may easily deliuer his mind of that ill grounded suspition, if he either looke into the offers, offices, and conditions wherewith he doth accompany his perswasion & counsell, offering you the commoditie of his treasures, men,

" and all other oportunities : or at least will call to his memorie with what deuotion both he , Gast
 " leas his brother, and originally Francis his father, did honour the late king Lewys your father, con" tinued with no lesse constancie, faith, and pietie to the glorious name of your Maiestie. Let him " consider also that by this enterprise, Lodowyke stands possible to many great daungers, with a ve" ry naked hope of any profite : yea in this is conteyned the only benefite he shall haue, to see a iust " reuenge of the ambushes and wrongs done by them of Aragon : where your maiestie by meane
 " of the victorie, shal happily aspire to a most flourishing kingdome, bringing with it a greater glo" rie and oportunitie of farre more high and honorable merite, an action whereunto the thoughts of " mighty Princes ought to be fashioned. And on the other part, if it happen that you come not to " the end of this enterprise : yet your maiestie looseth no reputation, nor your greatnesse the more " diminished : for that onely the fortunes of Princes are subiect to opinions, but not their estate and " maiestie impaired. But for Lodowyke, he is of nothing more sure then to suffer generall ill will and " contempt, and of nothing more vnure then to find remedie in his perils : for that in him would " concurre all the displeasures and slaunders which may concerne his estate, life, or reputation. And " therefore I see not how should be suspected the counceils of him, whose conditions and fortunes " are so vnequall and inferior to yours. But there be reasons stirring you to this honorable expedi" tion, which for the simplicitie, roundnesse, and innocencie they conteine, will admit no doubt :
 " for that in them are liberally concurrant all the ground, and foundations which in consulting of " enterprises, merit chiefe consideration : that is to say, the iustice of the cause, the facilitie of the " conquest, and the great fruite of the victorie : it is manifest to all the world, how resolute and ap" parant be the rights which the house of Aniow, to whom you are lawfull inheritour, hath to the " realme of Naples, and how iust is the succession which this crowne pretends to it by the issues of " Charles, who first of the blood royall of France, obteyned the same kingdome, both with the au-" thoritie of the Pope, and by his proper valour. And it is no lesse easie to conquere it, then the acti" on is iust : for, who knowes not, how much the King of Naples is inferiour in force, authoritie, and " fortune, to the most mightie King of all Christendome. And no nation doubteth, with what ter-
 " rour and renowne the name of the french thundereth throughout the regions of the world, nei" ther with what astonishment the brute of your armies, keepeth other countreys in dread. At no " time did the inferiour Dukes of Aniow assaile the kingdome of Naples : that they put it not in " great hazard : And it is too late to be forgotten, how Iohn sonne of *Re*ne had in his hand the vi-" ctorie against Ferdinand now reigning, if Pope Pius had not taken it from him : but much more " Francis Sforce, who forbare (as is well knowen) to obey Lewys the xj. your father. If those small " forces trained with them so great fortunes, what may be hoped for of the armies and authoritie
 " of so mightie a king, all oportunities being increased, and the difficulties objected against *Re*ne
 " and Iohn, diminished, seeing the Princes of those estates which gaue impediments to their victo" ries, haue now vnite and confederation with you : and in them be no small meanes to offend the " kingdome of Naples : for, the Pope by land, by reason the territories of the Church are frontiers
 " to Naples, and the Duke of Mylan by sea, applying to you the commoditie and seruice of Genes :
 " will be furtherers of your victorie, with many helpes, fauours, and commodities : besides these,
 " there is no potentacie or iurisdiction in Italy will oppose against you : for, it cannot be iudged of
 " the Venetians, that they will throwe themselves into expenses and daungers, and much lesse de" priue their estate of the amitie wherein so long time they haue bene intertaind with the kings of " France : to preserue or protect Ferdinand an auncient enemy to their name and greatnesse : for " that amongst estates and kingdomes, the remembrance of iniuries past keepes mens mindes from " reconcilment. And there is no reason to beleue, that the Florentines will depart from the natu-
 " rall deuotion which they haue borne to the crowne of France, seeing it is but iust, to owe faith, " seruice and affection, to those who gaue them their first creation, dignitie, and greatnesse. But be-
 " it, that, following the common ingratitude of mortall men, they would obiect themselves against " you : what are they against so great a power, compounded vpon so warlike a nation, which ma" ny times, against the wils of all Italy hath passed the Alpes, and with a wonderfull glory and hap-" pinesse, haue brought home many victories and triumphes : And in what time hath the realme of " France bene euer more happie, more glorious, or more mightie, then at this hower ? neither had
 " this crowne at any time heretofore so conuenient and readie meanes to establish a firme peace " with all his neighbours. All which oportunities if they had so generally met together in the daies of your father, he would perhaps haue bin more ready to this selfe same expedition: And touching them of Aragon your enemies, the difficulties be no lesse augmented against them, then to you the oportunities be fauouring, because in the same realme both the faction of Anow is yet mighty, and no lesse the intelligences of many Princes and gentlemen chased out vniustly within these few yeares, besides, the iniuries done at all times by Ferdinand to the Barons & people, yea euen to them of the party of Aragon, haue beene of so bitter taste and toleration, together with his disloyalty so great, his couetousnesse so insatiable, & the examples of cruelty in him and his eldest sonne Alphonso so notorious and horrible: that it is certaine that all the realme pushed forward with a iust hate against them, will rise into willing commotion at the brute of your coming (so great authoritie hath as yet the remembrance of the liberalitie, sinceritie, humanitie, and iustice which the French kings haue vsed:) the onely deliberation to make the enterprise is sufficient to make you victorious: for, your men at armes shall no sooner passe ouer the mountaines, nor the armie at sea no sooner be prepared in the haven of Genes, then Ferdinand and his sonne stricken with the conscience of their wickednesse, will take more counsell to flie then to fight: so shall you with great happinesse, recouer for the posteritie of your bloud, a kingdome, which albeit can hold no comparison with the large realme of France, yet, besides his riches, amplitude and fertillity, it well merits account and reckoning for the helpes and infinite commodities which by it may be increased to this your imperiall crown, matters which I would particulate, were it not that the noble minds of the french reach vnto greater ends, and that the high and excellent thoughts of so valiant and glorious a king, regard not so much profits priuate, or particular, as they behold the vniuersall greatnesse of the whole common weale of Christendome: wherein touching this, what oportunitie more greater, what more ample occasions, what feat of countrey more proper or conuenient to manage warre against the enemies of our religion? The sea that deuides the kingdome of Naples and Greece, contains not in some part aboue lxx. miles in largenesse: a prouince so oppressed and torne in peeces with the tyrannies of the Turkes, that they desire nothing with more generall gladnesse, then to see the banners of Christians and men of warre marching for their deliuerie. There is nothing more easie then to runne euen into the intrals of that Nation, and to batter Constantinople, the soueraigne residencie of that Empire. This enterprise, for the maiestie and nature of it, doth most worthily become your person and greatnesse, with whose high & aspiring thoughts it seemes to haue a certaine liuely affinitie: And for the reason and necessitie of it, it can not so iustly appertaine to any as to you bearing the surname of Most Christian, a title wherein your predecessors haue flourished with no small examples of triumph & glory, they issuing in armed maner out of this realme, sometimes to deliuer the Church of God from the oppression of tyrants, sometimes to inuade the infidels, & recouer the holy sepulcher, haue raised euen to the third heauen their names and maiestie of the french kings: with these counells, with these meanes, with these actions, with these ends, became great and Emperour of Rome, that mighty and triumphant Charles, of whom as you beare the name, so now the time offereth you occasion to communicate with his glory and titles. But it is a time vainely spent to stand long vpon the recapitulation of these reasons, as though it were not more conuenient and more agreeing with the order of nature, to consider how to keepe, then how to get: for, considering the oportunitie of so many and great occasions calling you, it could not but intangle your greatnesse with apparant infamy & dishonour, to suffer any longer Ferdinand to vsurpe vpon you such a kingdome, which for almost two hundreth yeares hath had continuall possession in the kings of your bloud. And seeing by cleare iustice and all iudiciall course of lawes, it appertaines vnto you, who doubts how iustly it agreeth with your dignitie to recouer it: but specially how much it concerns your pietie to deliue from the cruell tyranny of those Catolyns, those people which beare deuotion to your name, and do craue by right to beare you the dutie and office of subiects? Thus most high and glorious king, is the enterprise proued iust, easie, and necessary, and withall no lesse glorious and holy, as well for it selfe in particular, as for that it openeth the way to other enterprises worthy of a right Christian king of France: whereunto not only the reasons of men, but euen the selfe voice of God, doth call you with great and manifest occasions, assuring you afore the beginning of a most great happinesse and fortune, since no greater worldly happinesse can happen to no Prince, then to see his deliberations and counells, (bringing glorie and greatnesse) to be accompanied with such circumstances and consequences, that they concerne not onely the benefite and vni-“uerfall safetic; but much more do confider the exaltation of the whole communitie of Chriften-dome.
 " of

*The Nobilitie of France mis-like the iourney

*A true faying
of King Lewys “vi.*

Iust reasons by the Nobility alleaged.

This propofition had no willing paffage into the eares or harts of the great Lords of France, but fpecially of fuch, who for their nobilitie and opinion of wifedome held greateft authoritie: They iudged that fuch a warre whereof he had opened the way and entry, could not but containe many difficulties and daungers, both for the conduct of armies into a countrey ftraunge, and farre remoued from the realme of France, and alfo againft enemies bearing reputation of valour, pollicie, and difcipline: for, for wifedome, forecaft, and ftained difcretion, Ferdinand bare a high recommendation: and for valour, conduct and direction in warre, his fonne Alphonfo was no leffe renoumed. Befides, they made this coniecture, that Ferdinand hauing raigned xxx. yeares, and sacked and confifked at fundry times many of the Barons, had heaped together no fmall treafure: on the behalfe of the king, they confidered that his capacitie was too greene to fuftaine alone fo heauy a burden, and for the direction of warres and eftates, the counsell weake, and the experience leffe affured of fuch as he beleueed moft in. To thefe they added the want of money, whereof they efteemed to heede a great quantitie. They wifhed that the deceits and fubtilties of the Italians might be deeply looked into, affuring themfelues that it could not be pleafing, neither to others nor to Lodowyke Sforce himfelfe: (a man confefled by all the Italians to be of little faith) that the kingdome of Naples fhould paffe into the power of a king of France: they iudged it hard to winne, and leffe eafie to keepe thofe things that fhould be wonne. For that reafon (faid they) Lewys father to Charles, (a Prince in all his actions following more the truth, then the appareance of things) would neuer accept the hopes which were offered him of the matters of Italy, and much leffe make reckoning of the rights faue to him in the Realme of Naples: no, he faue in his iudgement, that to fend armies beyond the mountaines, was no other thing then to fearch enemies and daungers with the waft of infinite treafure, and bloud of the Realme of France: they held it neceffarie afore all things (if this expedition fhould proceede) to reunite controuerfies with the kings borderers, for that with Ferdinand king of Spaine, was no want of occasions of quarrels and fufpitions, and with Maximilian king of Romaines, and Philip Archduke of Auftrich his fonne, not onely many hart burnings and iealoufies, but alfo difpleafures & iniuries: whole minds albeit they could not be recõciled without cõdefcending to fome things hurtfull to the crowne of France, yet neuertheleffe fuch reconcilements would be more by demonftrations then effectes: for, fay they, if any ill accident happen to the kings army in Italy, what accord can be fo well affured, which will hold them from inuading the Realme of France, feeing this is familiar with Princes, to hold for fufpected the greatneffe and fortunes of their neighbours, and are ouer nothing fo watchfull as ouer oportunities and occasions. And touching the king of England, Henry the vij. it was not to be doubted that the naturall hate of the Englifh toward the french had not more force then the peace made with him two moneths before, for that it is manifelt, that no one thing brought him more to the compofition, then that the preparations of the king of Romaines answered not the promifes wherewith he had induced him to lay fiege to Bollogne. Of this nature were the reafons alleaged by the great Lords, partly debated amongeft themfelues, and partly difputed in the prefence of the king. The chiefteft of thofe that iuftified thefe arguments afore the king, was one Iames Granille Admirall of France, whose greatneffe albeit was fomewhat diminished, yet his authoritie fuffered no alteration, for the auncient name and credit of his wifedome rousing liberally thorough all the Realme of France. But the kings mind with a wonderfull greedineffe, was wholly inclined to the contrary aduife: what with the greeneneffe of his yeares afpiring now to xxij. and by his unfayned nature, not yet experienced in the affaires of the world, he was caried into a wonderfull ambition to enlarge his Empire, following an appetite of glory, founded rather vpon a light will and furie of youth, then vpon maturitie of counsell, feeing that either by his proper nature, or rather the examples and admonifhments of his parents, he reappofed little faith in his Lords and Nobles of his realme. And fince he came forth of the tutorfhip and iurifdiction of Anne Ducheffe of Burbon his fifter, he bare no more care to the counfels of the Admirall, nor to others that had beene great in the gouernement: but gaue himfelfe ouer to the directions of certaine men of bafe condition, trained vp almoft alwayes in the feruice of his perfon: of thefe, fuch as had moft fauour and place with him, perfwaded him greatly to embrace the enterprife, being partly corrupted, (for the counfels of Princes are often times mercenarie)

with the promises and presents of Lodowyke Embassador, by whom was not forgotten any diligence or art to draw the fauours of such as might do most in this action. They were partly pushed on by certaine hopes, either to be raysed to estates in the kingdome of Naples, or to obtaine of the Pope, dignities and pensions in the Church. The principall of all these, was one Stephen de Vers, borne in Languedocke, of base place, but bred yp of long time with the king, in whose chamber he vsed to lie, and by the kings creation made Seneschall of Beucaire: with this man did communicate one William Bricconet, who of a marchant created first generall of France, and after made Bishop of S. Malo, had not only the charge & administration of the kings reueneue, (which the french call superintendent of the finances,) but also hauing confederacie with Stephen, had by his meanes a great entry into all the affaires of importance, albeit he had no great insight in the policie and gouernment of matters of estate. To the helpe of this enterprise, were adioyned the perswasions of Autouell of S. Seuerin, Prince of Salerne, and of Vernaedin of the same family, Prince of Bysignan, together with many other Barons banished the Realme of Naples, who being withdrawn many yeares before into France, had continually solicited the king to that enterprise, laying before his eyes the great calamitie, or rather generall despaire of the whole kingdome, and the factions, and many followers, which they promised themselves to haue in the same.

King Charles led by base men, and such as by money were corrupted.

The counsels of exiles are alwayes desperate.

In this diuersitie of perswasions, the deliberation remained suspended for certaine daies, others being not only in doubt what to determine, but also the kings will wauering and vncertaine, for that some times inclining to his ambition and glory, and sometimes restrained with feares & dangers, he would often be irresolute, and elssoones turne to the contrary, of that which he had afore determined. But in the end, his first inclination, together with the cursed destiny of Italy, being of more force then any thing that could be said to the contrary, the well gouerned & peaisible counsels of his Nobles were altogether reiected, and communicating only with the bishop of S. Malo, and the Seneschall of Beucaire, and partaking nothing with the assent & priuie of all others, there was a conuention made with Lodowyke Embassador, whose conditions albeit were holden secret for many moneths, yet this is the capitulation and summe of them.

The king Charles either going in person into Italy, or sending thither any army for the conquest of Naples, the Duke of Myllan was bound to giue him passage thorow his iurisdiccions. To send thither with his men, five hundreth men at armes paid: To suffer him to arme at Genes so many vessels as he will: And to lend him before he departed out of France, two hundreth thousand duckets.

Touching the king, he was bound to the defence and protection of the Duchie of Myllan against all men, with particular mention to preferue the authoritie of Lodowyke: to entertaine during the warre within the citie of Ast belonging to the Duke of Orleance, two hundreth launces to giue succours to the necessities of that Duchie. Lastly, he promised either at that time or soone after, by a writing subsigned with his owne hand, that hauing once conquered the realme of Naples, he should giue to Lodowyke the principallitie of Tarente.

Great promises slenderly performed.

But lets looke somewhat into the variation of times and things of the world: Albeit Francis Sforce, rather to Lodowyke, a Prince of rare wisedome and valour, was a professed enemy to those of Aragan, for the many displeasures he had receiued of Alphonso, Ferdinands father: and an ancient friend to the house of Aniow: yet this was his moderation in the actions concerning those two families, that in the yeare 1457. when Iohn sonne of Rene, invaded the kingdome of Naples, he ministred succours to Ferdinand, with such a wonderfull diligence and readinesse, that the victorie was acknowledged to happen wholly by his helpe: he was stirred to this for no other reason, then that he saw it was too perillous for his Duchie of Myllan, that the french his neare neighbours, should make themselves Lords ouer so mighty an estate. The same reason induced Philip Maria Viscount (abandoning them of Aniow, to whom he had alwaies before borne fauor) to deliuer Alphonso his enemy, who taken of the *Geneuoy*s in a battell at sea neare to Caiette, was brought to him prisoner to Myllan, with all the Nobilitie of his realmes: on the other side, Lewys the xj. father to Charles, being often times perswaded by many, and not with light occasions, to harken to the things of Naples, and being withall with great instance, called by the *Geneuoy*s to be Lord ouer their countries, as Charles his father had bene afore him: did alwayes refuse to intangle himselfe with the doings of Italy, as matters full of expenses & difficulties, and in the end hurtfull to the Realme of France. But now the opinions of men being chaunged, but perhaps not changed the reason of things, we see how Lodowyke calls the french ouer the mountaines, not fearing by so mightie a king (if Naples should fall into his hands) that daunger which his father no lesse valiant in armes then he, would haue feared, if but a little Earle of Prouence had conquered it. And on the other side, we see Charles now raigning inflamed with a desire to make warre in Italy, preferring the rashnesse of men of buie place and vnexperienced, afore the counsell of his father: A Prince of singular wisdom, temperance, and forecast. It hapneth too often, that new Princes haue new counsels, and of new counsels commonly resort new effects, euen such as in a ship, when a raw man is put to the helme, the course must needs alter.

colour of great

It is not vnlike that Lodowyke was drawen to so great a deliberation by Hercules de Este Duke of Ferrara, his father in law, who, nourishing a vehement appetite to recouer Polesina de Regnigne, a countrey confining and importing much the sewertie of Ferrara, which the Venetians had taken from him in the warres ten yeares past, foresaw that the only meane to recouer it, was to set all Italy in trouble, and innouate the states with most great emotions. Besides this, many beleueed, that albeit in Hercules appeared a disguised apparance & will to wish well to his sonne in law, yet in secret he followed him with an extreme hatred, for that in the same warre all the residue of Italy, which had taken armes for him, being farre more mightie then the Venetians, Lodowyke gouerning then the state of Myllan, and regarding his proper respects & particular interests, constrayned the others to make peace, with condition that Polesina should remaine to the Venetians: And therefore Hercules hauing no meanes to reuenge so great an iniurie by armes & warre, sought to execute his long smothered malice, by giuing him a daungerous counsell: such are the operations of malice, working in minds mighty, who seeldome hold it any breach of iustice to be reuenged of him that offereth the first iniurie.

*The thoughts of Ferdinand
ples.*

But now Italy being possessed with a brute of those things which were in practise on the other side the mountaines, and whose first authors at the beginning were vncertaine, many thoughts & discourses appeared in the vnderstandings of men: to many, waighing with the power & strength of the french king, and the readines of that Nation to new broyles & innouations, the present diuisions and factions of the Italians, it seemed a businesse of great quality & importance: others, interpreting the age & greenesse of the king, & iudging much of the negligence naturall to that nation, and lastly, looking into the impediments which great enterprises haue, construed all not to a counsell well grounded, but to a hot and vnbridled affection of youth, which after it had a litle throwne out his fume and fire, would easily vanish & dissolue. Ferdinand himselfe (against whom all this busines was conspired) shewed little appearance of feare, saying, it was an enterprife intrangled with many difficulties, for that if they made their inuasion by sea, they should finde him furnished with a plentifull nauie, armed able to giue him battell in the plaine sea, his ports being furnished, and his forts well manned & victualed: neither was there any baron in the realme able to receiue them, as had bene done afore to John of Anjou, by the Prince of Bossane, & other great ones of the land. And touching their expedition by land, it was full of incommodities, suspicious to many, and a painefull march farre off, for that their way lying all along the length of Italy, the residue of the Princes could not be without their particular feares, and perhaps Lodowyke Sforce more then the others, notwithstanding he made shew of the contrary, seeming as though a common perill brought interest to euery particular: for that the proximitie and neighbourhood of Myllan with France, gaue vnto the king a greater oportunitie, (but in truelikelihood) a greater desire to possesse & occupie that Duchie. And seeing the yong & true Duke of Myllan, was of neere kinned to the king, Lodowyke could not other waies assure himself, but that the king caried an intention to deliuer him from his oppression, hauing not many yeares before protested openly, that he would not endure that John Galeas his cosin should be so vnworthily restrained & kept vnder: That the state of them of Aragon, stood not vpon such termes & conditions, as the hope of their weaknesse might induce the courage of the french to make inuasions vpon the, for that they were plentifully furnished with many nùbers of valiant men at armes, great troups of horses of seruice, many stores of munitions & artilleries, & all other necessary things for the warre, together with so rich a mynt of money, that it sufficed against all wants, prouisions & fortunes: that besides many honorable Captaines trained and experienced, he had for the conduct of his armies, his eldest sonne, Duke of Calabria, a leader of great renowne, & no lesse vertue, growen into a mind resolute, a coucell staied & well aduised, & an assured experience, by following all the wars in Italy, for many yeres before.

To these forces he added the powers of his parents and allies, of whose readie aide and assistance he nothing doubted, hauing speciall expectation to receiue plentifull succours from the King of Spaine his cosin, and brother to his wife, not onely in respect of the double knot of parentage, but also for that in good pollicie it stood him vpon, to hold for suspected the neighbourhood of the French men to Sicile.

This was the glorious humor of Ferdinand, bringing forth in publicke many brags touching his owne power and greatnesse, and to the contempt and lessening of the forces and meanes of his aduersaries. These be properties oftentimes familiar with Princes, to whom there can not be a more sensible and apparant token of their aduersitie or ruine, then when they esteeme themselves more then they are, and make their enemies lesse then they find them.

But Ferdinand, as he was a Prince of singular wisdom and well assured experience, so, in himselfe he found his mind tormented with many very grievous thoughts beholding with a fresh memorie, the troubles he had receiued of the french Nation in the beginning of his raigne: he debated deeply, that he should haue to doe with enemies warlike and mighty, for their troupes of horsemen farre about him: in footmen infinite, in ensignes well appointed, trayned, and disciplined: for prouisions at sea, nothing wanting to an armie royall: for artilleries, plentifull, sundrie, and terrible: for money, his mynes and myntings furnished about all wants that could happen: And of men, infinite in multitudes, resolute in minds, for seruice apt, of faith assured, of wils tractable, for commaundement obedient, and lastly, bearing all one common desire to commit their liues to any daunger for the glory and greatnesse of their naturall king. But of the contrarie, touching himselfe, all things were suspected to him, his Realme being full of hatred against the name of the Aragons, or at least of no litle inclination to commotion, and the most part of the residue, of an ordinary desire to haue haue new kings, wherein fortune may be of more power then faith: his strength was mightier in opinion, then in true forces: his treasure laide vp and reserved, not sufficient to carry the necessarie expenses for his defence, since all things by the warre being turned into rebellion and tumults, his reuenues would conuert to nothing in a moment: he saw that in Italy he had many enemies, and with none any friendship firme or well assured, hauing at some times bene grievous to all, either by armes, or other violent meanes. And for Spaine, according to the examples past, and conditions of the same realme, he had no expectation of other succours for his perils, then large promises, with a great name of operations, but very slender and slow effects. Lastly, his feares were augmented by the vnfortunate predictions that went of his house, come to his knowledge at sundry times, partly by auncient writings found out of new, partly by the interpretations and words of men, for the most part vncertaine of the present, and yet will referre certainly to things to come: those be things that in prosperitie we belecue little, and in aduersitie too much, specially if there arise any apparance.

The king of Naples wandring in these considerations, & his feares being greater without comparison then his hopes, he saw there were no better remedies against so great dangers, then either with all speed possible, to remoue by some agreement, such thoughts from the french kings mind, or at least to take from him part of the foundations which stirred him to the warre.

And therefore hauing sent Embassadors into France, to treat of a marriage betweene the king of Scots, and Charlot daughter of Dom Federicke his second sonne, the disposition of which marriage, was gouerned by the french king: for that the young Lady was nourished in his Court, and borne of a sifter of the mother of King Charles: he dispatched new commissions for the matters present and running: he ioyned with them in deputation and assistance, Camille Pandon, hauing bene vsed in negotiation for him there before, the better to labour priuately, such as were chiefeft guiders of the kings counsels, and others bearing inclination to profit, promises, and corrupt offers: and if they could not by other meanes appease or remoue the kings intention to the warre, then to offer him conditions of tribute, and other submissions: and so, if it were possible, to obteine peace. Besides this, he applyed not only all his thoughts, diligence, and authority to compose the difference of the castles bought by Virgimo, (to whose intractabilitie and obstinacie, he referred the chiefe occasion of all these disorders) but also he studied to giue a new life to the practices of parentage, commoned vpon before betweene the Pope and him. But about all others, his deepest care and thought was to appease and assure Lodowyke Sforce (first author and mouer of all the mischief) perswading himselfe, that feare, more then other occasion, ledde him to so

daungerous a counsell. And therefore (according to the necessities that followed him) preferring his particular sewertie, afore the naturall respect and interest of his Neece, or the safetie of the sonne borne of her: he offered by many embassages, to referre himselfe wholly to his will touching the things of Iohn Galeas, and the Duchie of Myllan: In which offers more generall then honorable, he had no regard to the aduise of his sonne Alphonso, who to amaze, confuse, and threaten Lodowyke, iudged it the readiest meane to make him giue ouer those new counsels: wherein albeith he might take courage of the naturall fearefulnesse of Lodowyke, yet we often see, that no lesse easily is the timorous man carried by despaire into deliberations headlong and hurtfull, then the rash man, by credulitie, furie, and want of consideration, runnes into enterprises, that bring forth daunger, dishonour, and shame.

The Pope doth
tage.

At last were appeased the controuersies of the castles, after many difficulties proceeding more of Virginio then of the Pope, to the conclusion of which composition, came Dom Federike, sent to Rome by his father for that effect. The accord ranne, that they should remaine in the possession and right of Virginio, repaying to the Pope equall proportion of money, which he had giuen at first to Francisquin Cibo: together with this, was knit vp the mariage of the Ladie Sances bastard daughter to Alphonso, with Dom Geffray youngest sonne to the Pope, (both the one and other, by reason of their greene age vnable to consummate or accomplish the mariage.) These were the conditions: That Dom Geffray should go to remaine at Naples after a few moneths: that he should receiue in dowrie, and respect of the mariage, the principallitie of Squillaco, valued at ten thousand duckets in yearely reuenew, and that Ferdinand should giue to him an estate of an hundredth men at armes. This confirmed the opinion of many, that all that the Pope solicited in France, bare no other meaning, then by feare to draw them of Aragon to these conuentions: this was one argument to approue their coniectures, that Ferdinand laboured to make a confederation with him for their common defence: but the Pope objected so many difficulties, that there was no other thing obtained of him, then a very secret promise by writing to defend the kingdome of Naples, so that Ferdinand would equally promise to protect the estate of the Church.

of Lod. Sforce.

These things dispatched, the companies of men at armes, which the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan had sent to the Pope for his succours, retýred with licence and fauour out of the Church dominions: Ferdinand also beganne now with no lesse hope of happy successe to treat with Lodowyke Sforce, who with a wonderfull subletie and art, shewed himselfe some times ill contented with the inclination of the french king to the matters of Italy, and sometimes excused and iustified himselfe vpon his necessitie, for that by reason of his chiefe for Genes, and the auncient confederation with the house of France: he was constrained to tender the desires and requests made to him (as he said) by the same king. But sometimes he promised to Ferdinand in publike, and some times to the Pope and P. de Medicis apart and seuerally, to do all he could to moderate the kings desire, assaying to lull them a sleepe in this hope, to the end they conspired or dressed nothing against him, before the affayres of France were well proceeded and established: wherein they were the more easie to beleue him, by how much they iudged the resolution to bring the french king into Italy, so ill for his owne sewertie, that in consideration of his particular perill, and the common interest of Italy, they supposed he would vtterly disclaime and shake it off. All this sommer past in this nature of doings, Lodowyke working vnder such disguised formes and manners, that without giuing any suspition to the french king, neither Ferdinand, the Pope, nor the Florentins dispaired of his promises, nor yet altogether trusted him.

Preparations in France for the warres of Italy.

But in this meane while, were layd in France with no small studie, the foundations of the warre, and expedition to come, whereunto (contrary to the counsels of most of the greatest) inclined more and more the affection of the king, who, to be more at libertie, accorded the differences he had with Ferdinand and Isabell King and Queene of Spaine, Princes in those times of great reputation and name for gouernement and wisdom, both for that they had drawen their Realmes out of great troubles into a settled tranquillitie; and also, had recouered to Christianitie, with a warre of ten yeares continuance, the kingdome of Granado, vsurped by the *Moor*es of Affrick for almost viij. hundredth yeares: it was expressed in this capitulation (solemnely iustified by publike oath of both parts in the Church) that in Ferdinand nor Isabell (for Spaine was gouerned vnder their comon name) should be no action of aide to the Aragons directly nor indirectly: no contract of any new affinitie or alliance: nor that in no sort they should oppose against King Charles for the defence, defence of the realme of Naples. The king, in counterchange and recompence of these, (beginning by a losse certaine, for a hope of gaine vncertaine) restored without any repayment of money, Parpignan, with all the Earldome of Rossellion, pawned many yeares before to Lewys his father, by Iohn king of Aragon, and father to Ferdinand. An exchange altogether against the will and liking of the whole Nation of France, for that that Earldome, seated at the foote of the hils Pyrennei, and consequently according to the auncient diuision, part of Gallia, gaue alwayes necessarily impediments to them of Aragon for entring into France on that side.

The king, for the same occasion, made peace with Maximilian king of Romaines, and with his sonne Phillip Archduke of Austrich, in whom was no want of occasion, either of old or new hatreds against him: but specially for that his father Lewys by the death of Charles, Duke of Burgondie and Earle of Flaunders, with many other countries conioyning, did impatronize himselfe vpon the Duchie of Burgondie, and Earldome of Artoys, with many other places which the said Duke possessed: whereof growing no small warres betwene king Lewys, and Marie the only daughter of Duke Charles, married after the death of her father, to Maximilian: there was made at last (Mary being dead, and Phillip the common sonne of Maximilian, & her succeeding to the inheritance of his mother) an accord amongst them, more by the wils of the people of Flaunders, then readines of Maximilian. The better to confirme this accord, Margaret the sister of Phillip was married to Charles sonne of Lewys, & (notwithstanding she was very young) led into France: where after she had remained many yeares, Charles refused her, & tooke to wife Anne, to whom by the death of Francis her father leauing no issue male, the Duchie of Brytaine was descended. This was a double injury to Maximilian, being at one time made frustrate the marriage of his daughter, and his owne, hauing by procuracion afore married the said Anne: And yet, for that he was not able of himselfe to sustaine the warre recontinued by occasion of this iniurie, and that the people of Flaunders (gouerning themselves by their proper counsell and authoritie, by reason of the minoritie of Phillip) would not dwell in warre with the realme of France. And seeing lastly that the king of Spaine and England had dissolved their armies, which they had leuyed against the french: he consented to the peace, by the which king Charles restored to Phillip, his sister Margaret deteyned in France till then, together with the townes of the Earldome of Artoys, reseruing to himselfe the castles, but vnder bond to render them at foure yeares end, at what time Phillip being risen to his maioritie, might in good validitie cofirme the accord past. Those townes when the peace was made by king Lewys, were acknowledged by common agreement as the proper right of the said Margaret. The generall peace thus established with all the neighbours to the realme of France, the resolution of the warre against the kingdome of Naples, was confirmed for the yeare following: in which time were prepared all prouisions necessary, continually solicited by Lodowyke Sforce: who (the thoughts of men aduancing from degree to degree) occupied his wits now not onely how to assure the gouernement to him, but lifting vp his mind to higher conceits, he had an intention to transferre to himselfe the Duchie of Myllan, vnder the occasion of the warre against the Aragons, wherein to giue some colour of iustice to so great an iniustice, and with more firme foundations to assure his affaires against all fortunes that might happen: he married Blanche Mary sister to Iohn Galeas, & his Neece to Maximilian, newly aspired to the Empire of Rome, by the death of Federike his father: to him he promised in dowrie to be paide within a certaine time iiii. hundred thousand duckets of ready money, with iewels & other ornaments to the value of xl. thousand duckets: and of the other part, Maximilian thirsting more after money, then affinitie by his marriage, bound him selfe to indue Lodowyke, (to the preiudice of Iohn Galeas his new brother in law) with the inuestiture of the Duchie of Myllan, for him, his children, and offspring, as though that estate had remained without lawfull Dukes, euer since the death of Phillip Maria Viscount. At the latter payment of the money, he promised to giue him all the priuiledges and prerogatiues accomplished in most ample forme.

Marriage of Blanche Mary Sforce with the Emperour Maximilian.

The Viscountes, gentlemen of Myllan, during the bloudie factions in Italy, betwene the Gebelins and Guelfes, and after the Guelfes were suppressed: of principall men of one part of Myllan, became Lords and absolute maisters of the whole citie, (such fruits for the most are bred by ciuill discordes.) And in this greatnesse after they had continued many yeares, they sought (according to the common aduancement of tyrannies, the better to disguise their vsurpation with a shew of right) to strengthen first colours lawfull, and after to set out their fortune, with most ample titles:

therefore after they had first obtained of the Emperours (of whom Italy beganne to know rather the name, then their power) the title of Captaines, and then Vicaires of the Empire: In the ende John Galeas (who for that his father in law John king of France had giuen him the Earledome of Verus, called himselfe Earle of Verus) obteyned of Vincislao king of Romaines for him and his issues males, the dignitie of Duke of Myllan, in which succeeded him the one after the other John Maria and Philip Maria his sonnes. But the line masculine being determined by the death of Philip, albeit, by his testament he had instituted as his heire Alphonso king of Aragon and Naples, partly for the recompence of the amitie he shewed at his deliuey, but more, for that the Duchie of Myllan defended by so mighty a Prince, should not fall into the subiection of the Venicians, aspiring manifestly to it. Yet Francis Sforce, at that time a Captaine valiant & equally scene in affaires of peace and warre, being assisted with many occasions then occurrent, and more esteeming to reigne then to keepe faith: held with armes the said Duchie as appertaining to Blanche Maria his wife, the bastard daughter of Philip. And albeit it was supposed, that soone after with a small portion of money, he might haue purchased of the Emperour Federicke the inuestiture of that state: yet trusting he was able to keepe it by the same meanes wherewith he had wonne it, he made small reckoning of that office in the Emperour. Thus without inuestiture continued Galeas his sonne, and John Galeas his later sonne: by reason wherof Lodowyke bearing himselfe wickedly at one time against his Nephew liuing, and doing wrong to the memorie of his father and brother deceased, maintained that not one of them were lawfull Dukes of Myllan, procuring himselfe, as of an estate diuolued to the Empire, to be inuested by Maximilian, and by that reason bare the title not of the seuenth, but of the fourth Duke of Myllan, which thinges (so long as his Nephew liued) were not suffered to come but to a few mens knowledge. Besides, following the example of Cyrus younger brother to Artaxerxes king of Persia, (which also he confirmed with the authoritie of many lawyers) he aduouched that he was before his brother, not in yeares and age, but for that he was the first borne after their father became Duke of Myllan. This reason together with the first was bestowed amongst the imperiall priuiledges, wherein to cloke with a vaine couer the ambition of Lodowyke, there was also written in letters separate, that it was not the custome of the holy Empire, to consent or passe any estate to any that afore had holden it vnder the authoritie of another, for which cause Maximilian had kept no reckoning of the petitions made by Lodowyke to obtaine the inuestiture for John Galeas, hauing afore acknowledged the same Duchie of the people of Myllan.

Ridiculous
med by force.

In this marriage made by Lodowyke of his Neece with Maximilian, Ferdinand tooke encrease of hope, that Lodowyke would estrange himselfe from the amitie of the french King: these were the reasons and arguments of his hope: for that he had knit himselfe with Maximilian enemie and Corriuall to the French king by many occasions: the departing with so great a summe of money might induce the kings suspition against him: And lastly, this new coniunction ministring occasion of courage and heart, he supposed he would not be fearefull to diuide himselfe from the french doings. This hope Lodowyke nourished with great cunning, and with the vaile of the same so blinded all others, that at one time he communicated with Ferdinand and the other Potentates in Italy, and withall entertayned the king of Romaines, and yet kept the french from iealousie. Ferdinand also iudged that it could not but be displeasing and intollerable to the Senate of Venice (to whom he had sent Embassadors) that a Prince so mighty aboute them should enter the hart of Italy, wherein they had the chiefest place, opinion, and authoritie: besides, he fed much of the hopes in the king and Queene of Spain, who had promised him great succours, if neither by perswasions, offers, nor authoritie, he could not breake the enterprise. On the other side, the French king hauing taken away all impediments, on that side the mountes beganne to practise to remoue such difficulties as might fall to his hinderance on the other side the hills: In that action he sent Peron de la bache, a man not ignorant in the affaires of Italy, by the experience he had there vnder John of Aniow: who after he had made knowen to the Pope, the Senate of Venice, and the Florentines, the resolution of his king to recouer the kingdome of Naples, he made petition to them all to enter societie, fellowship, and comunitie with him: But hee reaped no other frute then frayle hopes and generall aunsweres, for that the warre being not to be executed till the next yeare, euery one refused to discouer so long before, his intention. In like sort, the king required of the Embassadors of Florence, (sent to him a litle before by Ferdinands consent to excuse them

scélus of the imputation that they inclined to the partie of the Aragons) to haue passage and victuals for his armie in their iurisdiccions at reasonable rate, & that to accompany him to the kingdom of Naples, they would furnish him with an hundred men at armes, which he said he required as a signe that the common weale of Florence stood with him in amitie: Albeit they answered him with many reasons & declarations, that they could not in that sort protest without great perill vntill his armie were past into Italy: And albeit they affirmed, that he might be well assured that in all accidents and fortunes, that citie should not faile to minister to him, all those conuenient effects, of office, obseruance, & deuotion, which of long time they had borne to the crowne of France: yet they were constrained according to the french importunities to promise all those things, otherwaies they were threatned to suffer priuation of that great mart and traffike of marchandize which the Florentine nation had in that realme: it was knowen after, that these compulsionns were enforced by Lodowyke, at that time the principall disposer of all the french practises with the Italians.

Peter de Medicis laboured much to perswade Ferdinand, that those demaunds imported so little the substance of the warre, that it would be more for his profit if the common weale and he continued amitie with the french king, hauing by that meane good way and oportunitie to make some composition, then in refusing those small demaunds, to declare them selues his enemies, and so suffer no possibilitie to doe good to him: he alleaged with all the generall complaints and hatreds which he should heape vppon himselfe, if the traffike of Florence were restrained in France; or that the entercourse there, so necessary to the vpholding of the citie, should suspend and perhaps come in time to loose his libertie and practise: he told him it was conuenient in good faith and meaning (the principall ground of confederations) that euery confederate should suffer patiently some incommoditie, to the end the other runne not into more greater harmes: But Ferdinand, who considered how much of his reputation and sewertie would diminish, if the Florentines were deuided from him: was not satisfied with these reasons, but complained grievously, that the faith and constancie of Peter beganne so soone not to aunswere his owne promise and the expectation he had conceiued of him: by reason whereof, Peter resolutely disposed about all things to continue in amitie with them of Aragon, vsed many meanes to suspend and deferre the aunswere importunately demanded by the french, referring them in the end to vnderstand the full wils and intentions of the common weale by new Embassadors.

Good reasons
alleaged by P.
Medicis, and by him not excused.

About the end of this yeare, the alliance made betweene the Pope and Ferdinand, beganne to wauer and shake, either for that the Pope in obiecing new difficulties, aspired to obtaine of him greater things then he had: or else that he perswaded himselfe to induce him by this meane to bring againe to his obedience the Cardinall S. P. ad vincula, whom (offering first for his securitie the faith of the colledge of Cardinals, of Ferdinand and of the Venetians) he desired much to see returned to Rome: he held his absence much suspected, for the importance of the rocke of Ostia, holding in his hands about Rome, Roncillon and Grotasferare, by the fauours, opinion and authoritie which he had in the court: But chiefly he was iealous ouer him, for that naturally he was desirous of innouation, and obstinate to hazard rather all daunger, then to be cut off from one point of his counsels and purposes. Ferdinand excused himselfe much, that he had no power to apply the Cardinall thereunto, whose suspition was so great, that all sewertie seemed to him lesse then the perill: he complained to the Pope of his hard fortune, that on him alwaies was layd the imputation of things which in truth proceeded from others: he was fory that the Pope had beleued, that by his motion and by his money, Virginio had bought the castles, being indeed bought without his iuitie or meddling. In deede he had disposed Virginio to the composition, and for that effect had furnished him with the money which was giuen in repayment and recompence of the castles. The Pope receiued not these excuses, but with hard and bitter words complained of Ferdinand, and so gaue shew that there could be laid no firme ground of their reconciliation.

With such a disposition of minds and confusion of things so apparantly drawing to new troubles, beganne the yeare 1494. (I interpret the yeare according to the vse of Rome.) A yeare very vnhappy for Italy, and in deede the first of the vnfortunate and miserable yeares, for that in it was made open the way to infinite and horrible calamities, whereof we may well say, a great part of the world by many accidents, hath tasted euer since. In the beginning of this yeare, King Charles refusing to heare speake of any agreement with Ferdinand, enioyned his Embassadors as messengers of a kingemie, to depart with speede out of the realme of France: And almost in the same concurrence of time, the said Ferdinand dyed suddenly of an appoplexy being more troubled with cares and perplexities of mind, then loaden with yeares, or weakened with old age: he was a Prince of singular wisdom and industrie, with the which (accompanied with happy fortune) he kept himselfe in the kingdom newly obteyned by his father against many difficulties appearing euen in the beginning of his raigne, and brought to it much more amplitude and greatness, then was done vnder any other king perhaps long before: A good king, if he had continued to raigne, in the same manner he beganne: But either with the variation of times, or chaunge of manners, because he knew not (with most Princes now adaies) how to resist the fury of domination and rule, or perhaps according to the iudgement of euery one, his nature and inclination beginning now to disclose, which he had couered afore with great cunning: he was esteemed a man of little faith, and of such violent and cruell moodes, that euen by his owne followers he was iudged worthy of the name of inhumanitie. The opinion was, that the death of Ferdinand hapned very inconuenient for the common affaytes, for that, where he would haue proued all remedies to hinder the descending of the french men, it was not now to be doubted, but it would be more hard to make Lodowyke assure himselfe of the haughtie and immoderate nature of Alphonso, then it was to dispose him to renew amitie with Ferdinand, in whom was for the most part expressed a ready inclination (the better to auoide all quarrels with the state of Myllan) to yeeld and condescend to his will: And amongst other things, it is manifest that when Isabell Alphonsoes daughter was brought to Iohn Galeas her husband, Lodowyke at the first sight suffred himselfe to slide into so great affection towards her, that he desired her of Alphonso for his wife, and to that end (according to the vniuersall opinion of Italy) he did so much by magicke and enchauntments, that Iohn Galeas for many monethes was made vnable to the action of marriage. Ferdinand was not intractable to this mariage, but Alphonso so refused and resisted it, that Lodowyke making no hope of it, tooke an other wife, by whom hauing children, he turned all his studies and thoughts to transerre to them the Duchie of Myllan: some suppose and write, that Ferdinand being determined (for the auoyding of the present warre) to suffer all indignities and incommodities: had an intention, as soone as the calmenesse of the time would suffer, to go by sea to Genes, and from thence by land to Myllan, to satisfie Lodowyke in all his desires, and to bring againe to Naples his Neece, hoping that not onely with effects, but also with this publike confession, by the which he acknowledged to hold all his estate and well doing vpon him, he should remoue his mind from the warre, or at least somewhat moderate his conspiring intentions, the rather for that it was seene to all men of obseruation, with what wonderfull ambition and desire, he aspired to be noted the only arbitrator & oracle of all Italy. Alphonso immediatly after the death of his father, dispatched foure Embassadors to the Pope, who albeit shewed manifest signes that he was returned to the first inclination of amitie with the french, and had at the same time by bull subsigned by the colledge of the Cardinals, promised at the french Kings request, the estate of Cardinall to the Bishop of S. Malo, and retayned in common with the Duke of Myllan Prosper Colonne whom the King afore had taken to his pay, together with other Captaines and leaders of men of warre: yet he made no great difficultie to accord, in regard of the profitable conditions offered by Alphonso, who desired much to be assured of him, and to bind him to his protection and defence: they made these open conuentions, that there should be betweene them a confederation for the defence of their estates, with equall leuies of men by both: That the Pope should conferre vnto Alphonso, the inuestiture of the kingdom, with diminution of tribute obteyned by Ferdinand of other Popes for his life only: that the Pope should send a Legat to crowne him: That he should create Cardinall Lodowyke sonne of Henry, bastard brother to Alphonso, who afterwards was called Cardinall of Aragon: That king Alphonso should pay immediatly to the Pope thirtie thousand duckets: That he should indue the Duke of Candia with estates within the realme of xij. thousand duckets: reuenew yearly, together with the first of the seauen principall offices that should be voyd: That he should entertaine him so long as the Pope liued in his pay with three hundred men at armes, with the which he should be bound to serue the one and the other equally and indifferently: that he should giue to Dom Geffray, (who for the pawne of his fathers faith, was now to goe to his father in law) the estate of Promotory and one of the seuen offices, ouer and besides the promises of the first contract: That he should bestow the reuenew of benefices in the Realme vpon Cesar Borgia

Borgia the Popes sonne, who a little before was created Cardinall by his father, wherein, to auoid impediments of being a bastard (to whom it hath not beene accustomed to graunt such dignities) he made prooffe by suborned testimonies, that he was the sonne lawfull of another. Besides all this, Virginio Vrsin (who by the kings sending for, came to this capitulation) promised that the King should aide the Pope to recouer the rocke of Ostia, if the Cardinall S. P. ad vincula refused to come to Rome. This promise King Alphonso affirmed without his consent or priuie, & well saw that in so dangerous seasons, it would bring no litle prejudice to him to be depriued of the Cardinall, whose authority was not small ouer the towne of Genes, which he determined to surpris by the setting on of the Cardinall. And because amid so great troubles and emotions, there might perhaps be treaties of counsels, or other matters preiudiciall to the sea apostolike, he did what he could to vnite him with the Pope, who not satisfied with any condition, if the Cardinall returned not to Rome, and the Cardinall being most obstinate to hazard his life vnder the faith of those Cathus, as he termed them, the diligence of Alphonso was in vaine, and his desire of no effect: for after the Cardinall with many dissembled and flourishing shewes, had giuen almost assured hope to accept the conditions: he stole away by night from Ostia in a brigantine well appointed, and at a time when was least reason to doubt any such euasion, leauing the rocke armed with sufficient garrison: And reapposing certaine dayes at Sauone, and spending some little time at Anigmon, (of which citie he was Legat) he went lastly to Lyons, where king Charles was come a little before, to prepare with better oportunitie and reputation the prouisions of the warre which he published he would execute in person: he was receiued of the king with great ioy and honour, and immediatly ioyned himselfe to those that studied to trouble Italy.

In this meane while Alphonso, more by feare then proper inclination, forgot not to continue with Lodowyke Sforce, that which had beene begunne by his father, offering him the same satisfactions: But Lodowyke, to whom nothing was more familiar, then to dissemble, deuised to entertaine him with diuerse hopes, but with demonstrations that he was constrained to proccede in such exact order and consideration, least the warre, determined against others, tooke not his beginning against him, he left not for all this to sollicite and vrge the preparations in France, wherein to expresse the deuotion of his mind with better effect, and to resolute all particularities occurrent in that expedition, and lastly, least the execution of all things determined should suffer suspence or haue slow action: he sent thither (colouring it with a brute of the Kings pleasure) Galeaz of S. Seuerin husband to one of his bastard daughters, and in whom he reapposed great confidence and fauours. According to the counsels of Lodowyke, king Charles sends to the Pope foure Embassadors, with charge that in passing by Florence, they should make instance for the declaration of that common weale. The Embassadors were Eberard Daubigny a Scottish Captaine of Nation, the generall of France, the President of the parliament of Provence, and the same Peron la Bache, that had bene with them the yeare before. They according to their instructions (set downe chiefly at Myllan) recounted in both the one and other places, the rights which the french king (as succellor to the house of Anjou, and for want of issue in Charles the first) pretended to the realme of Naples, together with his royall determination to passe that yeare into Italy in person, not to intrude into any thing that belonged to another, but to reobtaine that which iustly was his owne: And to giue his voyage a more pawisible passage in the minds of men, they said his minde and meanings were not so much fixed vpon the conquest of Naples, as that afterwards he would turne his forces against the Turkes, for the seruice of Iesus Christ, and glory of his name. They declared to the Florentines, how much their king assured himselfe of that citie, hauing bene reedified by Charlemaine, and fauoured alwayes of the kings his predecessors, and lately of king Leuyr his father, in the warres vniustly managed against them by Pope Sixtus, by Ferdinand last dead, and Alphonso now raigning. They willed them to looke into the great profits comming to their Nation by traffike and entercourse in the realme of France, where they were fauoured with familiaritie and offices, as if they were naturall of the region it selfe. And with that example they might hope to haue in the kingdome of Naples, (if he became Lord of it) the selfe same libertie of trade, serwertie and benefite, where, of them of Aragon they neuer receiued other things, then damage, daungers, and displeasures. They recommended to their good counsels, the considerations of these things, and to protest by some token, that they would ioyne with him in this enterprize, if they were restrained by some iust impediment, reason or excuse, at least that they would graunt libertie of passage to his armie through their territories, and refreshing, and victuals for his money. They debated these things with the common weale and generall state, but they recommended particularly to P. de Medicis, the respect of many good-turnes and honors done by Lewys the xj. to his father and auncesors: how he in very iealous and daungerous seasons, had made many demonstrations for the preservation of their goodnesse, and in signe of amitie, had honoured them with the Scotchions and armes proper to the house of France: where, Ferdinand not satisfied to persecute them with open and violent warre, did also with a mind sworne to their ruine, take part with the ciuill conspiracies, wherein Julian his vnckle was killed, and Laurence his father sore hurt. The Embassadors went out of Florence without resolution, and being at Rome, they preferred to the Popes remembrance, the auncient merits and perpetuall deuotion of the crowne of France to the sea apostolike, whereof were autentike testimonies, all recordes both auncient and present, and of the contrary, they insinuated the ordinary contumacie and disobedience of them of Aragon, and referred the prooffe to the view and construction of their actions past. Then they demanded that the realme of Naples might be inuested in the person of their king, as iustly appertaining to him. They allured him with many hopes, and made many offers, so that he would be fauourable to the enterprise, which their king had taken vpon him, as much by his perswasions and authority, as for other occasions. To this demand the Pope answered that the inuestiture of that realme, hauing beene graunted by so many his predecessors, to three kings of the house of Aragon successiuelly, (for in the inuestiture graunted to Ferdinand, Alphonso was comprehended by name) it was not conuenient to giue it to king Charles, afore it was declared by forme of iustice, that he had good right, whereunto the inuestiture graunted to Alphonso was not preiudiciall, for that for such consideration it contained expresse mention, that it was ment without the preiudice of any person: he told them that the realme of Naples did directly belong to the sea apostolike, whose authoritie he knew was farre from the kings will to violate, and no lesse contrary to the intentions of his auncesors, who had beene alwaies the principall defenders of the same: But if he should doe any violent action vpon Naples, it could not be without manifest intrusion and transgression of the holy sea, and bring dishonor to the reputation and merits of his elders: it would better become his dignitie and vertues, to seeke to iustifie his pretence of right by course of iustice and moderate equitie, wherein as Lord, Patrone, and onely iudge of such a cause, he offered him selfe readie to administer to him: And that a Christian king ought not to demand more of a Pope, whose office was to restraine and forbid, and not to entertaine and nourish wars betweene Princes christened: And though he should so farre incline to the kings will, yet he shewed many difficulties and daungers, both by the neighbourhood of Alphonso and the Florentynes, whose vnitie all Tuscanes followed, and also for the consanguinitie and aliance of so many Barons, holding of the king of Naples, whose estates stretched euen to the gates of Rome. Notwithstanding all this, he enforced himselfe, not to cut off their hope altogether, albeit he bare priuately this settled resolution, not to depart from the confederation made with Alphonso. At Florence the inclination was great and generall to the house of France, for the liberall mart and traffike which that state had with the french: for an old opinion (but vntrue) that Charlemaine was the reedifier of their citie destroyed by Toursla king of Goths: for the auncient coniunction and amitie, which their auncesors the Guelfes haue had long time with Charles the first, king of Naples, and with many of his line protectors of the faction of Guelfes in Italy. And lastly, for the memory of the warres, which the old Alphonso, and after him Ferdinand in the person of his sonne, had areared against that citie. By the reason, recordation, and memorie of these things, the communaltie and multitude, cried to consent to free conduct and passage, desiring no lesse the best authorised and wise citizens in that common weale, to whom it seemed a great partialitie and ouersight to pull vpon the countrey of Florence, (for the controuersies of another) so present and daungerous a warre: they held it no pollicie, to oppose themselves against so mighty an army, managed in the person of a king of France, descending into Italy with the fauour of the state of Myllan, and no resistance of the gouernement of Venice, though they publish no manifest consent: this counsell they confirmed with the authoritie of Cosmo de Medicis (esteemed in his time one of the wisest in Italy) who, in the warres betweene Iohn of Aniow and Ferdinand, gaue alwaies this counsell, that the citie of Florence should not obiect it selfe against Iohn: notwithstanding the Pope and Duke of Myllan were ioyned with Ferdinand. They remembered withall, the example of Laurence father to Peter, who was of the same aduise vpon euery brute of the returne of them of Aniour: yea so much was he amazed with the power of the french, since the same king obtayned Britaine, that he would often times say, that great troubles were prepared for all Italians, if the king of Fraunce knew his owne strength. But Peter de Medicis, who measured things more by will then by wisdom, abused him selfe too much with his owne opinion, beleeuing that these emotions would rather resolute into brutes, then into effects: wherein being gouerned by some his speciall fauorits, corrupted perhaps with the presents of Alphonso, determined resolutely to continue in amitie with the Aragons, whereunto in the end, all the residue of the Citizens must condescend by reason of his greatnesse: Ambition is an vnquiet humour in man: it may be that Peter not content with the authoritie which his father had got in the common weale (and yet such, by his disposing, that though Magistrates were created, yet they determined no matters of importance without his aduise) aspired to a power more absolute, euen to the title of Prince: he did not debate with discretion the conditions of that citie, who, at that time being populous in multitudes, and mightie in riches, and nourished by many ages with an apparance of a common weale, the principall citizens being accustomed to participate in the gouernment, rather in forme of companions then subiects, would hardly endure so great and suddaine mutation: And therefore, Peter knowing that to the holding vp of his ambition must be ioyned foundations extraordinary: and the better to haue a mighty pillar to support his new principallitie, he restrained himselfe immoderately to the Aragons, determining in their course to communicate with their fortunes. This perhaps was furthered by this accident: not many dayes before the Embassadors of the french arriued at Florence, there came to light certaine practises, which Laurence and Iohn de Medicis, young men, rich, and neare in blood to Peter, and lately become his enemies vpon certaine light occasions of youth, conspired with Lodowyke Sforce, and by him with the french king, directly against the greatnesse of Peter: But being arrested by the Magistrates, they were with light punishment returned to their houses in the countrey, for that the temperance of the Magistrates, preuailing with Peter not without some difficulties, induced him not to suffer the lawes to execute any extreme action vpon his kined and blood: But receiuing warning by this accident, that Lodowyke Sforce thirsted after his ruine, he esteemed it so much the more needfull to remaine still in his first purpose. At last the Embassadors were answered, but much to their discontentment, and more contrary to their desire: in place of the conclusion they hoped for, they were told with words reuerent and respectiue, with what naturall deuotion the people of Florence, honoured the house of France, together with their common desire to satisfie so great a king: on the other side, they made declaration of their impediments, as that there could be nothing more vnworthy of Princes and common weales, then not to keepe faith promised, which vlesse they should apparantly defile and breake, they could not now satisfie his demaunds; and content the time together: They saide, as yet was not ended the confederation, which by the authoritie of king Lewys his father was made with Ferdinand, with couenant, that after his death it should stretch to Alphonso: wherein they were bound by speciall condition, not onely to defend the realme of Naples, but also to giue no passage thorough their countries to any that went about to inuade it: Lastly, that it brought no small griefe to them, that there was such difference betweene their desires and wils, and that they had no power to make other resolutions, then such as must either make the king displeased, or bring great preiudice to their whole estate: Onely they hoped that the king being wise and iust, would interpret them according to their good wils, and referre to those reasonable impediments that which they could not promise.

The king made angry with this aunswere, commaunded immediatly the Embassadors of Florence to depart out of France, and following the counsell of Lodowyke Sforce, he banished out of Lyons, not the generall marchants, but onely the factors and bankers of P. de Medicis, to the end that they might iudge at Florence, that he acknowledged this iniurie particularly vpon Peter, and not vpon the bodie of the state.

The other Potentates of Italy being diuided amongst themselves, some bearing fauour to the french, and some fearing calamities and extreme fortunes, the Venetians onely determined to remaine newters, and with an idle eye to behold the issue of all things, perhaps they were not much troubled that Italy should fall into garboyle, hoping that the long warres of others, would giue them oportunitie to enlarge their estate: or perhaps the opinion of their greatnesse, would not suffer them to be doubtfull of perils : And therefore not fearing that the victors could have any fortune ouer them, they iudged it a folly to make proper to them, the warres of others, and had no apparant necessitie. And yet Ferdinand ceased not to sollicite them continually, and the french king the yeare before, and euen then had sent to them Embassadors, who forgot not to declare that betweene the house of France, and that common weale, was alwaies amitie and good will, and as occasion offered, mutuall effects and offices expressed. The which disposition, the king seeking to augment and ratifie, he desired of that wise Senate counsell and fauour in this enterprise; whereunto they answered with this moderation and breuitie : that the king for himselfe was so wise and foreseeing, and enuironed with a counsell so graue and ripe, that it could not be without too much presuming to ioyne to him their opinions and counsels. They would be alwayes glad of his prosperities and good fortunes, for the obseruances which they had alwayes borne to the crowne of France : They were not a litle grieued, that they could not accompany the readinesse of their minds, with those effects they desired, for that by the suspicion wherein the Turke kept them continually, wanting neither desire nor oportunitie to vex them, necessitie compelled them to keepe alwayes with great charges, many Iles and coast townes fronting vpon him, the same being the cause that they could not make themselues parties to the warre of another. But the preparations which were made on all sides, as well by land as sea, were of farre greater importance, then either the orations of the Embassadors, or the answers made to them : for, king Charles had sent Peter d'Urfe, his great Esquire, to Genes (ouer which citie the Duke of Myllan commaunded by the aide of the faction of Adorne and I. L. de fiesco signo) to rigge vp a mightie armie of ships and gallies, causing also to be armed other vessels in the ports of Ville Franche and Marfelles. This was the cause of the brute in his court, that he determined to enter the kingdom of Naples by sea, as had done afore time Iohn Sonne of Rene against Ferdinand. In France albeit many beleeued, that what for the youth of the king, and the base condition and slender conduct of such as stirred him to this expedition, together with the want and necessitie of money, these preparations in them would dissolue and vanish into smoke: yet to satisfie the desire of the king, who by the aduise of his fauorites, had newly taken vpon him the title of king of Ierusalem and both Cypries, (then the title of the kings of Naples;) There was generall and diligent order giuen on all parts for the prouisions of the warre : as making of musters, gathering of money, remouing of men, with other industries due to such expeditions : and no counsell had, but with Galeas de S. Seuerin, who held inclosed in his mind, all the secrets and purposes of Lodowyke Sforce. On the other side, Alphonso, in whom had wanted no pollicie or diligence, to fortifie himselfe by sea and by land, (iudging now there was no more time to suffer him selfe to be mocked with the hopes of Lodowyke Sforce, and that it serued better for him to amaze and vex him, then to trouble or assure or appease him) commaunded the Embassador of Myllan to retyre out of Naples, and reuoked his that was resident at Myllan : he sequestred also, and tooke into his possession the reuenues of the Duchie of Bary, which Lodowyke had enioyed many yeares by the gift of Ferdinand. And not content with these things, which were rather demonstrations of open hatred; then wrongs or offences, he disposed all his wits, to turne from the Duke of Myllan, the citie of Genes, a matter of right great importance for the present affayres, for that by the reuolt and chaunge of that citie, would happen many meanes to trouble Lodowyke in his gouernement of Myllan, and from the french king should be taken away all oportunities to molest the realme of Naples by sea: Therefore hauing made secret pact with Cardinall Paule Fregose, afore times Duke of Genes, and still followed with many of the same family : and with Obietto de fiesquo, two principall men both for the towne and sea, together with some particulars of the Adorneys, all banished out of Genes for diuerse occasions : he determined to alay with a strong army at sea, to set them all in the towne againe (following that he was wont to say, that warres are ouercome either in preuenting the enemy, or diuerting him : he determined in like sort to go him selfe into Romagnia, with a mightie army, and to make suddaine inuasion vpon the lands of Parma, where publishing the name of Iohn Galeas, and displaying his banners, he hoped that the peoples of the Duchie of Myllan, would rise against Lodowyke : And be it that in this were found many difficulties, yet he iudged it profitable, that the warre should begin farre from his realme : he esteemed it also to be great importance for the substance of the warre, that the french men should be surprised with the winter in Lombardy : wherein hauing great experience in the warres of Italy, (whose armies attending tending the riping of grasse and forrage for the feeding of horses, were not wont to take the field afore the end of Aprill: he iudged that to eschue the sharpenesse of winter, they would be constrained to stay in a countrey of their friends till spring time: In which intermission and respite of time, he hoped that some occasion for his benefite might happen. Besides, he sent Embassadours to Constantinople, to demanda succours as in a common daunger of B. Ottoman Prince of the Turkes, for that it was resolued in the french kings intencion to passe into Greece after he had won Naples, which daunger he knew well the Turke would not despise, for that by the memory of the warres made in times past against the Infidels in Asia by the french nation, the feare which the Turkes had of their armes was not little.

Whilest these things were thus solicited on all partes, the Pope sent his men to Ostia, vnder the gouernment of Nicholas Vrsin Counte of Petillane, to whom Alphonso sent strength and succours both by sea and land: he tooke the towne without difficulty, and then began to batter the castell, which (by the meane of Fabrice Colonne, and consent of Iohn de la Roubre prefect of Rome, and brother to Cardinall S. P. ad vincula) was easily rendred to him by the castell keeper, with this condition, that the Pope neither with censures of the Church, nor temporall armes, should pursue the Cardinall nor the prefect, if they gaue him no new occasions: And it was suffered to Fabrice, in whose hands the Cardinall had left Grotta Ferrara, to continue the possession of the same with the same rights, paying to the Pope ten thousand duckats. But Lodowyke Sforce (to whom the Cardinall when he passed by Sauonne, had made knowen that which Alphonso by his meanes and counceils negociated secretly with the exiles of Genes) declared to king Charles what a great impediment that would giue to his enterprife, and therefore induced him to send to Genes two thousand Swyzers, and dispatch into Italy with speede three hundreth launces, to be ready vnder the gouernment of Monsieur D'auygnny, (who returning from Rome, staid by the kings commaundement at Myllan) both to assure Lombardie, and to passe further according to occasions and necessities. To these should be ioyned five hundreth men at armes, Italians, entertained at that time in the Kings pay vnder Iohn fr. de S. Senerin Counte of Gaiazze, Galeot Pico Counte of Myrandola, and Radolphe of Gonsague, together with five hundreth which the Duke of Myllan was bound to furnish: who not leauing his old shifts and subtelties, continued to confirme in the Pope and Peter de Medicis his inclination to the peace and surety of Italy, nourishing them with variety of hopes which were not without their apparant demonstrations.

It can not almost be, but that which men make great surety of, ingendreth some doubt, euen in the mindes of such as haue determinid to beleue the contrary: for albeit there was no great faith giuen to the promises of Lodowyke: yet it happened not for all that, that their determined enterprises suffered in any sort slow successe or proceedings: and the Pope and P. de Medicis could haue bene well content that the enterprife had bene proued to surprise Genes: But because in the action they should directly offend the estate of Myllan, the Pope, (Alphonso requiring his gallies, and to ioyne his men with him in Romagnia), consented to the seruice of his men for the common defence in Romagnia, but not to passe further. And touching the gallies, he made difficulty, saying it was not yet time to put Lodowyke so much in dispaire. The Florentyns being required to receiue Alphonsoes army by sea in the port of Lyuorne, and to refresh them, remained in suspence vpon the matter, for that making excuses to the demands of the french king, and being acquitted vnder the pretence of the confederacion passed with Ferdinand, they were very vnwillingly disposed to doe more without necessity, then they were bound vnto by that confederacion.

Matters being now not able to suffer any longer delay, the army by sea of Alphonso departed at last from Naples vnder the charge of the Admirall Dom Federyke: & Alphonso in person assembled his army in Abruzze to passe into Romania. But afore any further actiō was done, he thought it necessary to communicate with the Pope, who had the same desire, the better to establish all things that were to be done for their common safety.

The Pope and Alphonso met together the xij. of Iuly at Vicouare, a place appertaining to Virginio Vrsin, where after they had spent three daies, they returned well agreed. In this meeting and consultacion, it was determinid by the counsell of the Pope, that the person of the king of Naples should passe no further: his army contained little lesse then a hundreth squadrons of men at armes, accounting xx. men to a squadron: and very neare three thousand crosse-bow shot and light horsemen: Of this army it was agreed, that one part should stay with him vpon the frontyers of Abruzzo for his safety and surety of the state ecclesiastike: and that Virginio should remaine in the towne of Rome to make head against the *Collonoy*s: for dread of whom, also it was agreed that two hundred of the men at armes of the Pope, and a part of the light horsemen of the king, should not stirre out of Rome. That the expedition into Romania should be performed in the person of Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, (that was the title to the eldest son to the king of Naples) a young Prince of great hope, leading with him lxx. squadrons with the residue of the light horsemen, and most part of the Popes companies, such as he erected for defence: There were ioyned with him (as moderators of his youth) Iohn Iacques Trinusso, gouernour of the souldiers of the king of Naples, and the Count Perillane, who from the Popes pay was become mercenary to the king of Naples, both Captaines of great experience and reputation: Seeing they ment to leade an army into Lombardy, it was thought good that it should passe in the person of Ferdinand, for the society of blood and double parentage which he had with Iohn Galeas husband to Isabell his sister, and sonne of Iohn Galeas, brother to Hippolita who was mother to Ferdinand. But touching the actions of this parliament betweene the Pope and Alphonso, that of most importance, was, concerning the *Collonoy*s, for that it was discerned by manifest signes that they aspired to new intelligences: seeing that Prosper and Fabricius hauing serued in the pay of the late king of Naples, and by him recompensed with estates and honourable places: Prosper (the king being dead) after many promises made to Alphonso to reenter into his pay, was by the working of Cardinall Ascanius, entred into the common pay of the french king and the Duke of Myllan, refusing afterwards to take the Popes pay being much solicited: and Fabricius, who had continued in the seruice of Alphonso, hauing regard to the disdain of the Pope and the king of Naples against Prosper: made difficulty to goe with the Duke of Calabria into Romania, if first by some conuenient meanes were not reestablished and assured the affaires of Prosper and all the family of Colonne: This was the colour of their difficulties: but secretly they both were become mercenary to the french king, (partly drawne by the great amity they had with Cardinall Ascanius, who forsaking Rome a few dayes after for suspicion of the Pope, was retired to their landes) and partly for hope of larger payes, but much more moued with displeasure, that Virginio Vrsin chiefe of the contrary faction, bare greatest rule with Alphonso, and participated more then they in his prosperities: But to keepe this thing concealed vntill they might with surety declare them selues his souldiers, they treated continually with the Pope and Alphonso, by whom was made great instance, that Prosper taking pay of them, would leaue the wages of the Duke of Myllan, for that otherwise they could not be assured of him. The *Collonoy*s made shew of desire to accord with them, but to the end to determine nothing, they moued one time one difficulty and sometimes another, vpon the conditions that were offered.

In that practise, there was diuersity of willes betweene Alexander and Alphonso, for that Alexander desiring to dispoile them of the places they held about Rome, cherished the occasion to assaile them: and Alphonso who had no other intencion then to assure them, was not inclined to the warre but for a last remedy: but he durst not oppose against the couetousnesse of the Pope. At last they determined to constrain them by armes, and appointed forces and orders how it should be done, assaying notwithstanding afore, if within few dayes their controuersies might be accorded.

The beginning of the warre.

The king of Naples sedeth out an army to take the city of Genes.

These things, with many others, were debated on all partes, mens wittes wandering and their mindes vnresolute, their feares generall, but their hopes full of suspicions and incertinties, in their willes no consent or vnity, and all their coniectures and iudgements full of error, no, none that could moderate their expectation, and much lesse iudge what would be the end of those tragicall preparations: but at the last the warre of Italie tooke beginning by the going of Dom Federyke to the enterpryse of Genes, leading an army no doubt of greater proportion and better prouision, then had bene scene of long time before runne ouer the streams and sea of Tyrrennum: it contayned xxxv. light or suttle gallies, eightene shippes, with many other lesser vessels, great quantity of artillery, and three thousand footemen to put on land. By reason of which great equipage, and leading with them the exiles, the army departed out of Naples with great hope of the victory: but their lingring and slow departing, caused by those difficulties which commonly follow great enterprises, and partly abused by the cunning hopes which Lodowyke gaue them, and partly for that they stayed in the portes of Sienna to leuy to the number of v. thousand footemen, made hard hard and dangerous, that, which being assayed one moneth afore, would haue bene easie and without perill: for, the enemies (by their slow proceedings) had leysure to dresse a strong prouision, putting within Genes the bayliffe of Dyon, with two thousand Smytters leuied and paid by the french, and already ordered and rigged a great part of the shippes and gallies which were armed in that port, and one part of the vessels furnished at Marseilles, being there arriued also. Besides, Lodowyke for his part spared for no expence, but dispatched thither Gasper de S. Seuerin, called Fracasse, with Anthonie Maria his brother, with many footemen: and because he would conipound his strength no lesse vpon the good willes and hearts of Genes, then offorraine forces, he confirmed with gifts, pensions, and promises of many recompences, the courage and intention of Iohn Lays de Fiesquo, brother to Obietto, the Adornes, and many other gentlemen and poplars much importing to keepe that city in his deuotion: he had also called to Myllan many factions of the banished men, as well of the towne as riuers of Genes. To these prouisions mighty enough of them selues, did giue great reputation and surety the person and presence of Lowyys Duke of Orleance, who about the same times that the Aragons fleete was discouered in the sea of Genes, entred that city by commission of the french king, hauing first communicated in Alexandria vpon the common affaires with Lodowyke Sforce, who (as the doings of mortall men are full of thicke darknesse) had receiued him with great gladnesse and honour, but as a companion, not knowing how soone his whole estate and life would fall into his power.

Lowyys Duke of Orleance entred Genes, and preserues it.

These accidentes were the causes why the Aragons (determined before to present their fleete afore the port of Genes, vnder hope that the parties and confederates with the exiles would draw into some insurrection) chaunging now counsell with the occasion, resolved to assaile the riuier: and after some diuersity of opinions, whether in the riuier of Leuant or the West, were best to beginne: the aduise of Obietto preuayled, who promising him selfe much vpon them of the waters of Leuant, they addressed them selues to the towne of Portouenere, to the which they gaue assault for many houres in vaine, for that it was refurnished from Genes with foure hundred footemen, and the courages of the inhabitantes well resolved and confirmed by Iohn Lowys de Fiesquo lately come thither: Being out of hope to cary the towne by assault, they retired to the port of Lynorne, to reuitell their shippes, and refurnish their companies of footemen: for, when they vnderstood that the townes and peeces vpon the riuier were in good condition of defence and prouision, they iudged that to that action was necessary a greater supply of force. At Lynorna, Federyke (being aduertised that the French army inferiour to his in gallies, but mightier in shippes, was in preparation to fall out of the port of Genes) sent backe againe to Naples his shippes; to be able with more readinesse by the swiftnesse of his gallies to keepe aloofe from the enemy, if with their shippes and gallies together they should set on him, hoping notwithstanding to vanquish them, if their gallies were separated from their shippes, either by aduerture, or by will.

In the selfe same seasons, the Duke of Calabria marched towards Romania, with the army by land, with intention to passe afterwarde into Lombardie, according to the first resolutions: But to haue his passage more free and easie, and to leaue no impediments or perils behinde his backe, it was needefull to ioyneto him the state of Bologne, and the cities of Gmola and Furly: for Cesene a city immediately subiect to the Pope, and the city of Faense, belonging to Astor de Manfredi, a young gentleman, pensionary and gouerned vnder the protection of the Florentynes, were to giue willingly all commodities to the Aragons army. Ostauian sonne to Ieronimo de Riare, was Lord of Furly and Gmola, with a title of vicaire of the Church, but in minority and vnder gouernment of Katherine Sforce his mother, with whom many moneths before, the Pope and Alphonso had practised to entertaine Ostauian in their common pay, with condition to defend his estates: but the matter remained vnperfect, partly by the difficulties she alleaged, to the end to get better conditions: and partly for that the Florentynes dwelling still in their former purpose not to exceed the bondes they had with Alphonso to the preiudice of the french king, could not be resolved to be concurrant in this practise, to the which their consent was necessary, because the Pope and the King would not alone sustayne the charge: but much more for that Katherine would not put in daunger that city, vnlesse with the others, the Florentynes would be bound to the gard and defence of the estates of her sonne. These difficulties were taken away by the meeting and speaking together, which Ferdinand, (drawing his army by the way of Marrechia into Romania) had with Peter de Medicis in the village of S. Sepulcher: where he offered him in the name of his father king Alphonso, franke power to dispose of him and his armie in all the seruices which he had intention to execute for the affaires of Florence, Siena, and Faenza: these offers giuing a new life to the auncient courage of Peter; as soone as he was returned to Florence, he ordeined (notwithstanding the dissuasions of the wisest Citizens) that the accord should be subsigned, for that Ferdinand had instantly desired him. This being dispatched at the common charges of the Pope, Alphonso, and the Florentines, not manie dayes after, they had the Citie of Bologna at their deuotion, enterteyning Iohn Bentiuole (vnder whose authoritie and direction the Citie was gouerned) in the same manner the Pope promised, hauing withall the faith of king Alphonso and Peter de Medicis, to create Cardinall Antonius Galeas his sonne, then Pronotorie of the sea.

These things gaue to the armie of Ferdinand a great reputation, which yet had bene more great, if with those successses he had sooner entred into Romania: But by his slow speede to march out of the kingdome, and the diligent care and watching of Lodowyk Sforce, Ferdinand was no sooner arriued at Cesena, then Monsieur D'aubignie, and the Count Caiazzo, gouernour ouer the companies of Sforce, together with a great part of the armie appointed to make head against the Aragons, being passed without let by Bolognia, entred the countrey of Imola: by means wherof, Ferdinand hauing lost his first hopes to passe into Lombardie, was compelled to settle the warre in Romania, where (other cities following the partie of the Aragons) Rauenna & Cernia, cities of the Venetian iurisdiction, bare fauour to neither side. This litle countrey stretching along the riuer of Pau, & in the possession of the Duke of Ferrara, spared no one commoditie to the companies of the french & Sforce. Touching P. de Medicis, neither the difficulties hapning in the enterprise of Genes, nor the impediments occurring in Romania, could bridle his rashnesse: for, being bound by a secret conuention without the knowledge of the common weale, made with the Pope & Alphonso; to oppose himself openly against the french king: he had not only consented, that the Neapolitan army at sea should be receiued & refreshed in the haue of Lymorne, with power to leuie footmen through the whole territory of Floréce: but also restraining his rashnesse to no limit, he wrought so, that Anniball Bentiuole, sonne of Iohn, mercenary to the Florentins, went with his charge, & the companies of Astor de Manfredi, & ioyned with the camp of Ferdinand, as soone as he entred into the countrey of Furly, and sent besides, to the said Bentiuole, a thousand footemen with artilleries. Such a like disposition was alwayes discerned in the Pope, who, besides the provisions of warre, not contented to haue exhorted king Charles by writing the yeare before, not to

The Pope commands the French king not to passe into Italie. passe into Italie, but to proceede by way of iustice and not armes, reioyned him eftsouones by an other signeture, the selfe same things, vpon paine of the Church censure: and by the Bishop of Calagorre his Nuncio at Venice, (whither for the same effect were gone the Ambassadors of Alphonso, and they of Florence, who notwithstanding made not such open demandes) he perswaded much that Senate, that for the comon benefite of Italie, they would protest publike resistance against the French purposes, or at least to giue Lodowyk roundly to vnderstand, that he was

The Venetians venters. much discontented with this innouation. But the Senate answered by the Duke, that it was farre from the office of a wise Prince, to pull the warre vpon his owne house, and take it from another, nor to consent to do (either by demonstrations or effectes) any thing that may displease either of the parties: And because the king of Spaine (solicited instantly by the Pope and Alphonso) promised (for the succours of Naples) to send into Sciscie an armie by sea well furnished, and at last made excuse, that it could not be so soone ready for want of money: the Pope gaue consent (besides a certaine portion which Alphonso sent him) and power, that he might conuert into that vse, the moneyes gathered in Spaine by the Apostolike authoritie, vnder colour of the Croisade, which ought not to be employed against others then the enemies to the faith Christian. Alphonso also, besides those he had already sent to the great Turke, dispatched of new Camilla Pandon, with who was sent secretly by the Pope George Buciaro a Genoway, whose seruice Pope Innocent had vsed there afore: who being receiued with great honor of Baiazet, & dispatched with no lesse expedition, brought home large promises of succours: which albeit was confirmed a litle after by an Ambassadour sent by the Turke to Naples, yet either for the distace of places, or for the distrust he had of the Christians, those promises brought no effect. In this time, Alphonso & P. de Medicis, seeing their armies succeeded not happily by land nor sea, they laboured to beguile L. Sforce, vsing his owne crafts crafts and cunnings, but their industrie brought forth no better issue, then their forces. It was the opinion of many, that Lodowyke, for the consideration of his proper daunger, was not content that the french king should conquere Naples: but his plot was, that as soone as he was made Duke of Myllan, & that the french armie had passed into Tuscane, to worke some accord, by the which Alphonso should acknowledge himselfe tributarie to the crowne of France, with assurance to the king of office and obseruancie, and so the king (the places which the Florentines held in Lunigiane, reuerting perhaps out of their handes) to returne into France: So that the Florentines by this meane should remaine battered, the king of Naples diminished of force and authoritie, and he become Duke of Myllan, should haue got for his sewertie so much as was sufficient, without feare to fall into the daungers which might happen by the victorie of the french: he had hope also that the winter comming on, the king would suffer such difficulties as would let the course of his victorie: Lastly, he iudged that waighing with the impatience of the french, the kings slender prouision of money, and the wils of many of his people estranged from the enterprise, there would not want meanes to worke composition.

He aims hopes of Lod. Sforce.

This was a grosse error in his pollicie, to breede the storme, and leaue the defence to possibilities doubtfull: it is too daungerous to broach a vessell of poyson, and haue the vertue of the anty-dote vncertaine: fire suffered to runne, burnes without lymite, euen to the consuming of such as first kindled it. But whatsoeuer was his secret intention, it is certaine, that albeit at the beginning Lodowyke studied to separate P. de Medicis from the Aragons, yet after he perswaded him secretly to perseuere in his opinion, promising him so to worke that the french king should not march at all, or at least if he did passe, he should with the same speede returne afore he did action on that side the mountes; this he did often reiterate by his Embassadour resident at Florence, either for that such was his iust intention, or else hauing determined to ruinate Peter, he desired that he might bring him to doe so much against the king, as there might be no meane to reconcile them. But Peter determining by the consent of Alphonso to make these behaviours knowne to the french king, called one day into his house, the Embassadour of Myllan, vnder colour of being ill disposed of his person: afore he came, he caused to hide secretly the french Embassadour resident at Florence, in a place where he might easily heare their communication. There Peter repeated to the Embassadour plainely, distinctly, and at large, the perswasions and promises of Lodowyke, and that for his authoritie he was vnwilling to consent to the demands of the french king: taking occasion to complaine grievously, for that with so diligent instance he solicited the king to passe: he concluded, that seeing the effects answered not his words, he was constrainned to ioyne himselfe to the enterprise, to auoide his proper and present perill: The Myllanoys Embassadour answered, that he ought not to doubt of the faith of Lodowyke, if for no other reason, at least for this, that in comparison and consideration of things, it was no lesse daungerous to Lodowyke then to any other, that the french should enioy Naples: And therefore with all the councell, courage, and reasons that he could, he perswaded him to perseuere in his first opinion, least by such hurtfull alteration of mind, he were not the cause to bring himselfe and all Italy into perpetuall seruitude. This discourse with all his actions and circumstances, the french Embassadour with present speede communicated with the king his maister, assuring him that he was betrayed by Lodowyke, whose deuise tended all to his particular purpose and profite, and all his intensions dissembled and disguised.

This pollicie and priuate manner of Peter, bred not the effect which Peter and Alphonso hoped for, but, on the contrary, the matter and manner being reuealed to Lodowyke, euen by the french themselves, the disdain and hate conceiued afore against Peter, redoubled and tooke a stronger qualitie, and Lodowyke with a new diligence and quicknesse, solicited the french king to consume no more time vnprofitably.

But now, not onely the preparations that were made in so great plenty both by sea and land, but also the consent of the heauens and of men, pronounced to Italy their calamities to come: for that such as made profession, to haue iudgement eyther by science or diuine inspiration in the things to come, assured with one voyce that there were in preparing, both more great mutations, and more straunge and horrible accidents, then for many worlds before, had beene discerned in any part or circuit of the earth. There were seene in the night in Pouille three sunnes in the midst of the firmament, but many cloudes about them, with right fearefull thunders and lightnings : In the territorie of Aretze, were visibly scene passing in the ayre, infinite numbers of armed men vpon mightie horses, with a terrible noyse of drums and trumpets : The Images & figures of Saints did manifestly sweate in many parts of Italy: In euery place were brought forth many monsters of men and other creatures, with many other things against the order of nature, concurring all at one time, but in diuerse places : by meanes whereof the people were carried into incredible feares, being already amazed with the brute of the french powers and furie of that Nation, with the which according to the testimonie of histories, they had afore time runne ouer all Italy, sacked and made desolate with fire and sword the citie of Rome, and subdued in Asia many Prouinces, and generally no part of the world which had not felt the vertue of their armes: But albeit these iudgements are often times fallible, and rather coniectures vncertaine, then effects hapning, yet the accidents that drew on, brought to them, in the spirits of fraile men, an absolute faith, credite, and religion : for, king Charles, holding his first purpose, was now come to Viena in D'auphine, and would not suffer himself to be staied from his personall expedition into Italy, neither by the iust and generall petitions of his whole realme, nor with the consideration of his vniuersall wants of money, which were such, as he had no meane to furnish the necessities present, but by pawning for a great summe of money, certaine iewels lent him by the Duke of Sauoy, the Marquesse of Montferrat, and other great Lords of the Court : of the summes he had gathered before of the reuenues of France, and such as were lent to him by Lodowike, he had employed a great quantitie vpon the armies at sea, wherein at the beginning was reapposed a great hope of the victorie : and of the residue, he had made many indiscreete liberalities to diuerse persons before he went from Lyons: And his Princes and Noble men, hauing at that time not so readie wayes to exact money vpon their peoples, as their immoderate couetousnesse hath brought them since, without regard to God or men, it was not easie for him to leauy new tributes : so slender were the prouisions and grounds of so great a warre, fury and rashnes guiding the king more then wisdom and counsell.

But as it often hapneth in the execution of things new, great, and difficult, that albeit all things are ordeyned and foreseene : yet the reasons that may be considered in the contrary, come then to appeare in the vnderstanding of men, when the enterprise is toward his action and beginning: So, the king being vpon the point to depart, yea his souldiers marching towards the mounts, there arose a great murmure throughout the Court : some brought into consideration the difficulties ordinary in so great an enterprise, and some disputed of the generall daungers and infidelitie of the Italians, but specially there was an vniuersall ielousie of Lodowike Sforce, both for the aduertisement lately come from Florence, and also certaine money expected from him, remained yet behind : So that not onely such as had alwaies reproved this enterprise, rose vp estioones to resist it with more audacity (as hapneth in those cases when counsell is confirmed by the euent of things) but euen those that had bene the principall workers, as chiefly the Bishop of S. Mallo, began so to shake, that the brute comming to the eares of the king and the whole Court, inclining to murmure and confusion of opinions, caused such an inclination in the king to passe no further, that suddenly commaundement was giuen to make stay of all the bands and companies of souldiers: by meane wherof many that were already on their way, returned with willing speed to the court, following a report published, that it was a resolution set downe, that the campe should not passe into Italy: it was then beleueed that all had turned into alteration and chaunge, if the Cardinall of S. P. ad vincula, (the fatall instrument both at that time, before, and after, of all the miseries of Italy) had not with his authoritie and vehemencie, giuen a new life to the expedition, recomforted the heart of the noble men, and brought againe the spirit of the king to his first determination: he laide before him not onely the reasons that had first stirred him vp to so glorious an enterprise, but also with a sharpe and quicke eloquence, willed him to looke into the infamy which might runne throughout all the world, for so light a mutation of so noble a counsell : he asked his Maiestie for what occasion, in restoring the places in the countie of Artoys, he had weakened on that side, the frontiers of his realme : why had he with so great displeasing of his Nobilitie and populars, made open to the king of Spaine, one of the ports of France, in giuing him the countie of Rusillon : other kings his predecessors had not wont to consent to those things, but either to be deliuered from great and imminent perils, or at least, in counterchaunge of profits more importing: he made not those restitutions by any necessitie, his perils were but reasonable, and for frute or recompence, there was no other expectation, then that with a great price, he had bought a present losse, which would perpetually nourish griefe, dishonour, and infamy: what new accidents haue appeared (saith he) or what strange daungers and difficulties are disclosed since the enterprize hath bene published throughout all the world? No, rather the hope of the victorie is encreased, the foundations being shaken whereupon the enemy had built all the hopes of his defence, for that if both the armie at sea of the Aragons, shamefully retyred to the port of Lisurme, after they had giuen a vaine assault to Portomenere, was able to attempt no further action against Genes, so well defended with souldiers and a nauie more mightie then theirs, And also in their armie by land stayed in Romania, by the resistance of small numbers of the french, was left no courage to passe further: what would be their feares, when they heard by all the countries in Italy, that the king was to passe the mounts with an armie royall: townes would fall into tumults, men would draw into munitie; hauing their minds amazed, how could they be stayed or cōteined? The Pope would not be a litle amazed, when he should see from his proper pallace, the armes of the Collo- noys at the gates of Rome: No lesse would be the astonishment of P. de Medicis, who hath for his enemies his owne bloud, knoweth what affection the towne of Florence beareth to the name of the french, & is not ignorant how desirous it is to recouer the libertie which he holdes opprest: That there was no impediment, no difficultie, no daunger to stay the furious descending of the king vpon the confines of Naples, which he should no sooner approch, then he should find all things disposed to flight or to rebellion: he told him, the feare was vaine to doubt want of money, for that his artillerie should be no sooner hard thunder, then the Italians with a swift liberalitie, would supply him from all patts: And if he should find any resistance or defence, the spoyles, the booties, the riches of the vanquished would suffice to nourish his armie, for that Italy for many yeares, hauing bene more accustomed to apparances of warre, then trayned in the true experience of warres, there was no strength, foundation, nor power to sustaine the fury of the french. In a matter debated with so long counsell, and prepared so heare to his action: in an enterprize so possible, and bringing so many profits: in an expedition so hautie and glorious, and giuen ouer, so vile and infamous: he aduised him to be firme and resolute, and for feares, suspitions, and iealousies, he willed him to thinke them as dreames, rising vpon some superfluous humour, or as shadowes to whom can be assigned no bodies: he told him it became iustly his name and greatnesse to march on with the same magnanimitie and courage, wherewith not foure dayes since, he vaunted to be able to vanquish Italy being vnited all together: he said, he had to consider, that his counsels were now no more in his owne power, & that things had got to great forwardnes by reason of the alienation he had made of many lands and territories, for the Embassadors he had heard, sent, and banished, for the great charges he had sustayned, for so many and mighty prouisions, and lastly, for the renoune that runne thorough the world, and his person being brought almost to the toppe of the Alpes: And finally, saith he, albeit the enterprize were neuer so perillous, yet necessitie constrained him to follow it, seeing betweene glorie and infamy, betweene dishonour and triumph, betweene the opinion to be esteemed a king, and a man vile, priuate, and abiect, there remained no meane. These speeches in substance deliuered by the Cardinall, but according to his nature, in more graue and vehement gesture, kindled such a new life & courage in the king, that without hearing any, then such as perswaded him to the warre, hee departed the same day from Vyena, accompanied with all the Barons and Captaines of the Realme, except the Duke of Burbon, to whom in his absence, he left the administration of the kingdome, and the Admirall, with certaine others appointed to the gouernement and gard of Prouinces most importing: himselfe with the armie passing into Italy by the mount Genoura, which yeeldes a farre more easie passage then the mount Cenis, and by the which (but with incredible difficulties) Hanniball of Carthage made his way into Italy: entred into the towne of Ast the ix. of September, a thousand foure hundredreth ninetie and foure, leading with him into Italy the seedes of innumerable calamities, and most horrible accidents, with a chaunge almost and innouation of all things: for, of his passage, did not onely take beginning, mutation of estates, subuersion of realmes, desolation of countreys, destruction of cities, and murders ciuill and most cruell: but also he brought with him new fashions of habites, new customes, new and bloudie manners of making warres, and diseases till those times vnknownen, yea he did so disorder the instruments of peace and concord in Italy, that being neuer able since to reōrder and reduce them, orther Nations strange & barbarous,

haue had good meane to oppresse them miserably : And for the increasing of the infelicities (because their shame and dishonor should not be diminished by the valour and vertues of the victor) he whose coming brought all those calamities, (albeit he lackt nothing of the liberalities and fauours of fortune) was void almost of all the giftes of nature and the mind : for, it is most certain that king Charles from his infancie was of complexion very delicate, and of bodie vnfound and diseased, of small stature, and of face (if the aspect and dignitie of his eyes had bene taken away) foule and deformed, his other members bearing such equall proportion, that he seemed more a monster then a man : he was not only without all knowledge of good sciences, but scarcely he knew the distinct characters of letters : his mind desirous to commaund, but more proper to any other thing, for that being enuironed alwayes with his familiars and fauorits, he reteyned with them no maiestie or authoritie : he reiected all affaires and businessse, and yet if he did debate and consider in any, he shewed a weake discretion and iudgement : And if he had any thing in him that caried apparance of merit or praise, yet, being thoroughly waighed and founded, it was found further off from vertue then from vice : he had an inclination to glory, but it was tempered more with rashnesse and furie, then with moderation and counsel : his liberalities were without discretion, measure, or distinction : immouable often times in his purposes, but that was rather an ill grounded obstinacie, then constancie, and that which many call bountie, deserued more reasonably in him the name of coldnesse and slacknesse of spirit.

The same day the king arriued in the towne of Ast, the fauours of fortune beganne to appeare to him with a ioyfull token or prediction : for, there came from Genes glad newes, that Dom Federicke (who after his retyre from Portouenere to the hauen of Lyuorne, & that he had refreshed his army by sea, and leuyed new companies of landmen, was esloones returned into the same riuer) had put on land Obietto de Fiesquo, with three thousand footemen, who without difficultie had made himselfe Lord of the towne of Rapalle, which is twentie miles from Genes, and then sent companies to espie and spoyle the countrey there about : That such a beginning being of no little importance, for that touching the affaires of the towne of Genes, all emotions how little so euer they were, would be dangerous, considering the contagioufnesse and multitude of parties and factions, those within the towne esteemed it not good, that the enemies should haue further aduantage : and therefore, leauing part of their companies to the gard of Genes, the two brethren S. Senerins and John Adorne, brother to Augustine gouernour of the towne, with the Italian footmen, put themselues on the way to goe to Rapalle, the Duke of Orleance with a thousand Swizzers, leading thither the army by sea, which contained xviij. galleys, vj. gallions, and ix. great ships. And being all ioyned neere to Rapalle : they furiously gaue vpon the enemies that made head against the bridge which was betweene the suburbes of Rapalle, and a litle strait plaine that stretched to the sea : That besides, the proper forces of the Aragons, the seat of the place fought with aduantage for them, by whose steopenesse and sharpnesse more then other munition or art, the places of that riuer are well fortified : the beginning of the skirmish seemed prosperous to the enemy, the Swizzers being in a place very vnproper to bestow their ordenance, beginning almost to retyre : but by the continuall concourse and flocking of the peasants running after the faction of the Adornes, for their agilitie and experience in those stonie and mountenous places, men of speciall merit in seruice, & the Aragons beaten in flanke with the artilleries of the gallies of France, which were brought as neere the bankes as could be : they beganne very hardly to sustaine the charge : And that lastly, as they were beaten from the bridge, Obietto was aduertised (in whose fauour his partakers did not yet stirre) that John Lewys de fiesquo, was at hand with a great troupe of footemen, and therefore fearing to be charged on the backe, they fled to the mountaines, Obietto being the first, according to the custome of rebels : That there was slaine of them in this encounter, partly by fighting, and partly by flying, more then a hundred bodies : a slaughter not little, considering the manner of the warre in Italy in those times : with these aduertisements came accompanied the reapport of the prisoners taken, amongst whom was Iulius Vrsin, who with xl. men at armes, and certaine crosbow shot on horsebacke, had followed the sea armie of Alphonso, in whose pay he was : Fregosin sonne to the Cardinall Fregose and Orlandin of the same familie, remained also prisoners. This victorie assured altogether the affaires of Genes, for that Dom Federicke (who as soone as he had put his footmen on land, spread himselfe vpon the maine sea, as not to be constrained to fight with the enemy in the gulph of Rapalle) despairing to do any profitable seruice seruice: at that time, retired his army once againe to the port of Linorne: where albeit he furnished his numbers with new souldiers, and had many plots to assaile the riuers in some other place: yet (by vnfortunate beginnings of enterprises often times men lose both courage and counsels) he attempted no other action of consequence, leauing a iust occasion to Lodomyke to vaunt, that with his industry and his counsels, he had giuen the bay to his aduersaries, seeing there was no other thing that saued the state of Genes, but their too slow speede to depart, whereof Lodomyke was the cause by his cunning, and vaine hopes breeding their deceitfull security.

At this time went Lodomyke Sforce to visit the king at Ast, whither he caried with him Beatrice his wife, followed with great pompe, and a traine of the most honourable and singular faire Ladies within all the Duchy of Myllan: he was also accompanied with Hercules Duke of Ferrara. There they debated of their common affaires, and by generall councill it was resolued, that the army should march with as much speede as was possible: wherein for the more diligence and expedition of things, Lodomyke who had not a little feare, that the hard season of the yeare happening, they would sojourne all the winter in the territories of his Duchy, lent eftsoons to the king a great quantity of money, whereof he had not a litle necessity and want: Notwithstanding, the king falling into the diseale which we call the small pockes, he remayned about a moneth within the towne of Ast, the army being dispersed into quarters and places thereabouts. Touching the numbers of his army, (as may be truly gathered out of so many diuersities) it contained, (besides the two hundreth gentlemen for his guard, and reckoning the Swyzers gone before to Genes, and the companies intertaining the warre in Romania, vnder Monsieur D'auygnny) xvj. hundred men at armes, allowing to euery of them according to the custome of Fraunce, two Archers, so that vnder euery launce (for so they call their men at armes) are comprehended vj. horses: of the Swyzers vj. thousand footemen, and vj. thousand of the realme of Fraunce: whereof the one halfe were Gascome souldiers, for their furniture gallaunt and well appointed, and for their naturall aptnesse to the warres, a people aboue all others, soonest traynd to seruice. And to ioine to this army, there was carried to Genes by sea, a huge proportion of artilleries of sundry natures, both for battery and seruice of the field, but of such sorts as Italy neuer saw the like.

This hell or torment of artillery being deuised many yeares since in Germany, was brought first into Italy by the Venetians, hauing warre about the yeare 1380. with the Genowais: wherein the Venetians vanquished by sea, and much afflicted by the losse of Chioze, were ready to receiue such conditions as it pleased the victors, if in so good an occasion, there had not bene want of moderate counsell. The greatest sort was called bombardes, which, after the inuention was spreadde through Italy, were employed to the battering of townes: some of them were of yron, and some of brasse, but contayning such grosse and huge proportion, that for their waight, and ignorance of men, and instruments vnapt, they were carried slowly, and with great difficulty: and being with intollerable trauels planted afore towns, yet there was so much respite betweene one shot and another, that in comparison of their vse at this day, they gave little fruite or successe to the seruice, but left to the defenders leysure and oportunitie at will, to reenforce their rampiers and fortifications. And yet, by the violence of the saltpeter, with the which their powder had his mixture, the bullets flew into the aire with such horrible noise and fury, that that instrument (yea afore he had his perfection) put to skorne and silence all those engines and deuises, wherewith the auncients were wont to pull downe townes, to the great fame of Archymedes, and other notable enginistes. But the french men forging peeces of farre greater facility, and of no worse mettall then brasse, which they called cannons, vsing bullets of yron, in place of those of stone of the first inuention, vsed to draw them vpon wheelles, not with oxen (as was the custome in Italy) but with horses, and with such agility of men and instrumentes appointed to that seruice, that they almost kept march with the army: and being brought afore townes or walles, they were braked and planted with an incredible diligence, and with a very smal intermission betweene the shottes: they battered with such violent fury, that, what before was wont to be done in Italy in many daies, they dispatched it in few howres. These deuilish instruments they vsed also in the field, making sometimes the cannon seruic eable there, and sometimes peeces of lesser forge, haled according to their proportion, with the selfe same speed and nimblenesse. Those artilleries were the cause, that all Italy stood in great feare of the kings army, which was also holden more redoubted and dreadfull, not by the numbers, but for the valour of the souldiers: for, the men at armes, being almost all of the kings subiects, gentlemen and not of the popular sort, were not simply vnder the direction and discipline of Captaines, nor payed by them, but by the kings officers: by which meane, companies and bandes had not onely their compleate numbers, but they were men of choyse, and in good point for horse and armour, being well able to make their owne furnitures) and contented in seruice, as well for the desire of honour, (which naturally is nourished in the hearts of men of noble race) as also that by their actions in armes and fight, they might aspire to recompence, as well out of warre as the warre during, and by degrees, rise worthely to the name and places of Captaines. The same respectes pushed forward the Captaines, Barons, and great Lordes, or at least such as did communicate in honourable discent and blood; for the most part subiects of the crowne of Fraunce, who hauing their numbers set and limited, for according to the warres of that realme, there is in no company aboute a hundreth launces) had no other intention, then by seruice to merite well of their king: So that there was not amongst them any humour of inconstancy, either by ambition or couetousnesse to chaunge their Lord, or for enuy to exceede other Captaines in numbers of men at armes: customes meare contrary to the ordering of the men at armes in Italy: where many of the men at armes, are either peasantes, or populars, subiectes of an other Prince, and depending wholly of their Captaines, with whom they contract for their pay, and serue vnder their arbitracion: they haue neither by nature nor by accident, any extraordinary spurre or prouocation to serue well. The Captaines are very rarely vassalles of him that entertaines them: they haue for the most part diuerse interestes, purposes, and ends: full of enuy and hatreds: And being bound to no tearme fixed for their payes, and absolute commaunders ouer their companies, they oftentimes beguile the seruice with lesse numbers then they are payed for: and sometimes not contented with honest conditions, they put their patrones vpon euery occasion to raunsome: At their pleasures they will passe from the seruice of one, and enter into the pay of an other, ambition, couetousnesse, or other particular interestes, making them not onely inconstant, but also vnfaithfull. There was also scene no lesse difference between the footemen of Italie, and those that serued vnder king Charles, for that the Italians fought not in squadrons set and ordered, but in troupes, and dispersed in the field, and oftentimes retrying to the aduantages of hilles and ditches: But the Swyzzers (a nation warlike, and by the long vse of warre and many victories, had renewed their auncient glory and hardinesse) vsed to fight with bandes ordered, and distinct in numbers certaine: and neuer forsaking their ranckes, they vsed to stand against their enemies as a wall, firme, and almost inuincible, so farre forth as they fought in a plaine or place large to stretch out their battell: euen with the same discipline and orders, but not with the like courage and vertue, did fight the footmen of the french and Gascoynes.

king. Whilest the king by reason of his sickenesse, sojourned in the city of Asse, there happened a new tumult about the borders of Rome: for, the Colonnys (notwithstanding Alphonso had accorded to all their moderate demaunders) as soone as Monsieur D'aubygn was entred Romania, declared themselves for the french king without more dissembling, and tooke the rocke of Ostia by intelligences they had with certaine Spanish footemen left there in garrison. This raised the Pope into passion, and made him bitterly complaine to all Princes in Christendome, of the iniuries done to him by the french: he addressed his complaints chiefly to the king of Spaine, and Senate of Venice, of whom (but in vaine) he praied aide and succours according to the contract of confederacion made betweene them the last yeare before: And turning altogether his wits, authority and courage, to the prouisions of the warres, after he had cited Prosper and Fabricius, (whose houses he caused to be rased in Rome), and assembled his companies with part of those of Alphonso, vnder Virginio, at the riuer of Tyberone, neare Tyuly: he sent them all vpon the landes of the Colonnys, whose strength was no greater then two hundreth men at armes, and a thousand footemen: But afterwards the Pope doubting least the french army at sea supposed to come from Genes to the succours of Ostia, should be receiued into the port of Neptune, belonging to the Colonnys: Alphonso after he had gathered at Terracina all the companies that the Pope and he had in those quarters, established his campe there, hoping to haue it easily. Notwithstanding the Colonnys defending it with great francknesse of courage, and being also passed into their countreys without impediments, with the companies of Camilla Vitelli, of the city of Castello, and the bands of their brethren which the french king had newly taken into his pay. The Pope reuoked to Rome, part of his people which were in Romania with Ferdinand, whose affaires continued not with that felicity and fortune which they seemed to show in the beginning: for, as he was arrived at Villefranche, betwene Furly and Faenza, and from thence was entred into the high way of Ymola: the army of the enemy encamped neare to Villefranche, seeing their forces inferior, retired betwene the Forrest of Lugo and Columnare, neare the forde of Geniola: a place very strong by nature, and appertayning to Hercules d'Este, out of whose countreys they were vittelled: So that Ferdinand, seeing that by the strength and situation of the place, he could not charge them, but with manifest and generall perill, issued out of Ymola, and went to encampe in Toskanella, neare the village of S. Peter in the countreys of Bolonia: for, being desirous to fight, by the show he made to goe towards Bolonia, he sought to put the enemies (to whom he would not leaue liberty to passe further) in necessity to incampe in places not so strong: But they, approching certaine daies after neare Ymola, pitched their campe vpon the riuer of Santerne, betwene Lugo and S. Agathe, the place being well fortified, and had for their backe, the riuer of Paw. The same day Ferdinand encamped sixe miles from them vpon the same riuer neare Mordane and Bubane, presenting his army the day after in battell ringed within a mile of them: where, after he had looked forthem in vaine for certaine houres, the place ministring all commodities to fight, by reason of his scope, largenesse, and plainnesse, and seeing he could not set vpon them in their trenches without absolute daunger, went to encampe at Balbiana, not holding any more the way of the moun- raine as he had done till then, but accoasting the enemy, he marched alwaies with this intention, to constraîne them, if he could, to forsake their trenches so full of aduantage and strength.

It hath seemed till now that the affaires of the Duke of Calabria, carried good estate and fortune, and a gouvernement with reputation, seeing the enemies had apparantly refused to fight, defending them selues more with the strength and situation of their trenches, then with actions of armes, and in all encounters of the light horsemen; the Aragons caried away alwaies the best: but the campe of the French and Sforce, receiuing continuall strength by supplies of companies, which at the beginning remayned behinde, the estate of the warre began to chaunge: for that, the Duke, whose heate and forwardnesse was moderated by the councill of the captaines that followed him, to the end he would not commit all to fortune without aduantage, retired to S. Agathe, a towne of the Duke of Ferrara, where, finding diminution of his footmen, and of that part of the horsemen of the Church, which the Pope had called backe, and lastly in the middest of the countreys of the Duke of Ferrara, began to looke to fortifie him selfe: But after he had remayned there certaine daies, he vnderstood by espiall, that there was expectation in the enemies campe, of two hundred launces, and a thousand Smytzer footemen, which the French king had caused to march as soone as he entred into Ast: and therefore he retyred to the wast of Faenza, a place betwene the walles of the same towne, and a ditch which reculeth about a thousand pases from the towne, and enuironing it round about, makes that situation very strong. And by reason of his retraite, the enemy came to S. Agathe, which he had abandoned. Surely both these armyes shewed great tokens of courage, when they saw their enemy inferior: but when things were brought to an equality, the place apt, their forces indifferent, and all other oportunities consenting, each one eschewed to assay the fortune of battell, and in them both was approued that which very rarely happeneth, that one councill was pleasing to two armies, being enemies: For, the French thought they should accomplish their intention, for the which they were come out of Lombardie, if they hindered the Aragons for passing further: And Alphonso iudged it greatly to his benefit, if he could amuse and hold the enemies bridle vntill winter: and therefore gaue expresse charge to his sonne, and Iohn Iacques Tryuulso, with the Count de Petillane, that without great occasion, they should not put in the power of fortune, the realme of Naples, which was vtterly lost, if that army were defeated. But these remedies sufficed not for safety, for that king Charles, whose forwardnesse could not bee restrayned, neither by the season of the time, nor any other difficulties, marched into the field with his army as soone as he had recouered his health: And because Iohn Galeas Duke of Myllan, and his cousin germaine (for the King and he descended of two sisters, daughters to Lomys the second, Duke of Sauoye) lay fore sicke in the castell of Pauye, he went with great humanity to visite him, making his way by the towne, and lodging in the same castell: The speeches he vsed to him were generall for the presence of Lodowyke, onely expressing how much grieved he was for his sickenesse, and perswaded him to take hope and courage to recouer his health: But touching the effect of the mind, the king with al those ~~that~~ were with him, had great compassion on him, euery one iudging for certaine, that the yong gentleman, by the wickednesse of his Vncle, had not long to liue. This compassion was much encreased by the presence of Isabell his wife, who not onely full of many sorrowes for the infirmity of her husband, and estate of her little sonne borne by him, but also much afflicted for the perill of her father and his adherentes, she ~~was~~ with great humility, in the publicke presence, at the secte of the king, recommending to him with pitifull teares, her father, and his house of Aragon: towards whom, albeit the king, for her age, for her beauty, and her present fortune, expressed an apparant inclination to pity, yet, being not able to stay the course of so great a matter, for so light occasion, he answered her with signes of will to doe that he could not, saying, the enterprise being so farre aduanced, he was contrayned to prosecute and continue it.

*Lodo. Sforce
lan by usurpa-

From Panya the king marched to Plaisance, and during the abode he made there, newes came of the death of Iohn Galeas, by which occasion Lodowmyke, that had followed him thither, returned in no small diligence to Myllan, where by the principals of the councell, which the Duke had suborned, it was propounded, that in regard of the greatnesse of that estate, and the daungerous times that prepared now for Italy, it would be a thing preiudiciall, that the sonne of Iohn Galeas, (hauing not fīue yeares in age) should succede his father: and therefore, as well to keepe the liberties of the state in protection, as to be able to meete with the inconueniences which the time threatneth: they thought it iust and necessary (derogating somewhat, for the publicke benefite, and for the necessity present, the disposition of the lawes, as the lawes themselves do suffer) to constraīne Lodowmyke, for the better stay of the common weale, to suffer that into him might be transported the title and dignity of Duke, a burden very waighy in so conspiring a season: with the which colour, honestly giuing place to ambition, the morning following (vying some forme of resistance) he tooke vpon him the name and armes of the Duchy of Myllan, hauing secretly protested before, that he receiued them as appertayning to him, by the inuestiture of the king of Romaines: It was published that the death of Galeas happened by immoderate cohabitation, but the vniuersall iudgement of Italy was, that he died not of infirmities naturall, nor by incontinency, but by poyson and violent compulsion, whereof Theodor de Panya, one of the Physicians, assisting when the king visited him, assured the king to see most apparant and manifest signes: And if he were dispatched by poison, there was none that doubted that his Vncle was innocent either directly or indirectly, as he, who not content with an absolute power to be gouernor of the state, but aspiring according to the common desires of great men, to make them selves glorious with titles and honours, and specially hee iudged that both for his proper surety, and the succession of his children, the death of the lawfull Prince was necessary, and therefore sought to establish in him selfe the power and name of Duke, wherein ambition and couetousnesse preuailed aboue conscience and law of nature, and the ielous desire of dominion, enforced his disposition (otherwaies abhorring bloud) to that vile action. It was beleued of many wise men, that he hath had that intencion euer since he began to sollicite the french kings journey into Italy, iudging the occasion and the time would well concurre to aduance the effect, for that the french houreing vpon the borders of that state with a maine army, it would alter mens coniectures and humours, and cary their wits from remembraunce of an act so wicked. But some hauing opinions more particular, supposed both for the suddainnesse of his death, and diligent transferring of the impery to the other, that it happened by a new thought proceeding of feare, least the king (the counells of the french are sodaine) would turne him selfe with a contrary course to deliuer his cosin Galeas from so great a subiection, being induced thereunto, either for respect of parentage and compassion of his age, or that he might thinke it was a thing more sure for him selfe, that the Duchy of Myllan were in the power of his cosin, rather then commaunded by Lodowmyke, whose fidelity many of his great Lords laboured continually to make suspected with him. But because Lodowmyke had got the yeare before the inuestiture of the Duchy of Myllan, and a litle before the death of his nephew, had dispatched with diligence the imperiall priuiledges, it makes a congruent construction, that it was a deliberation voluntary and foredeuised, and not sodaine, nor in respect of the present daunger. The king stayed certaine dayes at Plaisance, not without inclination to returne into Fraunce, for that as well the want of money, which being the more generall, was so much more intollerable, as not seeing any new thing in Italy discover in his fauour, he had many doubtres of his successe, hauing withall no litle suspition of the new Duke of Myllan, who notwithstanding when he parted, sayd he would returne, yet the iudgement was, that he would not come againe at all: it is not out of all likelihood, that being vnknownen to the nations on the other side the mounts that wicked custome to poyson men, which is a practise very common and familiar in all partes of Italie: but that the king and all his Court, beside the suspition they had conceiued against the faith of Lodowyke, had his name in honour, yea the king esteemed it an iniurie done to his owne honour and greatnesse, that he had solicited his comming into Italie, to be the better able without daunger to execute an act so abhominable: yet in the end, the resolution was to march on, Lodowyke continually labouring him thereunto, with promise to returne & so visite the king within few dayes, for that both the kings abroad in Lombardie, and his hastie returne into Fraunce, were wholly contrary to his intentions.

The same day the king departed from Plaisance, Laurence and Iohn de Medicis came to him, who being secretly fled from their houses in the countrey, made great instance that his Majesty would come neare Florence, promising him much of the affections and good will of the people towards the house of Fraunce, and no lesse of the hate against Peter de Medicis, against whom the king was aggravated by occasions new & greene: for the king sent from Ast an Ambassadour to Florence, to propound many offers: if they would graunt him passage, and abstaine hereafter from ayding of Alphonso: and on the other side to pronounce threatnings to them, if they perseuered in their former counsell: wherein to astonish them the more, he gaue expresse charge to his Ambassadour to returne immediatly, if they would not giue speedy resolution: he was answered with excuses to deferre and expect, for that the chiefest Citizens of the gouernement being withdrawne to their houses of solace in the countrey, according to the custome of the Florentines in that season, they could not with such speede giue him an answer certaine, but would with all diligence aduertise the king of their intention by a particular Ambassadour. It is most certaine, that it was agreed in the kings counsell without contradiction, that the armie should rather take the way that leades thorow Tuskane, and the territories of Rome directly to Naples, then that, which, lying along Romania, and la Marque, passing the riuer of Troute, entred into Abruzzo, not for that they did distrust to giue the chafe to the bands of the Aragons, which with difficultie resisted Monsieur D'auygnny: but for that it seemed a thing vnworthy of the greatnesse of such a king, & no lesse infamous to the glory of his armies, (the Pope & Florentines being declared against him) to giue occasion to men to thinke that he eschewed the way for distrust, that he was not able to force them: but much more because they esteemed it daungerous to make warre in the realme of Naples, and leaue as enemies at their backes, the state Ecclesiastike & Tuskane: and therefore the armie turning to the way of Tuskane, it was determined to passe rather the Appennyn, by the mountaine of Parme, then to march the direct way to Bolonia. This was Lodowyke's direction, when he was at Ast, for that he had a desire to make him selfe Lord of Pysa.

So that the yaunggard, ouer whom was gouernour and leader, Gilbert de Montpensier, of the house of Bourbon, and Prince of the blood: and the king following, with the residue of the armie, passed to Pontreme, a towne of the Duchy of Myllan, set at the foote of the Appennyn, vpon the riuer of Magre, which diuides the country of Genes, (aunciently called Liguria) fro Tuskane: fro Pontreme Monsieur Montpensier entred the country of Lunigiana, a part of which obeyed the Florentins, certaine castels belonged to the Genoways, and the residue were subiect to the Marquis of Malestine, who maintained their small estates vnder the protection sometimes of the Duke of Myllan, sometimes of the Florentines, and sometimes of the Genoways. About those quarters ioyned with Monsieur Montpensier, the Swyzzers, which had bin at the defence of Genoway, together with the artillerie which was come by sea to Spetia: and being come neare the towne of Fimizana, belöging at that time to the Florentins, whither they were guided by Gabriell Malestina, Marquis of Fodisnone, who was recommended to them, they tooke it by force, & sackt it, making slaughter of all the souldiers strögers that were within, & many of the inhabitants: a maner of making war very new, & so much the more terrible to all Italie, accustomed for many yeares past to warres rather flourishing in pompes and fine furniture, like to warres shewed by maskers in stage playes, then to skirmishes bloody & daungerous. The Florentins were determined to make their principall resistance at Serezana, which they had greatly fortified, but not with strength sufficient & necessary to resist so mighty an enemy, because they had not furnished it with any Captaine of Laurence and Iohn de Medicis with the French king.

The way that the French armie tooke to Naples.

M. Montpensier leader of the yaunggard.

warre, that had authoritie to minister discipline, nor yet souldiers, neither resolute nor seruicable, other then such as lost heart at the first voyce of the approch of the French armie : yet they of Florence were of opinion that it could not be easily taken, specially the Castell, and much lesse the rocke Serezana, both well furnished, and bearing his situation vpon the hill about the towne: Besides, it was not possible that the armie should remaine long time in those places, the countrey being barreine and straite, and being inclosed betweene the sea and the mountaines, was not sufficient to nourished so great a multitude, and their vituals comming farre of, could not obserue such iust time and oportunitie, as to serue their present necessities: by reason whereof it seemed the kings affaires began to fall into hard termes, & that his armie stood possible to many daungers & distresses: for, albeit he could not with conuenient impediments be let from assailing Pysa, leauing behind him the town & castell of Serezana, & the rocke, nor kept by the country of Lucques, (which Citie, by the working of the Duke of Myllan, had secretly determined to receiue them) that he entred not an other part of the territorie of Florence: yet he could hardly be brought to that deliberation, and much lesse cōdescend to it, because he had a perswasion in his secret fancie, that if he woult not the first towne that resisted him, it would diminish much his reputation, and leaue a daungerous example to others to vse insolencie against him.

But so it was ordained, that either by the grace and blessing of fortune, or by an ordinance of more high power, (if at the least the indiscreptions and faultes of men deserue such excuses) to such an impediment hapned a suddaine remedie: seeing that neither the courage nor constancie of Peter de Medicis, were greater in his aduersities, then had bene his modestie and discreffion in his prosperities: By this must be vnderstood, that the displeasures which the Citie of Florence had receiued from the beginning, for the impediments which were giuen to the king, were continually multiplied, both for a new chase and banishment of their marchants out of all parts of the Realme of France, and also for feare of the power of the French, which did so much the more grow rising in the hearts of men, by how much they heard that the armie had begun to passe the Appennyn mounts: but specially they fell all into dread & feare, by the crueltie shewed at the taking of Fimzana: for these causes euery one did publicly detest the rashnesse of Peter de Medicis, who, without necessitie, beleeuing more in his owne weening, and the counceils of certaine rash ministers, men arrogant in times of peace, and vnprofitable, and cowardes in times of warre: the following the directions of those Citizens that were friends to his father, and had alwayes instructed him with no lesse graue counceils: had so indiscreetly prouoked the armes of so mightie a king, assisted with the Duke of Mullan: seeing withall, he was ignorant in the affaires of warre, leauing the Citie, and other places of their obedience not fortified, but ill furnished with souldiers and munitions necessarie to make defence against so great a force: Besides that, there had as yet appeared none of those Aragons, for whom they had exposed them selues to so great daunger: so that their countrey abandoned of euery one, remained in the deepe hatred of so mightie a king, and was ready to fall as a manifest pray to him, who with so great instance, had sought not to fall into occasion and necessitie to hurt it.

This disposition which was almost in all those of the towne, was further kindled by many noble Citizens, much displeased with the present gouernement, and that one onely familie had risen so much in presuming, as to appropriat to him selfe the rule of the whole cōmon weale: in so much as one increasing the feares of an other, and all labouring in one common dread, and ministering stomacke and courage to such as desired new things, they had so stirred the braynes & spirits of the people, that there was generall feare of some tumult in the towne, whereunto the multitude was the rather prouoked by the pride and immoderat behaiours of Peter, who, in many things forsaking the ciuill customes and modestie of his auncestours, had bene followed from his infancie with a perpetuall hatred and ill will, by the generalitie of the Citizens: his father seemed to haue a great speculation in his vices and vile conditions, for that he would oftē say to his secret friends, that the indiscreffion & arrogancie of his sonne, would one day be the cause of the ruine of his house. It is a good propertie of wisdom in fathers, to finde out the dispositions of their children, but it is a principall effect of their iudgemēt, to cut off with discipline all course of humours, that feede and minister to their naturall corruptions, which is an office no lesse iust in parents, then it belongeth to the art of the Phisition, first to seeke out the humour that offends, & then to apply the remedie proper to cure, and not to leaue the body to a settled infection.

Peter being now amazed with the perill, which with rashnesse he contemned afore, and seeing he fayled of the succours and aydes which were promised by the Pope and Alphonso, who as well for the losse of Ostia, & siege of the port Neptune, as for feare of the French armie by sea, had euen their hands and heads full: determined with a councell suddaine and particular, to go search of the enimie that safetie, which he hoped no more to finde in his friendes, following therein the example of his father, who, in the year 1479. being brought to desperate termes of daunger, by a warre which Pope Sixtus & Ferdinand king of Naples, managed against the Florentines, went to seeke Ferdinand in the towne of Naples, from whom he brought to Florence publike peace & priuate suretie. But it is a thing very dangerous for men to gouerne themselves by examples, if there be not a concurrence of the selfe reasons, not onely in generall, but euen in all particularities: & if things be not ruled with the same wisdom: and if lastly, ouer and besides all other foundations, the selfe same fortune haue not her part. Being parted from Florence in this deliberation, and not farre on his way, he had aduertisement that the horsemen of Paule Vrsin, and three hundred footemen sent by the Florentines to enter Serezana, were broken by certaine companies of the French, which were come scouring euen on this side the riuer of Magre, the most of them either slaine or made prisoners. This made him tarie for the kings safe conduct at S. Peters, whither went for his conduct and suretie the Bishop of S. Malls, with certaine Lords of the Court, in whose companie he arriued at the campe the same day that the king, with the residue of his strength ioynded him selfe to the vauingtard, which incamping before Serezanella, battred that rocke, but not with such successe as there was hope to carie it: After he was presented to the king, who entertained him with good countenance, but more in apparence, then in affection: he appeased immediatly all his displeasures, in consenting to his whole demaunds, which were great and immoderat: namely, that the fortresses, and Castels of S. Peter, Serezana and Serezanella, which were (as it were) the keyes of the dominions of Florence on that side, and the fortresses of Pysa, and the port of Lyuorne (members principall of their estate) should be all put into the hands of the king, who, for his part, should bind him selfe by promise and by his proper signature, to redeliuer them, as soone as he had conquered the kingdome of Naples: That Peter should do so much, that the Florentines should lend to the king two hundred thousand duckats, and that then he would receiue them into his alliance & protection. Touching the ratification of which promises, made with simple wordes, it was sayd there should be letters dispatched to Florence, by the which the king meant to passe: but the consignation of the castels and fortresses was not deferred: for, Peter ioyning meaning to his words, caused to be deliuered (without tarying) to the king those peeces, Serezana, S. Peter, and Serezanella, and not many dayes after, according to the agreement, the like was done of the peeces of Pysa, and port of Lyuorne.

The French men wondred, that Peter with so great facilitie accorded to things of so great importance, for that there was no doubt but the king would haue bene contented with farre meaner conditions. I will not let passe in this place without reapport, that which was suttelly answered to Peter de Medicis, by Lodowyke Sforce, arriuing the day following at the camp: As Peter in going to meete him to do him honour, excused him selfe that he had miscaried, for that Lodowyke was somewhat gone out of the way: he answered very properly: That the one of them two went out of the way, but perhaps (sayth he) it lights vpon your selfe, as reproching vnto him that he was false into so great difficulties and daungers, for not giuing faith to his counsels: But the euents of things falling out afterwarde, did well declare, that they both had gone out of the right way, but it was with a greater infamie and calamitie to him, who raysted into greater degree, made profession with his wisdom, to be the guide of all others.

This resolution and accord of Peter de Medicis, did not onely assure the king of the things of Tuskane, but it tooke out of his way all blockes and obstacles in Romagnia, where the Aragons began now much to decline: for, as it is a thing very hard to him that scarcely defendes him selfe from daungers imminent, to prouide in one season for the perils of another: So, whilest Ferdinand remained in suretie within the strong fort of Faenza, the enimie returned to the country of Imola, where, after they had with a part of the armie assailed the borough of Bukane, but in vaine, because by his litle circuite, small strength sufficed to defend it, and for his base situation, the country ranne ouer with waters: They tooke by force the towne of Mordane, notwithstanding it was very strong, and plentifully furnished with souldiers to defend it: but such was the fury of the artillerie, and such the desperat hardinesse of the French in the assault, (many being drowned as they passed ouer the waterie ditches) that there was no abilitie of resistance by those that were within, against who the victours accompanied their fortune with such bloudy crueltie, without regard to age or sex, that they filled all Romania with generall feares & astonishments. By reason of this accident, Katherine Sforce despairing of succours, accorded with the Frenchmen, to auoyde the perill present, and promised to their armie all commodities of the estates subiect to her sonne: the same being the cause that Ferdinand (now doubting of the wils of the of Faenza, yea & held it so much the more dangerous, to remaine in the midst of Imola and Furly, by how much he was well aduertised of the going of P. de Medicis to Serezana) retired neare to the wals of Cesena, shewing so great a feare, that because he would not passe neare to Furly, he led his armie by the hills, (a way more long and combersom) neare to Castrocara, a borough of the Florentines. And within few dayes after, hearing of the conuention which Peter had made with the French, for which cause the bandes of the Florentines forooke him, he tooke the way to Rome: Like as also Dona Federike being parted from the port of Lyuorne, retired with his armie towardes the kingdome of Naples, where begun to be necessarie for Alphonso, those armie which he had sent abroad with so great hopes to inuade the estates of others: for, his affaires were full of many aduersities. on his side, seeing that the siege of the port of Neptune not succeeding, he had led backe his armie to Terracina. And the armie by sea for the French, whereof were leaders the Prince of Salerno, and M. de Serenon, were discouered aboute Ostia, but yet giuing it out that they would not offend the states of the Church, they put no men on land, nor shewed any token of displeasure to the Pope, notwithstanding their king many dayes before had refused to heare Frauncis Percolthomini, Cardinall of Siena, Legat, sent by the Pope to his Maiestie.

But to returne to Peter de Medicis, after the Florentines were aduertised of the conuentions he had made, so greatly to the diminution of their territories, and with so slaunderous and dangerous a wound and gall to the common weale, there was no litle displeasure and discontentment throughout all the Citie: besides their great losses, their harts were moued against him, for that with a new forme and order of dealing, and contrarie to the examples of his predecessours, he had alienated without the counsell of his Citie, and solemne decree of the Magistrates, so great a part of the state of Florence: in so much, that to the bitter complaintes made against him, were ioyned the murmures and secret grudgings of the people, incensing one an other to rise and recouer their libertie, without that any of those that in their hearts bare fauours to the doings of Peter, durst either with force, or perswasion, set them selues against so great an inclination: Albeit the Florentines hauing no strength to defend Pysa and Lyuorne, had also no hope to turne the kings will from hauing them: yet because they would separate the counsels of the common weale, from the counsels of Peter, or at the least that that should not be attributed to one in particular, which appertained to them all in publike, they addressed to him many Ambassadors of those families, which were ill contented with the Medicis. But Peter knowing that that was a beginning of a mutation of estate, to the ende to prouide for his affaires afore greater disorders hapned, applied his deliberations to the time, and tooke leaue of the king, vnder colour to giue perfection to that he had promised. At this time also the king parted fro Serezana, to go to Pysa, & Lodowyke Sforce returned to Myllan, hauing obtained for money, that the inuestiture of Genes, graunted by the king a few yeares before to Iohn Galeas, for him and his issue, should be transferred to him and his posteritie: he went away very much discontented, for that the king would not leaue in his keeping (as he sayd he had promised) S. Peter and Serezana, which places seruing him as a ladder to rayse him to the Citie of Pysa, he demaunded as vniustly taken fro the Genoways, a few yeares before by the Florentines. But, when Peter was returned to Florence, he found the Citie estranged from him, and the mindes of his chiefe friendes in suspence, for that against their coucell, & against the oportunitie of the time, he had vndiscreetly gouerned all things: The communaltie also was drawne into such an vprore and mutunie, that as the next day after his returne, he would haue entred into the pallace, wherein rested the authoritie & great magistracie of the common weale, it was forbidden him by certaine Magistrats which kept the gate armed, of whom the chiefe was Iacques de Nerly, a young man of equall nobilitie and riches. This being spread abroad thorow the Citie, the people ranne with swift tumult to armes, being the more moued to this vproare, for that Paule Vrsin, who Peter had sent for, was at hand with his band of armed armed men. The aspect and consideration of these daungers, caused Peter (eftsoones returned to his house) and hauing lost both courage and counsell, and whilest the state declared him rebell, to flee in great hast out of Florence, following him Iohn Cardinall of the Church of Rome, & Julian his brethren, vpon whom in like sort were imposed the paynes ordeined against Rebels: he went directly to Bologna, where Iohn Bentiuole, desiring in an other that constancie and resolution of courage, which he could not show since in his owne aduersities, reprocued him bitterly at the beginning, for that not onely to his owne preiudice, but also to the ill example of all that oppressed the libertie of their countreys, he had so cowardly without the death of one man, abandoned such a greatnesse. In this sort, by the rashnesse of one young man, did at that time fall the house of Medicis from that rule and power, which vnder the name & apparance almost of a ciuill administration, it had obtained in Florence three score yeares: it began in Cosmo his great grandfather, a Citizen of singular wisdome, and infinite wealth, and for those regards very notable through all the partes of Europe: But much more was he recommended, for that with a wonderfull magnificence and hart truly royall, regarding more the eternitie of his name, then the profit of his posteritie: he employed more then foure hundred thousand duckats, in building of Churches, erecting of Monasteries, with other buildings of sumptuous costes, not onely in his owne countrey, but also in many places of the world: And his sonnes sonne Lawrence, a man for vnderstanding and iudgement, excellent, in counsell graue and singular, in liberalitie equall with his grandfather, and for greatnesse of hart, nothing inferiour, for ministration in the common weale, of authoritie more absolute, but for wealth, of lesse abilitie, and of life farre more short: gate generall reputation through out Italie, and with many straunge Princes, which after his death, was turned into a cleare monument and memorie, for that it hath seemed euer since, that the concord and felicitie of Italie ended with his life.

The same day the state of Florence fell into chaunge, the French king being in the Citie of Pysa, the townesmen in popular troupes with cries and showtings, ranne to him, and demanded libertie, complayning grievously of the oppressions and wrongs which they sayd they had receiued vnder the gouernement of the Florentines: certaine of the kings counsell assisting, assured him that their demand was iust, for that the Florentines held them in to hard seruitude. The king not seeing into the importance of their request, nor how farre it was contrarie to the contract of Serezane, told them, they should haue libertie: with the which aunswere the Pysans ranne to armes, throwing downe to the earth all the enseignes and armories of the Florentines, they put themselves into an absolute libertie so long desired: Notwithstanding, the king, contrarie to him selfe, and no lesse ignorant in the things he had accorded, would that the Florentin officers should still administer their accustomed iurisdictions, and on the other part, left the old citadell in the hands of the Pisans, and kept to him selfe the new, of farre more importance. In these accidents of Pysa and Florence, may be well discerned a true experience of the old saying, or common prouerbe as we call it: That men when their aduersities approach, lose chiefly that wisdome, with the which they might haue hindred or auoyded the ills that happen: And this is common to men and kingdomes, that draw towards their destinies, that when their ill fortune comes, it blindes their eyes that they can not discerne it, and byndes their hands, that they can not helpe it, making them instruments against them selues in the execution of their mishaps: for, both the Florentines, who in all times haue held the fidelitie of the Pysans suspected, seeing so daungerous a war at their gates, forgot to reuoke to Florence the principall Citizens of Pysa, as for their better suretie they had wont to call home a great number of them, vpon neuer so light occasions, or litle accidents: and P. de Medicis, seeing a concurrence of so many great difficulties together, was too much ouerseene, that he did not arme the place & publike pallace with such strength of straungers, as he had oftentimes done before in farre lesser suspition: That foresight had kept him still in his estate and rule, and such prouisions had much hindred those great mutations: But touching the affaires of Pysa, it is manifest, that that which gaue them greatest encouragement to make this commotion (naturally hating the name of the Florentines) was the authoritie of Lodomyke Sforce, who to that ende had intertained certaine intelligences and practises with some Citizens of the place banished for priuate offences: and the day present of the reuolt, Galeas de S. Senerin, who he had left to be alwayes about the king, incited the people to the tumult, by which meane Lodomyk perswaded himselfe, that the dominiõ of Pysa would fall speedily into his hands, not knowing that a litle after in such matter, was wrought the cause of all his miseries: But it is also manifest, that certaine of the Citizens communicating the night before with the Cardinall J. P. ad vincula, what they had desire and refution to doe: the Cardinall, who, perhaps till that day had neuer bene author of peaisible counsels, admonished them with wordes graue and well instructing, that they should not consider onely the superficiall and beginning of things, but see deeply that which with time, & in time may happen: he told them libertie was a thing precious, & of very vehement desire, well meriting that men should oppose them selues to all daungers, hauing a true and sensible hope to be able to defend it on all sides: But as touching their Citie, naked of peoples, and mearely drayned of wealth and substaunce, he saw verie weake possibilities to iustifie it against the power of the Florentines: and to promise to them selues that the authoritie of the French king should be turned to their protection, were hopes deceitfull, and an expectation too full of incertainties and doubts: for that albeit the moneyes and treasures of Florence should do litle with him, (as it is like they may preuaile a great deale, specially looking into the contract of Serazana) yet his armies would be alwayes in Italie, according to the experience and iudgement of examples past. Besides, it were too great an indiscretion to binde them selues to a perpetuall perill, vpon foundations frayle, and not perpetuall: and for most vncertain hopes, to leuie against enemies farre more mightie then they, a warre certaine and absolute, wherein they could promise them selues no succours, seeing they depended vpon the will of another, and that which more is, of verie diuerse accidents: yea, be it they should obtaine succours, much lesse were that to auoyde or shake of, but rather to redouble and make greater, the calamities of the warre, being vexed at one time by the inuasions of souldiers of the enemy, and tormented with the oppressions and infolencies of the men of warre that come to their succours. Which miseries (he sayd) would be so much the more grieuous to them to beare, by how much in the end they would come to see and know, that it was not for their proper libertie, they tooke armes, but for the imperie of a straunger, chaunging one seruitude for another: for that this is proper to all Princes, not to enter into the trauels and expenses of a warre, but to raigne ouer those for whom they fight: And yet your warre (sayth he) seeing the great wealth & neighbourhood of the Florentines, (by whom you shall find many and perpetuall vexations) you can not be able to sustaine, but with verie great difficulties.

king drawes toward Florence,

In this generall confusion of things, the king departeth from Pysa towards Florence, and is not resolued what forme he would giue to the affaires of the Pysans, he stayed in a place called Signa, seuen myles from Florence, to be aduertised, afore he entred the Citie: whether the tumult of the people were in any sort reappaised, who had not discontinued their vproares, since the day that Peter de Medicis was chased out of the Citie: he had withall this intention, to giue time to Monsieur D'aubignie, whom he had sent for, (to the ende his entry might so much the more astonish the Florentines) with direction to leaue the artillerie at Castrocare, and giue leaue to the five hundred men at armes Italians, which were with him in Romagnia, together with the men at armes of the Duke of Myllan, except the Count Ciaazze, which followed Monsieur D'aubignie with three hundred light horsemen: it was supposed by many tokens and coniectures, that the intention of the king was, to draw the Florentines by feare of his power, to yeeld vnto him the dominion absolute of the Citie: A thing which him selfe could not dissemble with their Ambassadors, hauing often recourse to Signa, to make perfect the accord that was contracted: it was without doubt, that the king bare a minde inflamed against them, and nourished many ill disposed meanings against their Citie, for that they sought to hinder him in his enterprise: And albeit it was manifest, that that resistance proceeded not of the will of the common weale, which in reasonable sort had iustified them selues: yet he could not easily forget and dissolue the impression of the offence, being (as it was supposed) much induced to their disfauours, by many of his counsell and Lordes: who, iudging it not meete to let passe the oportunitie to make him selfe Lord ouer the Citie, or perhaps pushed forward with their proper ambition and couetousnesse, were loth to lose the occasion to sacke a Citie, abounding in such treasures and wealth: in so much as there ranne a brute thorow the camp, that the Citie had deserued to be punished, to serue as an example to others; being the towne in Italie that had presumed to oppose against the power and armie of Fraunce. There were also of the chiefe of his counsell, that solicited him to restore Peter de Medicis to his former degree: for whom with a peculiar diligence about the residue, did labour labour Philip Lord of Bresse, brother to the Duke of Sauoye, being induced to that office by the priuate friendships and promises that had passed betweene them: in so much, that either by the perswasions of them that could do most, (notwithstanding the Bishop of S. Mallo councelled the contrarie) or by a hope to make the Florentines more inclined to his will by this feare, or lastly to haue occasion to take vpon the suddeine what part or way he would: the king wrote to Peter, causing also the Lord Philip to do the like, and aduised him to come neare to Florence, for that for the auncient friendship that had bene betweene their houses, and for his owne particular readinesse and good will shewed in the conſignation of the fortresses, he was determined to readresse him, & restore him to his first authoritie: But these letters found him not at Bolonia, according to the kings weening, for that what by the rough words of Iohn Bérinole, & doubt he should be pursued by the Duke of Myllan, and happily also by the French king, he was for his misfortunes retired to Venice, whither they were sent to him by his brother, the Cardinall remaining then at Bolonia. At Florence they doubted much of the kings will: and yet, not seeing with what force, or with what hopes they might resist him, they agreed as a counsell least daungerous, to receiue him into their Citie, hoping there would some meane arise to appease him. And yet making no account of their perils, and because they would be provided for all fortunes, they ordained that the houses of most of the Citizens should be secretly replenished with men naturall of the dominion of Florence, and that the Captaines which were in the pay of the common weale, (dissembling notwithstanding the occasion) should enter the Citie with many of their bandes and souldiers, and that euery one within the towne and places about it, should stand vpon ready garde to take armes at the alarme of the great bell of the publike pallace. After this the king marched to Florence with his armie, wherein was expresse no litle pompe, as well by the glorie and magnificence of those of his Court, as by them of the towne: he entred in signe of victorie, armed him selfe and his horse, with his launce vpon his thigh, & immediatly began to speake of composition, but that was not without many difficulties: for, besides the immoderate fauours which some of the French Court bare to Peter de Medicis, and the demaundes of money intollerable made by the king, he demaunded openly the imperie of Florence, alledging that according to the orders of warre in the Realme of Fraunce, he had lawfully wonne it, seeing his entry was armed, according to the customes of Conquerours: from which demaund, albeit he went in the end, yet sought he to leaue at Florence certaine men of the long coate, (so are called in Fraunce Lawyers, Doctors, & men of Iustice) as his Ambassadors, with such authoritie, that according to the institutions of France, he might pretende to be giuen to him for euer no litle iurisdiction: But on the contrary, the Florentines were obstinate to preserue their full libertie, hapning what perils so euer, in so much that communicating together with such a contrarietie of wils, albeit the mindes of both partes were continually kept in hoat and angry moodes, yet neither faction shewed readinesse to determine the difference by armes: for, the people of Florence giuen of long to the following of marchandize, & not to the exercise of warre, suffered no small feares, hauing within their own wals one so mightie a king with his armie full of nations vnknownen & furious: And to the French men was no litle amaze the consideration of the great multitude of peoples, who, since the dayes that the gouernement chaunged, had gathered boldnesse and audacitie aboue expectation: They were astonished besides at the common brute, that at the alarme of the great bell, there would flocke infinite troupes of people from all parts confining. In which common feare on both sides, at the noyse of euery false alarme that was heard, either part for his proper suretie, tooke armes, but not one did assaile or prouoke an other. The foundation which the king sought to worke by Peter de Medicis was supplanted, for that Peter wauering betweene the hope that was promised him, and the feare that he should be giuen vp as a pray to his aduersaries, asked counsell of the Senate of Venice, touching the kings letters: Truly there is nothing more necessarie in great deliberations, and on the other side nothing more daungerous, then to demaund counsell: And albeit counsell, is lesse necessarie to men discreet, then to such as are not tempered, yet no doubt the profites are not few which wise men reape by counsels; seeing no man hath that perfect wisdom to consider alwayes and know all things of him selfe, & in reasons contrarie or different, is able alwayes to discern the better part. But what assurance hath he that asketh counsell, to receiue counsell according to the faith he reapposeth: seeing if there be no equall fidelitie nor affection, but regard to particular interests, as profit, reuengé, or some other motion: he that giueth the coun-cell, dresseth it to that end which best aunswereth his purpose: So that those endes being for the most part vnknewen to him that comes to aske counsell, he perceiueh not (if he be not wise) the treason and infidelitie of the counsell. The experience was seene in the condition of Peter de Medicis: for, the Venetians iudging, that if he returned into his country, it would be a cause to giue the king a greater facilitie to his demaundes and desires of the Florentines, (a thing preiudiciall to them, and contrary to the course of their affaires) perswaded him by many liuely reasons, (counselling rather for them selues then for him) that he should not put him selfe in the power of a king of Fraunce, holding him selfe iniured by him: Wherein the better to encourage him to the imitation of their counsell, they offered him to imbrace his affaires, and as time and necessitie required, to minister to him all meanes and fauours conuenient for his restitution, wherefore the better to be assured that he should not then depart Venice, they set vpon him, (if the common brute be true) very secret espiall and guard. But now for Florence, in this meane while mens hearts were inflamed on all partes, and almost caried into manifest contention: the king would nothing abate of his later demaundes, nor the Florentines be bownd to summes of money so intollerable, and much lesse consent to any iurisdiction or preheminence in their estate. All which difficulties not being able almost to be dissolued without armes, were euen presently decided by the vertue of Peter Capponi, one of the foure deputed to treat with the king: this Capponi was a man of spirite and great courage, and speciall reputation in Florence, aswell for his partes and qualities, as for that he was of an honorable familie, and descended of personages, who had borne great rule in the common weale. As he and his companions were one day in the presence and audience of the king, and that one of the kings Secretaries read the vnreasonable capitulations offered by the king, at the last, he, in a great furie snatched the articles out of the Secretaries hands, and tare them before the eyes of the king, saying with a heart resolute, and voyce framed; Seeing you demand of vs things so dishonest, sound you vp your trumpets, and we will ring our bells, let all things be ruled by the sentence of the sword, and in the same heate flings with great suddenesse out of the chamber, being followed of his companions. The wordes of this Citizen whom the king and his Court had already knowen, for that a few monethes before he had bene in Fraunce in negotiation for them of Florence, astonished them all in such sort, specially for that they could not beleeue that such a boldnesse was without occasion: that they called him backe againe, and without speaking more of demaundes, whereunto the Florentines had no will to condescend, the king and the Citie fell to composition in this sort: That all quarrels and iniuries forgotten and cancelled, the Citie of Florence should be friend, confederate, and in the perpetuall protection of the crowne of Fraunce: That for the suretie of the king, the Citie of Pysa and towne of Lyuorne, with all their castels, should remaine in his hauds: And that he should be bownd to restore them to the Florentines, without any expenses or charges, as soone as he had brought to end his enterprise of the kingdome of Naples, the which should be construed to be at an ende whensoever he should haue conquered the Citie of Naples, or accorded the warre by meane of peace or truce for lesse then two yeares, or that for any other occasion his person should be gone out of Italie: That those that had the keeping of the sayd Castels, should be sworne from the present to render them in the cases aforesayd: That in the meane while the imperie, the iurisdiction, the gouernement, and the reuenue of the townes should be in the administration of the Florentines, as they were accustomed: That the like should be of S. Peter, Serezane, and Serezanelle: But (for that the Genoways pretended right to them) the king should procure either by composition or iustice some reasonable ende betweene them, and if within the time aforesayd he could not determine the titles, that then he should restore them to the Florentines: That the king might leaue at Florence two Ambassadors, and that during his expedition for Naples, there should be nothing debated concerning that action, without their priuitie and calling them to it: And that during the sayd time, they should not chuse a Captaine generall ouer their companies, without communicating with the sayd Ambassadors: That all the other peeces taken away or reuolted from the Florentines, should be immediatly rendred, and that they might be suffred to recouer them by armes, where deniall was made: That, to ayde the king in his enterprise, they should giue him fiftie thousand ducats within fifteene dayes, fortie thousand in the moneth of March, and thirtie thousand in Iune next comming: That the Florentines should pardon the Pysans their rebellions, and other faults committed during their reuolt: That they should deliuer Peter de Medicis and his brethren from condemnation and confiscation, with this condition notwithstanding, that Peter should not come by an hundred myles neare the confines of the dominion of Florence, (that was because he should not remaine at Rome) nor his brethren nearer then a hundred myles of the citie of Florence: These were the articles of most importance in the capitulation made betweene the king and the Florentines, which after they were lawfully passed and contracted, were, in great ceremonie published in the great Church at diuine seruise, where the king in person (at whose request this was done) and the Magistrates of the Citie, promised by solemne othe ypon the high altar, in the presence of the Court and the whole face of Florence, to obserue the contents of the same. Within two dayes after the king left Florence, & went to Siena, which citie being confederate with the king of Naples, and with the Florentines, had followed their authoritie, vntill the going of Peter de Medicis to Serezana warned them to looke to their proper safetie.

Siena, a Citie well peopled, and planted in a region very fertill, and which (of antiquitie) had bene the most renowned and mightie towne of Tuscanie next to Florence, was gouerned by a peculiar pollicie proper and particular to it selfe, but so, as it knew rather the name of libertie then the effectes: for that being diuided into many factions or members of Citizens, which they called orders, it obeyed that part which according to the accidents of times, and fauours of forreine Potentates, was more strong then the others: At that time held most rule and authoritie the order of Mont Nene. After the king had taried a very few dayes at Siena, he planted a garrison there, (for that hauing bene alwayes at the deuotion of the Empire, he held it suspected) and tooke his way to Rome, rising euery day more insolent then other, for his successe and fortunes, which were alwayes greater then euer were his hopes: And being also fauored with the ayre, and weather more then the naturall temperature of that season had wont to shewe, he determined to put diligence to his fortune, & vse those prosperities, not only as terrible to his enemies manifest and professed, but euen to those that were conioyned with him, or at least had not prouoked him in any thing: therefore, the Senate of Venice, and the Duke of Myllan, no lesse astonished with these successes, then doubtfull that the kings thoughts would not bee at rest by the conquest of Naples, (specially seeing him possesse of the fortresses of the Florentines, and to leaue a garrison at Siena) began for a remedie of their common daunger, to make a new confederation, whereunto, they had with more speede and ease giuen perfection, if there had bene made that resistance to the king at Rome that was hoped for, the intention of the Duke of Calabria (with whom were ioyned in one strength the bandes of the Pope, and Virginio Vrsin, with the residue of the Aragons armie) being to incampe at Vicerba, to giue impediment to the king for passing further: To this he was drawne, besides many occasions, by the oportunitie of the place, inuironed with townes of the Church, and neare the states of the Vrsins: but all the circumference and countreys about Rome, drawing into tumult by the incursions which the Colonnos made beyond the riuer of Tiber, and for the impediments of the vituals (by meane of Ostia) which should come to Rome by sea, he durst not abide there: he doubted withall, the intention of the Pope, for that since he vnderstood that Peter de Medicis was turned, he had begun to open to his eares to the demaundes of the French, for the which, and the reasons of them, Cardinall Askanius went to him, after, in pledge of his suretie, the Cardinall of Valence was come to Marina, a towne of the Colonnos: And albeit Askanius was gone without resolution certaine, for that Alexander distrusted much the intention of the king, and on the other side was in great feare of his forces, which bred no small torment and cōslict in his heart: yet after the king was parted from Florence, they returned efsouones to common of the accord: wherein for the more diligent accomplishment of things, the Pope dispatched to the king the Bishops of Concorde, and Ternie, and M. Gratiap his confessor, with commission that they should compound aswell for the affaires of Alphonso, as for his owne. But the king was of a contrary meaning, hauing settled his resolution to accord onely and particularly with the Pope: and for that cause he sent to him the L. de la Trimonille, and the President of Ganac being there also for the same occasion: the Cardinall Askanius & Prosper Colonne, who were no sonner come to Rome, then the Pope (for what cause I know not) chaunging aduise, bestowed the Duke of Calabria within Rome, with all his armie: he caused to be arretted Askanius & Prosper, and restraining them within the tower of Adrian, of old called the Castell of Crescence, and now named the Castell S. Ange, he demaunded of them restitution of Ostia. In this tumult also the French Ambassadors were made prisoners by the Aragons: The Pope caused them with a present speede to be redeliuered, and within a few dayes after, restored to libertie Askanius and Prosper, constraining them notwithstanding to depart suddenly out of Rome. After this, he sent to the French king lying then at Nepi, Cardinall Federike of S. Seneria, beginning to treat onely of his proper affaires, and yet in great doubt and declining of minde, for that some times he determined to stand to the defence of Rome, and therefore gaue sufferance to Ferdinand and the Captaines to looke to fortifie it in the parts most weake: and earst againe, he iudged great hardaesse & impossibilitie to defend it, for the impediments of vituals restrained by those of Ostia: In which respectes, waighing also with the infinit numbers of strangers, being of mindes and of wills different, the diuersitie of factions euen amongst the Romaines, he began to thinke to go from Rome, requiring in the Colledge that euery Cardinall would promise by a writing subsigned, to follow him: And euen standing amazed with the daungers and difficulties imminent, vpon euery one of his deliberations he turned his minde to accord: But whilest his minde wauered in these ambiguities, the French men forbore not to ouerrunne the whole country on this side Tyber, making them selues Lordes of one towne after an other, no place offering resistance to their incursions; no, not one peece or fort which gaue not place to their importunat furie, according to the example of the others, no, not such as had good occasion to oppose them selues against them, as Virginio Vrsin, drawne by so many bondes of faith, office, and honour to the house of Aragon, Captaine generall of the armie of Alphonso, grand Cōstable of the realme of Naples, & very neare parent to Alphonso, for that Iohn Iordan his sonne had married a bastard daughter to the late king Ferdinand. But he turning all things into forgetfulnesse, and as vnthankfull for the states and fauours he had receiued in the kingdome of Naples, as vnmindefull that the calamities of the Aragons were first kindled for his occasions, and nourished chiefly in his particular interestes: consented that (his person continuing still in the pay of the king of Naples) his children should compound with the French, and be bound to giue them passage & libertie of vituals and other friendships, through all the estates which he held of the dominions of the Church, leauing the French men not a litle amazed with his example and forme of dealing, being not acquainted with these subtle and vnaccustomed distinctions of the souldiers of Italie: he suffered withall that Campagnane, and certaine other places were put in deputation into the hands of the Cardinall of Gurcie, who promised to restore them so soone as the armie was out of the territories of Rome. This forme of agreement was vsed also by the Count de Petillane, with all the residue of the familie of the Vrsins. Immediately vpon these accordes, king Charles went from Nepi to Bracciane, a chiefe towne of Virginio, and sent to Ostia Louys the L. of Ligny, and Yues L. of Alegre, with fiftie hundred launces, and two thousand Swyzers: to the end that passing Tyber, and ioyning with the Collonnys, they might make a strength to enter Rome, and that so much the better, by how much the Collonnys, by the meane of their factions and partakers within Rome, had a resolute hope to make their entry in what sort so euer it were, notwithstanding by the season of the time being rough and stormy, the difficulties were much increased. By this time Ciuitaueche Cornette, and in the end almost all the territorie of Rome were brought to the deuotion of the French, when a man might haue seene all the Court amazed, all the Cardinals doubtfull, and all the communalitie of the Citie full of feares & emotion, demaunding vehemently peace: in so much that the Pope driuen to daungerous termes, seeing the foundations which he had layd for his defence, shaken on all sides, was not retained with any other thing, then with the remembrance that he was one of the first that stirred the French king to the enterprise of Naples: and had since without occasion giuen, obstinately resisted him with authoritie, with counsels, and with force: the same making him iustly doubt, that the faith which he should receiue of the king, should be like that the king had receiued of him. To these feares he felt an other torment, nothing inferiour, vnderstanding the Cardinall S. P. ad vincula was verie gracious in the kings fight, with many other Cardinals, his enemies bearing no litle authoritie and rule in the kings doings: By the perswasions of whom, and for the regard of the title of right Christian which the kings of Fraunce beare, and for the auncient name which that nation hath to be verie religious, and lastly for that in ill men the conscience guiltie and infected, suspecteth not onely the worst, but also their mindes caried in shadowes, they expect and dread great things of those that are knowen to them but by name onely: he feared least the king would turne his wits (according to a wayne brute) to reforme the gouernement of the Church: the same being a right trembling thought & coniecture to him.

him, when he remembred with what infamie he was come to the Popedome, performing his ministration with manners of life and meanes not differing from so fowle and vile a beginning: But he was cleared immediatly of these suspitions, by the diligence and promises of the king, full of efficacie and desire to aduance about all things his going to the Realme of Naples: and for that cause letting nothing passe that might take out of the way the blockes and impediments of the Pope, sent to him as soon as Ambassadors, the Seneschall of Beucaire, the Marehall of Gie, and the sayd President of Gannay: they laboured to perswade the Pope that the kings intention was not to meddle with any thing that appertained to the authoritie of Popes, and that his demaundes stretched not but to things reasonable and necessarie for the suretie of his passage: ~~They~~ ^{they} required him instantly to agree with good will to the kings entry into Rome, assuring him, that it was a holie and peculiar desire in his Maiestie: (Not that it was not in his power to make his entry by armes, but because he would not be constrained to forbear) to vse those actions of reuerence, which had bene alwayes done by his elders to the Popes of Rome: They assured him that as soone as his Maiesties person were possessed of the presence of the Pope within Rome, all those quarrels that had bene raised between them, would be conuerted into reconciliation, vnitie, and coniunction: It seemed to the Pope a hard compulsion, to despoyle himselfe afore all things of the ayde of his friendes, and committing his estate and life into the power of an enemy, to receiue him within the walles of Rome, afore he had compounded or assured his affaires: Notwithstanding, making election of the daunger that was of least qualitie, he consented to all their demaundes, and caused to depart out of Rome the Duke of Calabria, for whom albeir he obtained of the French king a safe conduct for his safe passage through all the dominions of the Church, yet the Duke, accounting it a diminution of his reputation and courage, refused it, & issued out of Rome by the gate S. Sebastian, the last day of the yeare 1494. at the same houre, that at the gate de S. Maria de Popolo entred with the armie of Fraunce, the French king armed, with his launce vpon his thigh as he entred Florence. At the same time the Pope full of incredible feares and perplexities, was withdrawne to the castell S. Ange, and not accompanied with other Cardinals then Baptista Vrsin, & Oliuer Caraffe a Neapolitan. But now began the Cardinals, ad vincula, Askanius, Collonne, & Sauelle, with many others, to sollicite the king with vehement instance, that taking from the sea a Pope full of vices, and abominable to all the world, he would create & set up an other: they told him it would be no lesse vertuous in him to deliuer the Church of God fro the tyranny of a wicked Pope, then it was great glory to Pepin & Charlemain his predecessours, to take the Popes of holy life out of the persecutions of those that did vniustly oppresse the: that the action was no lesse necessary for his securitie, then greatly concurring for his glory: for, there was no expectation of faith or trust in the promises of the Pope, being a man naturally full of fraude, insatiable in ambition, shamelesse in all his doings, & according to the testimonie of experience, extremely hating the French, with whom the reconciliation that now he made, was more by necessitie and feare, then of inclination or good will: partly by these perswasions, and partly for that the Pope in the conditions that were debated, refused to let the king haue the castell of S. Ange, for the suretie of those things he promised him: the artillerie were drawne twise fro the pallace of S. Marke where the king was lodged, to be planted before the castell: But the king bearing no inclination to offend the Pope, and the presents and promises of Alexander working much with some of those that gouerned most the kings counsels: they fell to accord in this sort: That the Pope should giue to the king, to hold for his suretie till he had conquered the kingdome of Naples, the Citadels of Cinitanechia, Terrachine, & Spolet, & yet this last was not put into his hands: That the Pope should keepe no remembrance of any offence or iniurie of the Cardinals or any Barons subjects to the Church that had followed the kings partie: That the Pope should inuest him in the kingdome of Naples: That he should giue to the king Gemyn Ottomā brother to Baiazet, who, after the death of their father, had bin persecuted by the sayd Baiazet, according to the barbarous customes of the Ottomās, seeking to establish their succession in the Empire, with the bloud of their brethren, their nearest kinne, & competitors: in which perill for safetie of his life, he was fled to Rodes, from whence he was brought into Fraunce, & lastly past ouer into the power & custodie of Pope Innocent: By which occasion Baiazet, seruing his turne of the couetousnesse of the Vicaires of Christ, as instrumēt to hold in peace the Empire enemy to the Christian faith, payed euery yeare (vnder the name of allowance towards his norriture and keeping) fortie thousand duckats to the Popes, to the end they should be lesse ready to deliuer him into the hands of other Princes to serue their turnes against him: The king was so much the more desirous to haue him, by how much he supposed to turne him to many vses and oportunities for the aduancing of his pretended enterprise against the Turkes, (being greatly caried into glory by the vaine flatteries of many of his fauorits) which he meant to begin as soone as he had accomplished the cōquest of the Aragons: And because the last fortie thousand duckats sent by the Turke, were taken at Singalle by the Prefect Rome, he required that the Pope would remit both the punishment and restitution. To these capitulations were added, that the Cardinal of Valence should follow the king three moneths as Legat Apostolicke, but in meaning it was to stand as ostage for the promises of his father. The accord thus made and past, the Pope returned to the Vatican, where is his pallace Pontificall: and after, with pompes and ceremonies accustomed at the receiuing of great kings, he receiued the king in the Church of S. Peter, & there (according to the manner) hauing kissed his feete kneeling, was afterwarde receiued to kisse his cheek: An other day he assisted in presence the Popes Masse, where he had his place the first after the first Bishop Cardinall, and according to the auncient custome, gaue water to the Pope celebrating Masse: which offices, humilities and ceremonies, the Pope, to continue the memorie to all posterities, caused to be curiously drawne in a table purtrayed, and hong vp in a gallerie of the Castell S. Ange. In this action, the Pope to gratifie the king, created and published Cardinals the Bishop of S. Mallo, and the Bishop of Mans, of the nation of Luxumburg, forgetting nothing that might expresse how sincerely and vnfaignedly he was reconciled.

The French king kisseth the Popes feete.

The kingdome of Naples beginneth to conspire.

The king remaining in Rome about a moneth, forgot not to send bands and troupes of soldiers euen vpon the confines of the kingdome of Naples: where was already such generall commotion, that Aquila, and almost all Abruzza, displayed ensignes afore he parted from Rome, as also Fabrizius Collonne occupied the quarters of Albe and Taille Cosse: The whole residue of the kingdome was almost in no more peassible estate, for that as soone as Ferdinand was parted frō Rome, the fruits of the hatreds which the people had long borne to Alphonso, begā to appeare, helping much the remembrance of many rigours which his father Ferdinand had vsed against them: vpon these they raised ready occasions to complaine vehemently of the iniquities of the gouernements passed, together with the cruelties and pride of Alphonso, expressing in these humours apparant desire that the French might come, and that in such sort, as the contemplation of the auncient reliques and monuments of such as held with the house of Aniow, albeit they were ioyned to the memorie of so many Barons as had bene chased and emprisoned at sundry times by Ferdinand, (things of them selues of great consideration, and of no litle power to worke a change) did litle in this time, in regard of the other occasions: so vehemently were the hearts of all the kingdome inflamed against Alphonso: who for his part, as soone as he vnderstood that his sonne was gone out of Rome, entred into such present feares and astonishments, that, turning all memorie or regard to the great renowne and glorie which with so long experience he had got in many warres in Italie, into a present despair not to be able to resist this fatall storme, determined to abandon the kingdome, and leaue to Ferdinand the name and authoritie royall: In this deuise perhaps he had hope that taking away with him selfe the generall hatred, and leauing to the people for their king a young Prince of great expectation, not yet hauing offended any of them, but gracious and plausible to the vniuersall multitude, he should make lesse in his subiectes their desire to haue the French: which counsell if it had bene sooner taken, would happily haue wrought to better purpose, but being differred, till things were not onely in motion and shaking, but euen beginning to fall, it was not able to stay so great a ruine. It was sayd also (if it be lawfull not to despise such things altogether) that the spirite of Ferdinand appeared three times in sundrie nights to Iames chiefe Surgeon of the Court, charging him first with soft and myld wordes, and after with many threatnings, to warne Alphonso from him, not to hope to be able to resist the French king, because it was a resolution in destinie that his race trauelled with infinite aduentures and fortunes, and depriued at last of so large a kingdome, should now end and determine: he sayd their enormities began now to appeare in iustice, and the many tyrannies by them committed were the causes, but aboue all others that, which by his perswasion he had done in the Church of S. Leonard in Caiaia neare Naples comming from Pozzolo: for that he expressed them no more particularly, men supposed that Alphonso had in that place perswaded Ferdinand to put to death secretly many Barons, whom he held prisoners long time before : But of what nature so euer was the occasion, it is most certaine, that Alphonso vexed with his proper conscience, liued day and night in a discontented spirite, for that in his sleepes the shadowes and ghostes of those dead Lordes were liuely afore him, and on the daies hee beheld the people prepared greatly to insurrections, for reuenge of his rigorous dealings. In which perplexity of minde applying his counsels to his fortunes, he communicated onely his intencion with the Queene his mother in law, keeping it from his brother or his sonne, and departed from Naples accompanied with foure light gallies loaden with implements rich and precious : he was so afflicted with dread and confusion, that at the earnest instance of his mother he would not stay two or three daies (a time to end the whole yeare of his raigne,) and at his departure expressing some timorous disposition of minde, as if he had bene enuironed with the french men: he sailed to a towne in Sicile called Mare, which Ferdinand the king of Spaine had giuen him in the yeare before: but his feares left not to follow him no more then his fortunes, shewing at euery brute or small noise, no lesse perplexity and terror, then if the heauens and elements had conspired against him.

As the french King departed out of Rome, he receiued aduertisement of the flying of Alphonso : and as soone as he was arriued at Vellitre, the Cardinall of Valence fled secretly from him. With the which albeit the Pope shewed him selfe much discontented, offering to giue the king such assurance as it pleased him : yet wise men beleued that it was not without his practise and commandement, as one that sought to haue in his power to obserue or not obserue the conuentions he had made with his maiesty : an action agreeing with his ambition, which most gouerned him, but farre from the office of his profession which he least esteemed, making nothing vnlawfull, for that he challenged to himselfe to haue power to dispence with all things. From Vellitre the vaunt-guard marcheth to Montfortyn, a towne of the Church seated in la Campagna, and subiect to Iacques a gentleman Romaine, who had at first followed the pay of the french King, but since (the hate he bare to the Collonnoys preuayling more with him then his proper honour) he was become mercenary to Alphonso : the place being well shaken with the great artillery, was taken (notwithstanding his strong situation) within fewe houres by the french, who executed by the sword all that were found within it, except his three sonnes, and certaine others that retired into the Castell, but made prisoners as soone as they saw the artillery planted : from thence the army marched to Mount S. Iohn, a towne of the Marqueffe of Piscaine, seated in the said Campagna, vpon the confines of the kingdome : this towne, besides it was strong by nature and industry of men, yet it was well furnished with souldiers to defend it, hauing in it three hundreth footemen straungers, and fise hundreth of the inhabitants well appointed for all daungers : In so much as it was not thought pregnable, but by a hard and long siege. But after the french men had somewhat searched the wals with their Canons, they gaue in the prefence of the King (then come from Vernue) so hot and violent assault, that vanquishing all difficulties, they tooke it by force the same day. And following their naturall fury, as also to warne others by this example not to be so obstinate to resist, they made lamentable slaughters, wherein sparing no sort of barbarous cruelty, they followed the desolation of the place with setting fire on houses : a manner of making warre not vsed in Italy in many ages before, and therefore filled the whole realme with more generall feares and terrors: for, in Italy in all victories obtained in what order so euer, the most extreame and last action wherein the Victor would stretch out his cruelty, was to disarm and spoile the souldiers, & so let them go vanquished: and for towns taken by force, to put them to sack & pillage, and the inhabitants to ransom, pardoning alwaies the life of men not slaine in the heat & fury of the fight.

This was all the resistance, the paine, and impediments which the french King had to conquer so large, so rich, and so populous a kingdome: for the defence whereof, there was not shewed in any fort any vertue, any courage, any counsell, any force, any faith, nor any desire of honor: for, after the Duke of Calabria, (after his going out of Rome, retired to the borders of the kingdome, and from thence called to Naples, by the flying of his father) had taken vpon him the authority and title of King, (but more with solemnities, then with pompe and ioyes accustomed) and that he had assembled his army contayning fifty squadrons of horsmen, & fixe thousand footmen of choise, and led by the best reputed captains in Italy: he encamped him selfe at S. German, to stop the enemy for passing further, being drawn thither by the oportunity of the place, enuironed on the one side with high & rough mountains, & on the other with a countrey full of marshes:

and waters, and had in the front the riuer of Garillan, which the Auncients called Lari, albeit it was not so deepe in that place, but at some times it was passible at a foord, by reason whereof, and that the passage is very narrow and straight, they say with good reason that S. Germaine is one of the keys of the kingdome of Naples. He sent also bandes and troupes to the next mountaines to keepe the way of Cancella, but all was in vaine; and in these doings he did no other thing then keepe his minde in languishing, like as the Surgeon tormentes his patient by applying variety of medicines to a wound that resistes all cures and remedies: for his army already stricken with a generall terrour with the onely name of the french men, declared apparant tokens of pusillanimity and faintnesse: and the Captaines and Leaders, partly tending the safety of them selues and their owne estates, distrusting already of the defence of the kingdome, and partly desiring innovations and new things, began to wauer no lesse in faith then in courage. Lastly, all the kingdome being in insurrection, it was not without feare, that at their backs should happen some perillous disorder: Therefore counsell giuing place to cowardize, and fraile feares ouerruling resolution and constancy of minde, vnderstanding after the taking of Mount S. Iohn, that the Mareshall de Gie was at hand with three hundreth launces, and two thousand footemen, they discamped with ~~chaunce~~ from S. Germaine, and retired to Capua with such confusion and feare, that they left by the way eight great peeces of artillery without guard, giuing the enemy a meane to helpe forward their destruction with their owne weapons. This city, the new king (reposing much in the amity of the towne towards the house of Aragon, and in the strong seate of the place) he hoped to defend, and to keepe also Naples and Caietta, not making distribution of his forces to other places. The french men went after, but disperfed and out of order, marching more after the manner of trauellers, then like men of warre, and without all regard either to keepe vnder their ensignes, or to be ruled by the direction of their Captaines: they tooke liberty to goe where so euer they thought to finde pillage: and so neare was the encounter of these two armies, that one part of them most often lodged the nights in places where the Aragons were dislodged in the mornings: Neither in Capua was any greater demonstration of vertue or fortune, for that after Ferdinand had there bestowed his army, much diminished in numbers since the retraict from S. Germaine, he was sent for by letters from the Queene, expressing that since the losse of S. Germaine, there were such murmures and mutinies within Naples, as without his presence, there was manifest daunger of a generall tumult: for which cause he went thither with a small company, by his presence to giue impediment to the perill present, promising to returne eftsouones to Capua the day following. Iohn Iacques Trinulce to whom he had left the guard of the city, had secretly sent to the french King for a Herald, to come vnder surety to speake with him, which being graunted, Trinulce with certaine gentlemen of Capua, went to Calui, where the same day the King was entred: This did Trinulce, notwithstanding that many others of the city well disposed to keepe their faith to Ferdinand, did speake against it with many braue and haughty words: but being presented to the King all armed as he came in, he told him in the name of the Capuans and souldiers, that they seeing their forces, defence, and strength, to faile in Ferdinand, whom they had faithfully serued whilest there remained any apparance of hope: were now come to make offer of their seruices to him, bringing mindes to follow his fortunes where so euer he will employ them vnder honest conditions, adding withall, that he doubted not to bring him Ferdinand himselfe, so that he would entertaine and acknowledge him as appertayned. The King made him this gracious aunswere, that he accepted the offers of the Capuans and the souldiers, as also the coming of Ferdinand should be no lesse welcome: onely that he should retaine no portion of the kingdome of Naples how little so euer it were, but that he would endue him with estates and honours in the realme of Fraunce.

*Iohn Iacques
eth to the french king.*

It may be doubted with what manner of inducements this Trinulce, a Captaine valiaunt and particular in the profession of honour, was drawne to reuolt and leaue his King: Touching himselfe, he affirmed, that he went by the will and direction of Ferdinand to sollicite some composition with the french, and being altogether excluded from all hopes, and the iudgement manifest that the kingdome of Naples could be no longer defended by armes, he thought it not only lawfull, but also allowable to prouide at one time for the safety of the Capuans, and security of the souldiers; but the common opinion of men made an other construction, referring his reuolt to a desire he had that the french King might be Victor, for that he hoped when he had made a conquest

of Naples, he would looke into the meanes by the which he might in like sort make him selfe maister of Myllan: in which city, he being borne of a most noble family, and because for the priuy fauours which the house of S. Senerin had with Lodowyke Sforce and with other occasions, he had not place according to his vertues and merites: he was wholly estraunged from Lodowyke. For those occasions many wise men iudged, that he had counselled Ferdinand to proceede in the actions and seruice of Romania, more temperately then perhaps the occasions required: But in Capua, afore the returne of Trinuice, all began to decline to reuolt, the souldiers had sacked the pallace, armories, and stables of Ferdinand, the men at armes made diuisions of them selues, and were bestowed in sundry quarters: and Virginio and the Count Petillane were retired with their companies to the city of Nola, belonging to the saide Count by the donation of the Aragons, sending first to the french king to demand safe conduct for them and their people. Ferdinand returned according to his word and promise, hauing somewhat appeased according to the time the humours of the Neapolitaines, by giuing them hope of the defence of Capua: he was come within two miles of the city all ignoraunt of the chaunge that happened since his departure: But the towne hearing of his returne and so neare approach, and the people wholly exclaiming against his reentry, drew into armes, and by a common voice and councill sent forth to meete him a certaine of the nobility, to aduertise him to passe no further, for that the city seeing he had left it abandoned, that Trinuice gouernour of the men of warre was gone to the french, his owne souldiers had made a spoile of his pallace, and Virginio and the Count Perslane left them to their fortunes, and that almost all his army was broken: they were constrained for their proper safety to giue place to the conquerour. With these newes no lesse heauy then troublesome, Ferdinand (after he had made vaine instance euen with teares to be receiued) returnes to Naples, being well assured that the example of Capua would draw the residue of the kingdome to reuolt, as the city of Auerse seated betweene Capua and Naples, drawne into emotion dispatched present Embassadours to offer them selues to the french king: And the Neapolitaines consulting also manifestly to doe the like, the infortunate king determined not to resist so obstinate a will of fortune, and therefore assembling vpon the place of the new castell many of the nobility and people, he deliuered to them this last and lamentable speech.

I may call God to witnesse and the consciences of all those men, that heretofore haue had any information of my thoughtes and conceites, that no desire made me more to aspire to the crowne; then to expresse to the world with what griefe I misliked the rigorous governments of my father and grandfather, and with a recompence more iust and plausible to reclaime by moderation and benefites those heartes and affections which they had lost by their hard dealing and cruelty: But the infelicity of our house would neuer suffer that I should receiue this fruit, which I esteeme more excellent and honourable then the kingdome it selfe: seeing that to be a King, is a thing that often times dependes vpon fortune, but to be such a King as to turne all his cares and endes to the welfare and felicity of his peoples, that dependes onely of him selfe and his proper vertue. These bee hard tearmes in nature, to detect my parentes, and chalenge their abuses to those, to whom nothing is more welcome then the occasion of reuenge, nor any thing further off, then heartes and affections to forgiue or forget. I could say enough to iustifie my selfe, for that it is easie for innocents to finde wordes to speake, but seeing there is so little comparison betweene their offences past, and the merite of my innocency present, it were but in vaine to vrge a hatefull remembrance of them, and yet nothing the more acquite you of the calamities that approach: No, in cases of aduersity it is a better temperance to prouide for the ill that is coming, then to amuse the time in complaintes against the Authors supposed, leauing the consideration of the cause to God, with whom no mortall creature hath familiarity in the vnderstanding and ordering of his iustice. I see our affaires suffer hard fortunes, and the extremity wherein they are fallne is of that nature, that we may complaine more to haue lost the kingdome by the infidelity and feares of our armies and Captaines, then our enemies can vaunt to haue wonne it by their proper vertue: And yet our fortune leaueth vs not altogether without hope, if we sustaine yet a little time, for that both by the King of Spaine, and all the Princes of Italie, is preparing a mighty succour, their eies being now opened that afore could not consider, that the fire which burnes our realme must in like sort (without prouidence) cast his flames into their seuerall estates: And for me, at the least, corage should not want to determine together

“ the kingdom and my life, both with that glory which becomes a yong king descended by so long “ succession of so many kings, and also aunswering the expectation which hitherunto you haue “ had of my merites and vertues: But because things can not be put to triall, without committing “ the common patrimony to desperate perill, I am determined rather to giue place to fortune, and “ keepe hid my vertue, then in struiuing to lose the kingdome, to be the causer of effectes contrary to “ those ends for the which I haue alwaies desired to be King. Therefore with teares I giue you this “ counsell, that standing no more against the fury of the time, you send with speede to make your “ accord with the french King. And to the end you may be in better power, to do it without stain “ to your honours, I absolue you willingly of the homage and oath which you made to me a few “ daies past: wherein I exhort you according to the necessity of your fortune, not to defer your o“ bedience, humility, and readinesse to receiue him, as by that meanes to stay the course of your “ proper aduersities, and helpe to moderate the naturall pride of that nation. If at any time their bar“ barous customes and manners cause you to hate their rule and impery, and desire my returne, I “ will remaine in place apt to minister aide to your will, and be ready to offer vp my life for the re“ dresse of your oppressions and harmes: But if their gouernment content you, this realme shall ne“ uer receiue vexation or trauell by me, your well doing and benefite seruing as a perpetuall con“ solation to my miseries: and that so much the rather, if I may know that there remaine in you any “ memory, that neither in the person of an eldest sonne to a King, nor in the power of a King, I haue “ done no wrong to any creature: My thoughts were neuer subiect to motions of ambitio, my mind “ neuer defiled with inclination to cruelty, mine owne sinnes bring me not this affliction, but by a “ diuine iustice I suffer for the wickednesse of my parents: I am determined not to be the cause, that “ either to preserue the realme, or to recouer it, any subiect of the same be oppressed: No, it is more “ sorrow to me to lose the meane to make amends for the transgressions of my parents, then to for“ goe the roiall dignity and kingdome it selfe: for, albeit I shall be estranged from you, and banished “ from my patrimony, yet I will not hold my selfe altogether wretched, if to the memory of these “ things, you ioyne a stedfast beliefe, that I would haue bene King rather like to old Alphonso my “ great grandfather, then to Ferdinand, or the last Alphonso. It cannot be that these words were de-“ liuered without great compassion: but albeit they wrought many sorrowfull impressions in the “ harts of the hearers: yet, it did nothing to the stay of the tumult, so hateful was the name of the two “ last kings to the people, and so sweete the desire of the french gouernment to the nobility: he was “ no sooner retired into the castell, then the multitude began to sacke his pavilions and hailes then “ pitched in the place: which being an indignity farre vnworthy his merits, and more then he could “ endure, he returned with great courage to the place to driue them from the spoile, the maiesty and “ presence of a King being yet of such authority in a city rebelled, that the souldiers restraining their “ fury, euery one abstained from pillage: but as soone as he was returned to the castell, and had set “ on fire and suncke most of the shippes in the haue (hauing no other way to depriue the enemy of “ them) he began by tokens certaine to doubt that the Lanceknights, which were the guard of the “ castell containing in number fise hundred, conspired to take him prisoner: and therefore the “ daunger being present, he vsed this sodaine counsell, to giue them his wardrobs, goods, and fur“ nitures that were within the castell, and whilest they were busie to diuide and share them, he slipt “ out of the castell by the gate of succours, deliuering first out of prison all the Barons that had “ bene restrained by the cruelty of his father: he mounted vpon the light gallies that attended him “ in the haue accompanied with Dom Federyke, and the old Queene wife to his grandfather, who “ caried with her Iane her daughter: and being followed with very few of his people, he sailed in“ to the Ile of Yschia, called by the ancients Enaria, distant thirty miles from Naples. On his way, “ so long as his eies were fed with the prospect and sight of the kingdom, he made many repetitions “ with a pitifull voice of this verse of the Psalme, That they watch in vaine which keepe the city, if “ it be not kept by the Lord. But finding now no more comfort of fortune, then when he was amidst “ the daungers of Naples, it fell to him to make triall of his vertue in Yschia, together with an ex“ perience of the ingratitude and infidelity of such as rise vp against those wretched persons that “ are persecuted with fortune: for the Castell keeper of the place refusing to receiue him but with “ one man onely, he fell vpon him with such furie, that what by his agilitie and valour, and the “ impression of a King and maiesty royall, he brought immediatly vnder his power both the castell “ and the keeper. This aduersity albeit was much inferior to the losse and priuation of his kingdome, yet it afflicted him no lesse, then if the action had bene of higher moment, for that in all miseries nothing more mitigates the perturbations of the minde, then to remember that the greatest mishap are past, as in sorrowes, it is a speciall comfort to know the vttermost: But fortune is infinite in her afflictions; and leaues no expectation of remedy where a ruine is determined, the same making good the experience of the old saying, that to the man vnfortunat one ill neuer happeneth alone, but when they begin to fall they thunder all at once. After Ferdinand was gone out of Naples, euery one gaue way (as to a violent land-floud) to the onely name and renowne of the victors, and that with such cowardize, that two hundredth horsemen of Monsieur Lignes went to Nole, whither Virginio and the Count Petilane were retired with foure hundredth men at armes, and tooke them prisoners without resistauce: either they had confidence in the safe conduct that was graunted them, or else their feares were no lesse then the others, seeing without triall or shew of valour, they suffered them selues to be ledde captiues to the rocke of Mondra- gon, and all their companies to suffer pillage and spoile. In this meane while, the Embassadours whom the Neapolitanes had sent to present to the french king the keyes of the city, found him at Auerse, from whence after he had accorded to them with great liberalities, many priuiledges and exemptions, he went to Naples, and made his entrey the xxj. of February: he was receiued with generall reioysing on all sortes, neither person, kinde, age, condition, quality, nor faction of men, sparing to runne to behold him, as if he had bene their patrone and first founder of the city: yea, there was a plentifull and willing presence of those, who either in them selues, or in their auncestours, had bene raysed to honours and estates by the house of Aragon: with this affluence and concourse of people, after he had visited the great Church, he was led (because the new castel was yet to the enemies) to be lodged in the castell of Capua, the auncient resort and residence of the kings of France, hauing with a wonderfull course of felicity farre aboue the example of Iulius Cæ- sar, rather vanquished then scene his enemy, and that with so ready fortune and facility, that during the whole expedition, he neuer had neede to display one pavilion or tent, and much lesse to breake a lance. And touching helpes and prouisions, he had so great plenty and superfluity, that his army at sea prepared with so great expences, being caried by violence of weather into the Ile of Corse, was so long in approaching the shoares of the kingdome, that the king had accomplished his conquest afore there was necessity of their seruice.

Thus by ciuill discordes which so long had blinded the Princes of Italy, to the great dishonor and scorne of the men of warre of that nation, and common daunger and ignominy of euery region of the same, was transferred one of the most goodly and mighty parts of Italy, and of the Empire of Italy, to an Empire and gouernment of a nation beyond the mountes: for, albeit old Ferdinand was borne in Spaine, yet, for that from his youth he had his trayning in Italy, either king or the sonne of a king, and holding no other principality in any region else, where together that his sons and sonnes sonnes were bred vp in Naples: I may with good right ap-proper them to the countrey, and call them Italians.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE Pyrians continue their rebellion against the Florentynes: The french king takes the castles of Naples: The Pope, the Venetians and other Princes make league against the King, who returning into Fraunce is fought withall neare the river Taro: Ferdinand wins againe Naples: Nouaro is besieged by the confederates: The king makes peace with the Duke of Mylan, and returnes into Fraunce.

IN the booke before haue bene set downe the foundations of the french warres in Italy, both out of what fountaine they sprong, and with what course and motions they had their proceedings, euen to an action of conquest farre aboute the memory and examples of all times and ages before. But as in all powers and causes naturall, this is a property infallible, to haue their reuolution by the same swift and violent returne, wherewith they did rise to their exaltation and fullnesse: So, the french king, rising with his felicity, into humours of security, saw the declination of his fortune and great triumphes, in the like measure and proportion of time by the which he aspired to them. And suffering together the priuation of the kingdome, with the honour of his new conquest, he shewed him selfe more happy to get glory, then able to keepe it. Then whilest things went in this course at Rome and the kingdome of Naples, there kindled in an other part of Italy, sparkes of a little fire, wherein was nourished a smothering heat, ordained to burst out to a great burning, to the hurt of many, but specially to the ruine of him, who, by too great a desire of dominion and rule, first kindled it and set it on flame: for, albeit the king was bound by the contract of Florence, that Pyza remayning in his hands till he had conquered the realme of Naples, the iurisdiction and reuenues should be administred by the Florentynes: yet, at his departure, he had set no order for the execution of his word and promise: in so much that the Pyrians, presuming much of the Captaines and souldiers left by the king for the guard of the city, did determine no more to returne to the obedience of Florence. And therefore expulping some of their officers and others that solicited there for the city, they made the residue prisoners, with confiscation of all their goods, and confirmed wholly their rebellion, both by demonstrations and actions. In this reuolt, to be the better able to continue it, they dispatched not onely Embassadors to the king to pray him of defence and protection to their doings, but also, for their stay and strength more assured, they recommended their cause vnder many arguments of compassion to the cities of Syena and Lucques, who, being auncient enemies to the name of Florence, could heare of nothing more to their liking and gladnesse, then of the reuolt of the Pyrians, to whom in coming they sent forthwith a proportion of money, and Syena apart furnished them with an ayde of horsemen. Inlike sort the Pyrians sent Embassadors to Venice, to sound the willes of the Senate, of whom albeit they were graciously receiued, yet they brought away nothing but hopes doubtfull and vncertaine: But they reposed their chiefe confidence and foundation in the Duke of Mylan; for that as he was the first breeder of their rebellion, so they hoped he would not faile to support them with succours, countenance and counsell. The Duke, albeit he made other shewes and demonstrations to the Florentines, yet he solicited secretly the confirmation of this reuolt, and breathing courage into them with many offers, perswasions and promises, he communicated presently with the Genoways, to furnish the Pyrians with armor and munitions, and to send to them a commissioner commissioner, with three hundred footmen. There hath bene ancient quarrell betweene the Florentines and Genoways, rising at first by the conquest of Pyfa, and continued by many degrees of displeasures, both for buying the port of Lyorne of their Duke Tomasin Fregosa which they possessed, and also the taking away of Pietra Santa and Serezana: The memory of these, ioyned to the occasion offered, was sufficient to arme them with a wonderfull readinesse to do all things that might annoy the Florentines occupying euen already many of their places in the countrey of Lunigiane, and were become Lords of the borders of Pietra Santa, vnder colour of a letter obtained from the french king for the restitution of certaine goods confisked. The Florentines, complaining of these actions at Myllan, were answered by the Duke, that according to the contract and capitulations which he had with them of Venes, he could not well doe any thing to the restraint and impediment of them: And labouring to content them with wordes and diuersity of hopes, he forbore not with a study more secret and suttile, to practise and execute the contrary, as one that nourished an ambitious expectation to draw Pyfa to his obedience, if the Florentines did not esloones recouer it, a thing much desired by him, no lesse for the quality of the city, then oportunity of the situation. Neither was this desire new, but had bene nourished in him euer since he was expulsed Myllan, a little after the death of Galeas his brother, for a iealousie which the Lady Bonne, mother and tutor to the little Duke had of him, at what time sojourning many moneths vpon the borders of Pyfa, he cast many plottes and deuises to get the rule and imperry of it: wherein, as touching the title, he was holpen with a record and memory, that Pyfa, afore it came into the iurisdiction of the Florentines, had bene possessed by Iohn Galeas Viscount, first Duke of Myllan: by reason whereof, he thought it would be an increase of his glory, to recouer that which had bene possessed by his elders, and seemed that he might pretend a coulour of right, in not making lawfull, that Iohn Galeas might leaue by testament (to the preiudice of the Dukes of Myllan his successours) to Gabriell Maria his bastard sonne, the state of Pyfa, which he had gotten, (albeit with the treasures and armies of the Duchy of Myllan: the Pyfans, not content to haue drawn their city from the obedience of the Florentines, sought to obtrude vpon all the places and peeces of the generall de Mayne, all which for the most part (in a generall sturre examples may doe much) following the authority of the city, receiued their commissioners euen in the first dayes of the rebellion, the Florentines making no resistance in the beginning, for that they were otherwise busied in affaires of greater importance, not hauing as yet composed with the french king, and did perhaps expect that he would apply remedy to those harmes according to his bond protested by publicke and solemne oth. But finding his order too slow and lingring, and happily answering the care he made, they sent thither bandes and companies, who esloones recovered partly by force, and partly by composition, all that was occupied except Casina, Bruti, and Vicopisan, into which places the Pyfans (being not strong enough to make resistance against the whole) had withdrawn their forces. Touching the king, the doings of the Pyfans did nothing displease him, and much lesse was the manner of their proceedings disagreeing from the estate of his endes and purposes: Their cause was apparantly fauoured of many of his court, induced perhaps by a compassion that they had bene straightly gouerned by the Florentines, the same notwithstanding being more in opinion then in truth: But some of the chiefeft both in his counsels and of his court, vnder the occasion to pity the Pyfans, objected them selues against the Cardinall of S. Mallo being wholly for the Florentines: of these was principall the Seneshall of Beaucaire, with whom the money of the Pyfans had much preuailed, but much more the discontentment he had of the greatnesse of the Cardinall, from whom (according to the variations of Court) he began to be estranged and separated, being moued with the selfe same ambition to embase him, with the which he had raysed him in the beginning. These men not hauing respect to that which concerned the honor and promised faith of so great a king, perswaded that it agreed best with the profite and estate of his other enterprises, to keepe the Florentines in this necessity, and not to moderate the doings of the Pyfans, at the least till he had made perfect his expedition vpon the realme of Naples. The king carried with these perswasions, framed him selfe to entertaine both the one and other party with seuerall hopes, and therefore whilst he remayned yet at Rome, he called for the Embassadors of Florence to heare in his presence the complaints made to him by the Pyfans, for whom spake The complaints of the Pyfans afore the french king. Burgundio Loli Citizen of Pyfa, and aduocate of the consistory in the Court of Rome: he complained bitterly, that the Pyfans had bene holden foure score yeares in such an vniust and cruell seruitude, that that city, which with many honourable victories heretofore had stretched out her jurisdiction euen to the parts of Lenant, and had bene alwayes one of the most mighty and glorious members of all Italy, was now by the severity and couetousnesse of the Florentines, come to her last desolation: That the towne of Pysa was almost made naked of inhabitants for that the most part of the naturall and free borne Citizens, not able to beare so heauy yokes, had willingly abandoned the place of their patrimony, possessions, and delights, whose counsell hath bene proued wise by the miseries of others, whom the loue of their countrey hath made to abide to serue as a wretched spectacle to all eyes of pity, conscience, or humanity. That they, for the great exactions of the Magistrates, and insolent robberies of persons priuate, were dispoyled almost of all their substance, and yet in no liberty nor way to nourish their liues, for that with a tyranny and iniustice strange and barbarous, they were forbidden to manage trades of marchaundise, or to exercise any art except of the hand. They had no acceffe or function in any office of quality, nor in the administration of the gouernment of Florence, no not in things which were transferred to persons strange and forraine: That the Florentines by many arguments exercised all sorts of cruelty against the health and benefite of their liues, and to haue a more ready way to their generall destruction, they haue of late yeares shaken off an auncient and necessary care to preserve the bankes and cawseys of the countrey of Pysa, maintained alwayes from age to age by the Lordes of that countrey with no small study, for that otherwaies it was impossible, (seeing the shallownesse of the contrey, subiect to inundations and water floods) that they should not be euery yeare stricken with diuersity of diseases: that by this decay, were made ruinate euen flat with the earth, Churches, Pallaces, with many honourable buildings both publicke and priuate, erected by their predecessours, with no little expence and charge: That it was no shame to particular cities or townes, if, after the raigne and course of many worldes they fell into seruitude, for that all mortal and earthly things beare their proper destiny and subiection to corruption: But the memory of their nobility and greatnesse, alwaies disposed into the maiesty of a gouernment or common weale, ought to breede in the spirites of conquerours more compassion then rigour, chiefly euery one hauing to consider, that it is not onely in the power of time, but also incident to the iust course and destiny of earthly things, to bring vpon them the selfe same end which is ordained to happen to all other Cities and Empires: That in the Pysans there rested no more, wherein the inhumanity and insatiable couetousnesse of the Florentines could be exercised with further scope: and therefore the yoke of those burdens bearing a waight aboue their strength, and the variety of their miseries so infinite and intollerable, they had with one minde determined, rather to abandon their countrey, to giue vp their liues, and to forbear the vse, society, and delight of their goods, friends, and kindred, then to returne eslooges vnder so vniust, so tyrannous, and so vile a gouernment: beseeching lastly the king with teares (which he besought him to imagine to be the plentifull tears of the whole people of Pysa miserably prostrate at his feete) to remember that with the same piety, with the same iustice, and with the same religion and conscience, he had restored them to that liberty, of the which they had bene so vniustly dispoyled: he would esloones as a Prince reolute and constant, defend and keepe them in the same benefite, seeing the election was more honorable, more godly, more worthy his name and greatnesse, to beare the name of the father and deliuerer of this city so ancient and innocent, then in redeliuering it vp into a seruitude so wretched, to become the infamous minister of the robberies, oppressions, and tyrannies of the proud Florentines. To these accusations answered, with no lesse vehemency, Frauncis Soderyn Bishop of Volterre, afterwards made Cardinall, and at that time one of the Embassadours for Florence: He shewed that the title of his common weale was iust, for that they had bought Pysa in the year 1404. of Gabriell Muria Viscount the lawfull Lord, by whom they were no looner put in possession of their purchase; then the Pysans redeliuered them selues by force; By which occasion they were driuen to seeke to conquere it by a long warre, whose end was no lesse prosperous, then the occasion was iust, and no lesse praiseworthy the humanity of the Florentines, then the victory glorious: for that hauing in their discretions to perish all the people of Pysa (languishing already with hunger) when they entred with their army into the city, they brought with them a greater quantity of victuals then of weapons: and so in place to take away their liues by iust law of conquest and victory, they breathed new liues with their refreshing and victuals, into bodies miserable and not worthy of life: That the city of Pysa at no time had obtained any greatnesse in the land, and much lesse had bene able in power to winne forraine and straunge peeces, seeing they could neuer make them selues Lordes ouer Lucques, a city communicating with them in neighbourhood and borders: but they stood alwaies restrained and inclosed in a straight territory, not seeking to make their fortune greater then was their vertue. And for their power at sea, neither hath it bene so mighty as there is left any monument of it, nor of such continuance as any prescription of time: for that, by the iust iudgement of God, whom they had prouoked by many actes of prophane impiety, and for a scourge of the long ciuill discordes amongst them selues, it was long time before the purchase of the Florentines, salne from all estate and great-nesse, & rayned of all wealth and habitants, and at last reduced to such a naked weaknesse, that one Jacques d'Appian a simple notary of the countrey, was of power to make him selfe Lord ouer them; leauing the city and territory as a succession to his children: That the land and countrey of Pysa was of little importance to the Florentines, except for the oportunity of the situation, and conueniency of the sea, seeing the reuenues that were drawn from thence were of little confideration, the exactions being so easie and light, that they exceede very little the necessary expences, and yet the most part were leuied vpon marchant strangers, and by the meane of the port of Ly-uorne. That touching trade of marchandise, artes, and offices, the Pysans were not bound with other lawes, then did regulate all other cities subiect to the Florentines, who, acknowledging to liue vnder a moderate and easie pollicy, had no desire to chaunge Lordes, not hauing in deede that obstinacy and pride of mind which is naturall in the Pysans, nor yet infected with a disloyalty so notorious, as it is made generall and famous by the auncient prouerbe of all Tuscane. And albeit, since the Florentines had gouernment in Pysa, sundry of the Citizens tooke a willing banishment: yet it concludes nothing against the Florentines, but detectes iustly their owne proud sto-mackes and impacience, bearing no mindes to accomodat them selues to their owne forces nor fortune. And much lesse that vnder the gouernment of the Florentines, Pysa is diminished either in treasure or inhabitants, seeing on the contrary they haue at a great charge recouered the hauen of Lyuorne, without the which their city would be no lesse vnprofitable then inconuenient. They haue also introduced the publicke study of all sciences, together with many other benefites, and lastly, diligently continued the reparations of the banckes; the better to replenish them with inhabitants. The truth of which things did shine with too cleare a light, then that the clouds of false complaints were able to ouershadow and darken it: he saide it was suffered to euery one to desire to aspire to a better fortune, but withall it was an office iust in all inferior degrees to beare without grudging the ordinance and sentence of their lot: otherwise there would be confusion of all Empires and gouernments, if it were suffered to euery one that is subiect, to aspire to liberty. Lastly he told the king that to the Florentines, it was neither necessary nor any way appertaining to their office, to perswade Charles a Christian king of Fraunce what he had to doe, for that being a Prince wise and iust, they doubted not that he would suffer him selfe to be caried by so vaine complaints and slaunders: that of him selfe he would remember him selfe of his promise made afore his army was receiued into Pysa, together with his word and oath of a king published solemnly at Florence, for that by how much a king is mighty and great, by so much is it more meritorious and glorious to him to vse his power and greatnesse for the preservation of his faith and iustice. The king hearing the differences thus disclosed by both the Embassadours, bare an inclination partiall to the Pysans, and wished that during the warre of Naples, there might be a sur-ceasing of armes betweene the two parties, or at least that the Florentines would consent that he might hold the whole countrey, assuring them that as soone as the conquest of Naples were accomplished, he would make perfect all his promises giuen at Florence. This the Florentines refused holding euen now for suspected all the kings words, and yet they forbore not with great constancy to presse him to keepe his promise: wherein, to make show that he would satisfie them (his intention in deede being to haue of them before the time lxx. thousand duckats which they had promised him) he dispatched at the same instant he departed from Rome, the Cardinall of *S.

 Mallo* as Embassador to Florence, making as though he sent him thither to satisfie their demands: But in secret he charged him, that nourishing them with hopes till they had made payment of the money, he should leaue things in the same estate: of which shift of time, albeit the Florentines made sufficient doubt, yet they aduaunced xl. thousand duckats afore the tearme, which as soone as the Cardinall had receiued, he went to Pysa, promising to recontinue the possession of the estate to the Florentines: But he made a speedy returne without any effect of his promise, and left answering the expectation of them of Florence, afore whom he excused him selfe by the obstinacy of the Pyfans, and that being not able of him selfe to dispose them, his authority was lesse sufficient to constrain them, hauing no expresse commission from the King. Lastly it was not conuenient for him being of holy profession, to take or follow any counsell whereon might rise effusion of Christian blood: yet he bestowed a new garrison within the new Citadell, and had done the like in the old castell, if he could haue got the consent of the Pyfans, who grew daily more and more in courage and forces by the secret helping of the Duke of Myllan, who iudging it necessary, that there should be within Pyfa a greater strength, and a leader of experience & valour, had sent to the (couering him selfe notwithstanding as he was wont with the name of the Genoways) Luke Mawerze, with new bands and companies. And letting passe no occasion that might keepe the Florentines in businesse, the better to hold them from offending the Pyfans, he entertained into pay in common with the Siennos, Iacques d'Appian Lord of Plombyn, and Iohn Sauelle, the rather to encourage the said people of Sienna to defend Montpalcian, a place newly reuolted from the Florentines and accepted by them of Sienna, without hauing regard to the confederation which they had together. At the same time also the Florentines were in no lesse care and trauell for sodaine businesse newly happened within the city: for immediatly after the King was departed from Florence, the better to reestablish their gouernment, they had in their parliament (which in their custome is a congregation assembled of all the Citizens in the place before the towne house, who deliberat with free voice vpon matters propounded by the great Magistrat) instituted a kind of policy, which, vnder the name of a gouernment popular tended in many things, more to the power of a few, then of euery one in generall: The which being grieuous to many, who fashioned in their mindes a greater liberty, and hauing the priuate ambition of some one of the principall Citizens concurring, there was necessity to dispute vpon a new forme of gouernment, wherein as it was commoned vpon one day amongst the principall Magistrates and persons of greatest reputation, Paule Anthony Soderyn, a Citizen, wise and much respected, deliuered his opinion in this sort.

P. Anth. So- Albeit the estate popular is lesse esteemed then that wherein things are referred to one alone; der in reaso- or gouerned by the directions of graue men: yet, for that the desire of liberty is a desire auncient neth touch- ent and almost naturall in this city, and the conditions and estate of our Citizens are equally pro-ing a forme portioned, which is a necessary ground of popular gouernments: I might maintaine by easie and of gouern reasonable discourse, that it ought to be preferred before all other, were it not that the disputatiment for Flo- tion would be superfluous, seeing in all our assemblies since the parliament, it hath bene alwaies rence. determined by a consent vniuersall, that the city should be gouerned in the name and with the au-Causes of po- thority of the people: But the diuersity of opinions is risen vpon this, that certaine particulars, in pular go- things ordained in the Parliament, seeke to come neare and resemble that forme of common uernment. weale, vnder the which the city was gouerned before our liberty was oppressed by the family of the Medicis and others, (of which number I confesse I am) supposing that the gouernment so established, bare in many things rather the name then the effectes of a pollicy popular, and fearing the accidents which often happen by like gouernmentes, desire a forme more perfect and more regarding the preservation and protection of the concord and surety of the Citizens: A thing which neither by reason, nor experience of times passed, can be hoped for in this city, but vnder a gouernment depending altogether vpon the power of the people, so that it be well and duely ordained and regulated, which thing consistes principally in two foundations: The first is, that all ministrations and offices as well in the city as through the whole demeane, be giuen (for a certaine time) by a counsell vniuersall, which according to our lawes may participate in the go-uernment; without the approbation of which counsell, new lawes can not be established: By this meane, not being in the power of Citizens priuate, nor of any particular faction or intelligence to distribute dignities and authorities, no man shall be excluded by passion or partiality of others, but offices shall be bestowed according to the vertues and merites of men: And ver-tue bearing this property to transerre dignities to those persons to whom her selfe is conioyned, it will be a meane and encouragement to euery one to strue by his vertues and good partes, with the aide publicke and priuate, to open his way to honours and reputation: it shall be necessary that euery one abstaine from vices, and forbear to hurt one an other, and finally eschew both the study and action of all hatefull things in a city well instituted. And it can not be in the power of one

one of a few to introduce with new lawes; or with authority of a Magistrate, an other government, this being not to be chaunged, but by the will and priuity of the counsell vniuersall. The second ground is, that the deliberations and counsels of importaunce, such as appertaine to peace and warre, to the construing and examination of new lawes, and generally to all things necessary for the administration of such a city or empire, be managed by Magistrates particularly appointed to that charge, and by a counsell more priuate compounded of wise and experienced citizens to be deputed and ordained by the counsell popular: for that the knowledge and iudgement of such affaires, falling not familiarly into the vnderstanding of euery one, it is necessary they be gouerned by such as are capable of them, and requiring oftentimes diligence and secrecy, they are not to be consulted or communicated with the multitude, as not being necessary for the preservation of the publicke liberty, that such things be handled in too great audience and company, seeing the liberty is assured as often as the distribution of Magistracies, and deliberation of new lawes, depend of the vniuersall consent. These two foundations thus laide, you haue a true popular government ordained, the liberty of the city grounded, and a perpetuall and commendable forme of common weale confirmed. There bee many other things which tend to make this government more perfect, but they are referred more conueniently to an other time, to the end not to confound in this beginning the mindes of men, which both suspicious by the memory of tyrannies past, and not accustomed to manage governments free, can not wholly know all things necessary to be ordained for preservation of the liberty: and there be things, which for their little importance and consideration, may without daunger be differred vntill a time more apt, and better occasion. No doubt, the Citizens will embrace more and more this forme of common weale, and being by experience, made daily more capable of the truth, they can not but desire that their government be polished and brought to his full perfection: Neither can it but be sustained and holden vp by these two foundations, which, how easie it is to lay and establish, and what fruite they bring, is not to be proued only by many reasons, but also appeares plainly by examples: for, albeit the government of the Venetians standes properly vpon gentlemen, those gentlemen yet are no other then Citizens priuate, and what for their numbers, so many, and for their conditions so diuerse, it can not be denied, that it doth not much participate with a government popular, although in many things it can not be imitated of vs: and yet it is principally founded vpon these two pillars and bases, by the which hauing bene continued by many ages, together with a liberty, vnity, and concord ciuill, it is risen to the glory and greatnesse which the world seeth. The vnity and strength of the Venetians hath not growen as many suppose, by their situation, for that in the same may be and haue bene many discordes and seditions: but it hath proceeded for that they had a forme of pollicy so well sorted and proportioned to it selfe, that necessarily it brought forth precious and wonderfull effectes, agreeable to the firme and sound foundations. Our owne examples ought to moue vs no lesse then straungers, if we consider in the contrary, that because our city had neuer a forme of government like vnto this, it was the cause that our estate and affaires haue bene so subiect to ordinary mutations, sometimes troden vnder feete by the violence of tyrantes, and sometimes rent and dismembred by the ambitious and couetous discordes of certaine particulars, and sometimes confounded by the vnbridled liberty of the communalty. Infomuch that where cities were built for the rest and happy life of the inhabitantes, our tranquillity, our felicities, and our ioyes haue bene the confiscation of our goods, with banishment and execution of our miserable Citizens. The government brought into the Parliament, differeth not from the pollicies heretofore ordained in this city, which being all infected with discordes and calamities, after infinit trauels both publicke and priuate, they finally ingendred tyrannies, like as in the time of our ancestors, for none other then these occasions, the Duke of Athens oppressed the liberty, and in the times succeeding, Cosmo de Medicis followed his example, whereof it is not to be maruelled: for, when the distribution of Magistracies, and deliberation of the lawes, haue not community with the common consent, but depend vpon the arbitration of the lesser number: then the Citizens not carefull of the publicke benefite, but seeking their profites and endes priuate, rise into sectes and conspiracies particular, whereunto are ioyned the diuisions of the whole city; a plague most certaine to all common weales and Empires: So that it can not but be a better discretion to eschew those formes of government, which by reasons and examples in our selues we finde to be hurtfull, and draw neare to those pollicies which with the reasons and examples of others, we discerne to be whole and happy. And thus much I take boldnesse to auouch (the tr^{ue} and sincerity of the matter much enforcing me) that the pollicy of our city running alwaies in that order that a few Citizens shall haue an vnmeasured authority, will proue to be a gouernment of a few tyrants, who will bee so much more dangerous then one tyrant alone, by how much the ill is great, and hurts more, by how much it is multiplied: And if there should bee none other ill or mischief at all, yet at least wise, what for the diuersity of opinions, and for the ambition and different couetousnesse of men, there could be no expectation of long concord: and discord, as it is hurtfull in all seasons, so it would be most dangerous at this time, wherein you haue sent in to exile one so mighty a Citizen, and wherein you stand depriued of one of the principallest parts of your estate. And lastly, Italy hauing euen in her heart and intrals forraigne armies, stands on all sides enuironed with manifest perill: albeit very seldome or possible, neuer it hath bene absolutely in the power of all the city to put order to it selfe according to our owne liking, yet seeing by the goodnesse of God you haue that power, lose not the occasion to institute a free gouernment, and so well erected, that not onely you shall be made happy by it whilest you liue: but also may promise the same to your posterity, and leaue as an inheritance to your children such a treasure and felicity, as your ancestours neuer had nor knew.

opinion reasoneth Guido Anth^{ony} Ves-pucci.

To the contrary of this, did reason Guido Anthony Vespucci, a lawyer notable for his iudgement, and no lesse singular for his facility and sharpnesse of wit: If the gouernment (saith he) instituted in the forme of Paul Anthony Soderyn, would as easily bring forth the fruits that are desired, as he hath liberally recounted them: sure we should shew great corruption in iudgement, reason, and discretion, if we would wish to our countrey any other sort of pollicy, & right vnworthy should we seeme of the reputation and benefits of good Citizens, if we would not embrace a forme of a common weale wherein the vertues, merites, and valours of men, should be aboute all other things honored and recompenced. But I can not see how it may be hoped that a gouernment put wholly in the power of the pepole, can bring forth so many benefites: seeing no man doubts but it is a lesson in reason, a triall in experience, and an authority confirmed by great men, that in so great a multitude can not be found that discretion, that experience, nor that order, as may be promised that they will preferre the wise afore the ignorant, the good afore the ill, and the experienced afore such as neuer knew what it was to manage affaires: for, like as of a iudge incapable and ignorant, can be no expectation of iudgements righteous and iust: so, in a people full of confusion and vanity, is no hope (but at aduenture) of election or deliberation wise or reasonable: That which in publicke gouernments, wise men and such as follow the study of no other affaires, can hardly discern, let vs neuer beleue that a multitude vnexperienced, ignorant, compounded of so great diuersity of spirites, of conditions and customes, and wholly giuen to things that concerne them particularly, can distinguish and know it: Besides, the immoderat perswasion that euery one will haue of him selfe, will kindle in euery one a couetousnesse of honors, not sufficing to men in popular gouernment to enioy the honest fruites of liberty, but they will aspire all to the degrees principall, and seeke to haue place in the counsels of things of most importance and hardnesse, for that lesse in vs then in any other city, raigeth the modesty to giue place to such as know most, and deserue best: And so nourishing our selues with perswasion that of right we ought to be allequall in all things (the power resting in the multitude) places of vertue, valour, and merit will be confounded, and this couetousnesse stretched out into the greatest part, will bring to passe that such may doe most as know least and merite lesse, for that being most in number, they will haue most power, opinions being rather counted then considered. These things well weighed, what assurance is there, that contenting with the forme which now you would bring in, they would not immediatly fall to disorder, and confound with inuentions new and lawes vnwise, which wise men could not resist, the waies to gouerne a common weale which had bene wisely deliberated and established: which things being dangerous at all times in such a sort of common weale, would bring farre more perill at this present, seeing it is the nature of men when they come out of one extremity wherein they haue bene holden by force, to runne with a swift course to another extremity without staying in the midst: euen so, men drawne out of a tyranny, if they be not restrained, run headlong into an vnbrideled liberty, which iustly may be called a tyranny: because in these actions a people and multitude is like to a tyrant when he giueth where is no cause of merite, and taketh from him that hath well deserued, confounding the degrees and distinctions persons; yea haply their tyrannie is so much the more hurtfull, by how much their ignorance (containing neither waight, measure, nor law) is greater then the malignitie, which yet perhaps is governed by some rule; with some bridle, or subiect to some limit: We ought not much to be moued with the example of the Venetians, for that in their behalfe the situation makes something, and the forme of gouernement receiued of long time may do much, together with the order and disposition of things ruled in such sort, that the counsels of importance rest more in the power of a few then of many, and their spirites happily not being by nature so futtle as ours, they are more easie to be kept quiet and contented. Besides, the pollicie of the Venetians standes not onely vpon the two foundations that haue bene considered, but for their perfection and firme-nesse it importes much that they haue a Duke perpetuall, with many other ordinaunces, which who would introduce into this common weale, should seeme to bring in innouations, and finde many resistances, seeing our citie takes not now her being, nor at this present the first time of her institution: and therefore auncient customes impugning often times common profit, and men suspecting that vnder collour of preservation of the libertie, there would be rayled a new tyrannie, wholesome counsels will be of litle force, euen as in a body infected and replenished with ill humours, medicines are not of that seruice, as in a body purged: for which reasons, and for the nature of humane things which commonly go impairing, it is more to be feared, that that which in this beginning shall be imperfectly ordained, will be wholly disordered with time, then to hope that by time and with occasions, it may be reduced to perfection: we haue examples of our own, and neede not the iustification of authorities and experiences of others; for, at what time hath the people gouerned absolutely this Citie, that it hath not bene full of discordes, that it hath not suffered deformitie and dismembring, and lastly that the state hath not immediatly chaunged? And if we stand so much vpon the examples of others, why do we not remember, that the gouerne-ment wholly popular, bred in Rome so many tumultes, that had it not bene for the science, diligence, and discipline of waire, the life of that common weale had bene short. Let vs remember, that Athens a most flourishing and mighty Citie, lost not for other occasion her Empire, and so fell into seruitude of the Citizens and straungers, then for that they did dispose of great affaires with the deliberations and counsels of the communaltie. But I see not for what occasion it may be sayd, that in the forme introduced in the Parliament the libertie is not there wholly found, seeing all things are referred to the disposition of Magistrates, and they not perpetuall, but changing, are not elected of few, but approued of many, and ought according to the auncient custome of the ci-tie, to be referred to the arbitrement of the lot: then they can not be distributed by factions, or by the appetite of Citizens particular: we shall haue a farre greater assurance whe the affaires of most importance shall passe by the examination and direction of the most wise, the most practised, and most graue men, who are to manage and gouerne them with an other order, an other secrecie, and an other iudgement, then would be expressed in a multitude or communaltie incapable of such things, sometimes when is least neede, prodigall in expences, and eftsouies in businesse great and waightie, so sparing and restrained, that often times for sauing a very litle, they fall into great expences and daungers, euen as men that leaping ouer a great blocke, stumble vpon a litle stow. Indeepe as P. Anboine hath sayd, the infirmities of Italie, & particularly of our countrey, is great and of no litle consideration, euen so the folly is so much the greater, when hauing neede of Phisitions experienced and wise, we will put our bodies into the hands of such as haue least skill and discreffion. Lastly, you haue to consider, that you shall maintaine your people in greater rest, and leade them most easily to counsels wholesome both for them selues, and to the benefite of euery one, in giuing them in the common weale a moderate part and authoritie, seeing if you re-ferre all things to their arbitration, there will be daunger that they will become insolent and wholly disagreeing from the counsels of your wise, careful, and affectioned Citizens.

In this counsell, whereunto was not admitted the great number of Citizens, the aduise then tending to a forme of gouernement not so large and popular, had caried it, if amongst the deliberations of men, there had not bene mixed authoritie diuine, pronounced by the mouth of Je-ronimo Sauonarola a Religious man of the order of Frier Preachers. This man hauing bin continually exercised for many yeares in the publike preaching of Gods word at Florence, and hauing ioyned to his singular doctrine, a generall brute of holinesse of life, had gotten in the opinion of most part of the people, the name and authoritie of a Prophet: for that at times wherein in Italie

 uonarola este-med for a Prophet in Flo-

was no other apparance in mans reason, then of common tranquillitie, would in his Scrib-Prophecie of the coming of forreine armies, with so great altonishment of men, that neither walls nor camps were able to resist them: which things with many others of other nature, he would assure that he did not foretell by discourse humane, or knowledge of the Scriptures, but simplie did foresee them by reuelation diuine: In these wonders and warnings he would sometimes touch the mutation of the state of Florence: at that time he detested publickly the forme of gouernement agreed vpon in the Parliament, affirming that it was the will and pleasure of God, that they did erect a pollicie mearely popular, in such sort that there should not be power in a few Citizens to alter neither the suretie nor the libertie of the residue: in so much that for the reuerence of one of so great a name, ioyned to the desire of many, such as were of the other opinion, should not be able to resist so great an inclination. Therefore this matter being many times propounded and debated, it was lastly determined, that there should be made a counsell of all the Citizens, wherein should haue no access (so it was spread in many places in Italie) the dregges of the people, but onely such as by the auncient lawes of the Citie might participate in the gouernement. In this counsell should not be handled, nor they should not dispose of other things, then of the election of all the Magistrats for the Citie & for the demaine, and of the confirmation of prouisions of money, together with all the lawes ordained before by the Magistrats & other counsels more priuate and straite. And to the end that the occasions of ciuill discordes should be taken away, and the spirits of euery one the more assured, it was prohibited by decree publick according to the example of the Aueniens, not to remember the errors and transgressions committed in the times past in the affaires of estate: vpon which foundations, might perhaps haue bene constituted a gouernement well regulated and established, if at the same time they had introduced all the ordinaunces which then came into the consideration of wise men: but such things being not able to be deliberated without the consent of many who for the memory of things past were full of suspicions: it was iudged and determined that for the present, the grand counsell should be established, as a ground and foundation of the new libertie, referring to accomplish that which wanted vntill a better oportunitie of time, and vntill (by the meane of experience) the publick vtilitie should be knowne of such as had no capacitie to know it by reason and iudgement: this was the course and condition of the affaires of Tuskane. But in this meane while, the French king, after he had with a readie fortune conquered the Citie of Naples, to giue a full perfection to his victorie, he had principally to looke to remoue two impediments: The one how he might get new Castell, and the Castell of the egge, which are two fortresses of Naples, holding good yet for Ferdinand, but for the towne of S. Vincent, builded for the gard of the haven, he had it without much resistance: his other consideration was, how he might reduce the whole kingdome to his obedience. In which two things fortune still followed him with a full sayle of her fauours; for, new Castell, the habitation of the kings builded vpon the banke or shoars of the sea, by the couetousnesse and cowardize of fife hundred Launceknights holding garrison there, was rendred, with condition that they might depart in safetie with all the goods and moueables they were able to carie: In this Castell was found great quantities of vittuals, whereof the king without consideration to that might happen, made prodigall liberalities to certaine of his owne people: And touching the Castell called the egge, built within the sea vpon a rocke, afore times parcell of the firme land, but now deuided from it by the operation of Lucullus, was ioyned with a narrow bridge to the next brinckes or shoares of Naples: they within the rocke, seeing them selues battered without ceasing with a perpetuall furie of the artillerie, which might well shake the walls, but nothing moue the rocke, agreed to yeeld vp the place, if within eight dayes they were not succoured. The Barons also and gouernours of the communalities, would go many dayes iourneyes to meete the French Captaines and companies of souldiers sent into sundrie partes of the Realme: whose example in yeelding, and the humanitie and inclination of the French in receiuing them, bred such a generall minde of reuolt in Cities, fortes, and peeces particular, that almost all the places of strength were rendred by those that kept them, either with no resistance at all, or at least without perill or difficultie: yea the rocke of Caietta notwithstanding it was made strong with men, vittuals, munition, and things necessarie for defence, yet after a few light assaultes, it yeelded to the discreffion of the victors. This felicitie of the king followed with so full streame, that within a very few dayes, and with a wonderfull facilitie, all the kingdome was brought brought into his obedience, except the Ile of Tschia, the Castels of Brondusia and Galipoly in Powylla, and in Calabria the rocke of Reggi, situate in the point of Italie right ouer against Sicile, the Citie holding for the king: and except also Turpia and Mantia, who in the beginning displayed the banners of Fraunce, but refusing to liue vnder the subiection of other then the king, who had already disposed them to certaine of his fauorits, they chaunged counsell, and returned to their first Lord. The like was done within a litle time after by the Citie of Brondusia, to the which the French king hauing sent no men, but vsing negligence where was nec^{ess}itie of care and counsell, did scarcely heare their Magistrates sent to him to Naples to capitulate: by which occasion ioyning with the oportunitie offered, those that kept the Castels in the name of Ferdinand, had good meane by perswasions to draw againe the Citie to the deuotion of the Aragons: by which example also, the Citie of Otrante lately declared for the French, and no creature sent thither to receiue them, continued not long in their affection: All the Lordes and Barons of the Realme (except Alphonso Daualo Marquis of Pisouire, who left within new Castell by Ferdinand, was gone to him when he perceiued the inclination of the Launceknights to yeeld: and except two others, who (for that the French king had giuen away their estates, were fled into Sicile), came to do homage to the new king: who, desiring to assure wholly so great a conquest by the way of concord, called afore him vnder safeconduit afore he had wonne the rocke of the egge, Dom Federike, who, as well for that he had remained many yeares in the Court of Fraunce in the time of the kings father, as also for that he touched his Maiestie in parentage, was much fauoured of all the Lordes of Fraunce. The king told him, he would induc Ferdinand (leauing all that was his in the Realme of Naples) with estates and large reuenues in Fraunce: And touching him, to recompence him liberally with all that he possessed there. But Federike, well knowing that his nephew was determined to accept no condition, except he might haue Calabria, answered with a countenance of humilitie and reuerence, and wordes graue and wise: That seeing God, fortune, and the good wills of men haue concurred in his present felicitie, to giue him the kingdome of Naples, Ferdinand was not determined to make resistance against so fatall a disposition, but, rather esteeming it no shame to giue place to a king so happie and mighty, he would no lesse then others, remaine in his obedience and deuotion, so that his Maiestie would contribute to him some part of the kingdome (touching Calabria by a secret meaning) to the end that dwelling therein not as a king, but in the condition of one of his Barons, he might honour the clemencie and magnanimitie of the French king, in whose seruice he hoped to haue once occasion to shew that vertue which his malicious fortune would not suffer him to expresse in the action of his owne safetie: That, nothing could turne more to the glorie of king Charles then that counsell, bearing resemblance and affinitie with the counsels of those kings whom antiquitie doth so much recommend vnto vs, who, by such operations had raysed their names to immortalitie, and established amongst peoples and nations, diuine honours: That, it was a counsell no lesse for his suretie then for his glorie; for that Ferdinand brought to his deuotion, the Realme would be assured to him, that he should not hereafter feare the chaunge of fortune, who had this common propertie: that as often as victories were not assured with moderation and discreffion, she would defile by some accident vntooken for, the vertue and reputation of the glorie gotten. But the king doubting that if he communicated any part of the kingdome with his competitor, he should open a way to manifest perill for the residue, Dom Federike parted from him without any thing doing. Ferdinand, vnderstanding of the rendring of the Castels, sayled into Sicile with fourteen light gallyes slenderly appointed, wherein he passed from Naples: This he did to be ready vpon all occasions, leauing the gard of the rocke of Tschia to Ianicke Daualo brother to Alphonso, both men of great valour, and of singular faith towards their Lord. But the French king, to take from the enemie that receptable very conuenient to trouble the Realme, sent thither his armie by sea, which arriued at length in the port of Naples, and finding the towne abandoned, they forbore to assaile the rocke, wherein, for his inuincible strength by situation, they discerned many impossibilities to preuaile: And therefore, to giue a greater helpe to their vertue, the king determined to assemble all the vessels of Prouence and of Genes, to take Tschia, and assure the sea which Ferdinand vexed some times: But their counsell and diligence were not equall to their fortune, seeing, according to the infirmitie of all their doings, all things had a slow proceeding, and were guided in most great negligence and confusion: for, the French king turning the prosperitie of his affaires to serue his vanities, his companies in like sort, by so great felicitie became more insolent then of custome, and let go at aduenture the affaires of importance, not receiuing into their thoughts any other impression then of feasting and pleasures: and such as were great in the counsels and fauours of the king, cared not but for their owne particular, and to draw of the victory all the profit they could, without respecting the dignitie or vtilitie of their Prince.

Gemyn Otto Turke, kept in refuge by

About this time died at Naples Gemyn Otto to the great displeasure of the king, who layed up in him many foundations and oportunities for the war he determined to make against the Empire of the Turkes. It was beleued his death was brued in a cup of poyson, which the Pope had giuen him, to worke his end in a certaine time: or that hauing deliuered him against his will, and so depriued of the fortie thousand duckats which his brother payed him yearly, he tooke for consolation that he that had takē him away, should receiue by him no commoditie or profit: or at least for enuy he bare to the glory of the French king: or lastly for feare, that things succeeding happily with him against the Infidels, he would afterwarde turne his thoughts to reforme the abuses of the Church, which being wholly aliened from the auncient deuotion, customes, and pietie, made euery day of lesse authoritie the Religion of Christ, euery one withall hauing an assured expectation that they would further decline before the end of his raigne, which being gottē by wicked meanes, was haply neuer in the memorie of mā administred with worse orders: And there were that beleued (for the corrupt nature of the Pope made credible in him all wickednesse) that Baiazet after he vnderstood that the French king prepared to passe into Italie, practised with him by the meane of George Bucciardin corrupted with money, to oppresse the life of Gemyn: And yet the king nourishing still his inclination to the warres of the Turkes (more vpon a greene humour of youth and volubilitie of mind, then by maturitie of counsell) ceased not for his death to send into Greece the Archbishop of Duraz, of the nation of Albania, who put the king in hopes by the meane of certaine factions of the banished, and other vaine intelligences, to stirre vp some commotion in that prouince: But new accidents constrained him to turne his spirits to new thoughts.

beginneth too late to feare
of the French.*

It hath bene set downe before, how the desire to vlturpe the Duchie of Myllan, ioyned to a feare that Lodowyke Sforce had of the Aragons and Peter de Medicis, induced him to procure the French king to passe into Italie, by whose comming after he had obtained his ambitious pretence, and that the Aragons were brought into those necessities, that there was no abilitie remaining to defend their proper safetie: A second feare both more great and reasonable then the first, began to occupie his thoughtes, his eyes, and all his senses: that was the seruitude and thraldome houering ouer him, and all the Italians, if the kingdome of Naples were ioyned to the power of the crown of Fraunce, desiring for that cause (as hath bene noted) that by the Florentines should be objected many difficulties and impediments against the resolution of his enterprise. But when he saw his Maiestie was easily ioyned with that common weale, and with the same facilitie had overcome all the impediments of the Pope, and lastly without resistance had pretailed ouer the Realme of Naples, the danger seemed euery day so much the greater to him, by how much the course of the French victories aduanced more and more with facilitie, fortune and felicitie. A like feare also began to stirre in the mindes of the Senat of Venice, who in all their counsels hitherto had constantly perseuered in newtrality, gouerning their abstinence with so great discreffion, no lesse in action then in demonstration, that there was no meane to suspect their inclination more to one partie then to an other: They had for Ambassadours with the king Anthonie Loredan & Domsnicke Trevisan, albeit they lingered so long to send them, that the king was not onely passed the mounts, but arriued at Florence afore they were presented to him: But now looking with iudgement and studie into the violent course of so great felicities, his armies running like a thunder, without resistance thorow all Italie, they began to esteeme as their owne the damage of their neighbours, and to feare least in the ruine of others, their destruction were also conspired, but chiefly the king hauing made him selfe Lord of Pysa and other fortresses of the Florentines, leauing garrison in Sienna, and almost wonne the like imperie in the state of the Church: they construed all to argumēt absolute, that the ambition of his thoughts was not limited within the Realme and rule of Naples: for these causes the Senate gaue willing care to the perswasions of Lodowyke Sforce, who as soone as the Florentines had yeelded to the king, had begun to sollicite them to ioyne with him in a common remedie against common dangers: wherein it was beleued, that if the French king had met with any impediments either at Rome, or at his entry into the Realme of Naples; they had altogether taken arme against him: But the kings fortune preuented their counsels; and in his victorie was more suddainesse and expedition; then in all the impediments that could be objected. The king also, doubting of the practices and factions of Lodowyke, had retained in his pay since the conquest of Naples, Iohn Iacques Triunlice with an hundred launces, vnder a pension worthie and honorable, and ioyned vnto him with many promises the Cardinall Fregosa and Obietto de Fiesque: the one for that they weremightie instruments to trouble and rayse emotions in the towne of Genes: and the other, for that being a chiefe leader of the Guelfes faction at Myllan, caried a minde much deuided from Lodowyke: To whom as yet the king refused to giue the principallitie of Tarenta, saying his bond had no force till he had reduced into his power all the Realme of Naples. These things being bitterly displeasing to Lodowyke, he restrained twelue gallyes which were armed for the king at Genes, and denounced the appointing of any more vessels there for the French seruice; which the king complayned to be the cause that he did not esstoones reassayle with a new supply the rocke of Tschia.

Thus suspitions and disdaynes growing on all partes, and the suddaine conquest of Naples representing to the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan the present perill of their estates: they were constrained to ioyne vertue to their counsels, and deferre no longer to put their thoughts in execution: wherein, for the furthering of their resolution and courage, they had the consideration of the mightie companies of confederats: for that to this the Pope was lesse ready (to whom the greatnesse of the French was fearefull and suspicious) then Maximilian king of Romaines wholly disposed, to whom aboute all other for many occasions of hatred to the crowne of Fraunce, and for the many iniuries receiued by the king raigning, the prosperities of Fraunce were hatefull. But the chiefe groundes and foundations whereupon the Venetians and Lodowyke wrought, were the King and Queene of Spayne, who being a litle before bound to the French king (not for other respect then to draw from him the Earledome of Rosillion) not to hinder him in the conquest of Naples, had cunningly reserued to them selues till that time a free power to do the contrary: for, (if their brutes be true) there was a clause annexed to the capitulations made for restitution of the Earledome of Rosillion, which bare, that they should not be bound to any thing that touched the preiudice of the Church: of which exception they inferred, that if the Pope, for the interest of his chiefe, desired them to succour the Realme of Naples, they had good right to do so, without breaking their faith, or corrupting their promises: To this they added afterwarde, that by the same capitulations they were forbidden to oppose them selues against king Charles, in case it appeared that the same kingdome did iudicially appertaine vnto him. But what difference so euer was betweene the truth and their constructions of things, it is certaine; that hauing got that they desired, they began not onely to giue hope to the succours of them of Aragon, and secretly to sollicite the Pope not to abandon their cause, but also, as they had in the beginning exhorted the French king with wordes moderat, as louers of his glorie and zealous to Religion, to conuert his armies rather against Infidels then the Christian nations: So they continued esstoones that course, but with so much more efficacie and wordes suspected, by how much the victorie of the king aduanced and flourished. And to the end they might couer their doings with more authoritie, and to nourish in greater hopes the Pope and the Aragons, (& on the other part giuing out a brute that they had regard onely to the gard of Sicilie) they were ready to send thither an armie by sea, which arriued there after the losse of Naples; but yet with equipage and furniture more in demonstrations then in effectes, for that it contained not aboute eight hundred horsemen mounted vpon iennets; and a thousand footemen Spaniardes. They vsed their apparances vntill the taking of Ostia by the Collonnoys, and the threatens of the French against the Pope gaue them a more honest occasion to aduance that which they had fashioned and resolued in their mindes. And following their deuise to an action and beginning, they protested openly to the king whilest he was at Florence by their Ambassadors, that according to the office of Princes Christian, they would take the defence and protection of the Pope, and the Realme of Naples (a chiefe of the Church of Rome) wherein hauing already begun (as soone as they vnderstood of the flying of the Aragons) to negotiate with the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan for confederation, they esstoones solicited them with a new instance, to communicate with them for their common surtie against the French men.

league against
king.

So that, aswell by the solicitation of the king of Spaine, as occasions of the time present, threatening indifferent perils to all the principalities in Italie: there was at length in the moneth of April and in the Citie of Venice, where were the Ambassadours of all those Princes, contracted a confederation betwene the Pope, the king of Romaines, the king of Spaine, the Venetians, and the Duke of Myllan. The title and publication of this league was onely for the defence of the states of one an other, reseruing places to whosoever would enter it with conditions reasonable. But they all being of opinion that it was necessary so to temper things as the French king might not hold Naples, it was agreed in capitulations more secret, that the bands of Spaniards arriued in Sicilie should be a succour for the recouering of that kingdome to Ferdinand of Aragon, who with a great hope in the wills of the people, laboured to enter into Calabria: That the Venetians at the same time with their armie by sea, should assaile the sea coastes of the sayd kingdom: That the Duke of Myllan (to hinder succours that might come out of Fraunce) should do what he could to get the Citie of Ast, wherein was the Duke of Orleans with a very small strength: That to the kings of Romaines and Spaine should be contributed by the other confederates a certaine quantitie of money, to the end that either of them should make warre vpon the Realme of Fraunce with a puissant armie: The confederats withall desiring that all Italie would be vnited in the same concord of will, made instance to the Florentines and Duke of Ferrara to participate with this league: But the Duke being dealt withall after the league was published, refused to take armes against the French king, and yet, with an Italian suttletie he consented that Dom Alphonso his eldest sonne should take pay of the Duke of Myllan for a hundred & fiftie men at armes, with the title of Lieutenant ouer all his companies.

But the cause of the Florentines was otherwise, hauing no lesse iust occasion to leaue the French king, then allured to the confederation with many great offers: for that immediatly after the publication of the league, Lodowyke offered them in the name of all the confederates (so that they would communicate in the league) all their forces to resist the king, if, in his returne from Naples, he would vex them, and to ioine with them as soone as might be for the recouering of Pysa and Lyuorne. And on the other side, they saw the king neither make reckoning of the promises he had giuen at Florence, and much lesse had in the beginning restored them to the possession of their townes, nor since the conquest of Naples redeliuered the Castels of the same: They saw him make his faith and othe inferiour to the counsels of those, who, fauouring the cause of the Pysans, perswaded him that the Florentines, as soone as they were restored would vnite with the other Italians: They saw also, that notwithstanding the great summes of money and other corruptions which they had bestowed vpon the Cardinall S. Mallo, yet he resisted coldly such as incensed the king against them, as one that would not for the loue of the Florentines come to contention with the great ones of the kings Court: Aswell in these causes generall, as in matters more particular, they found in the king by demonstrations manifest, that to the violation of his faith, he had ioined carelessse estimation of them, their merites, and amities: in so much that one day their Ambassadours complayning of the rebellion of Montpulcian, and summoning him according to his bond to compell them of Sienna to render it: he answered in scorne, what had he to do if their subiectes rebelled, because they were ill gouerned. But all these notwithstanding, the Florentines, framing their counsels according to the termes & necessities of their affaires, would not suffer disdayne to carie them against their proper profit, esteeming it to agree best with their present fortune, not to beare inclination to the requestes of the confederates: aswell not to prouoke against them of new the armie of Fraunce in the kings returne, as for that they would yet expect and temporise, and hope to haue restitution of their places by such as kept them: and lastly, for that they reapposed litle in those promises, knowing that they were hated of the Venetians, for the impediments which at sundry times they had giuen to their enterprises, and knowing manifestly that Lodowyke aspired to the imperie of Pysa.

“ can be no assurance nor perpetuities: So, about these times the reputation of the French began to diminish in the kingdome of Naples, for that making their prosperities serue to their pleasures, & gouerning all things at aduventure, they looked not to chase the enemy out of those fewe places “ yet holden by them, which they might easily haue done, if they had followed their fortune: They “ litle considered, that armes do litle aduance, where pollicie is not concurrant, and victory brings a very

A very short glorie, where the gouvernement is vnperfect. But much more began they to decline in opinion, affection, and friendship: for, albeit the king expressed many honorable aspectes and liberalities towards the people, in graunting throughout the Realme so many priuiledges and exemptions, as they amounted to more then two hundreth thousand duckats by yeare: yet other things were not redressed nor gouerned with that order and discreffion that appertained: for that the king, holding it an action inferiour to his authoritie and greatnesse, to heare the complaints and futes of men, referred ouer the whole charge of the affaires to such as gouerned him selfe, and they partly by incapacitie, and partly by particular couetousnesse, confounded all things: for, the nobilitie were not embrased with that humanitie they looked for, and much lesse had recompenses equall to their merites; yea they found many difficulties to enter into the chambers and audience of the king: There was made no distinction of persons: the merites and seruices of men were not considered but at aduenture: The mindes of such as naturally were estraunged from the house of Aragon were not confirmed: many delays and difficulties were subborned touching the restitution of the states and goods of those that were of the faction of Aniow, and of the other Barons that had bene banished by the old Ferdinand: fauours and graces were imparted to such as procured them by corruption and meanes extraordinary: from many they tooke without iustice or reason, and to many gaue without occasion or deseruing. Almost all offices and dignities were transferred to the French, in whom were also inuested (to the great grieve of the naturall Lords) all the townes of the demayne (such they call those that are wont to obey immediatly the king) things so much the more grievous, by how much the king had promised there should be no alteration of nature, estate, or possession of those gouernements. The discontentment of these things was much increased by the insolencie and naturall arrogancie of the French, aggrauated much by the facilitie of the victorie, which caried them into those opinions and weenings, that they esteemed nothing of the whole Monarchie of Italie, attributing that to their proper vertue and vallour, which chanced by their fortune and felicitie: And these publike and generall insolencies were made more intollerable by many priuate and inferiour abuses, as the armie being furried in many partes of the Realme, and the bands dispersed more at aduenture then by discreffion, liued in such vnbridled incontinencie, that those wiues and daughters that had escaped their dissolution in the time of hostilitie, were violently dishonored bearing the name of their hostes & friends. In so much as these doings drawing with them a suspition of a perpetuall seruitude, that loue, that desire, that affection wherewith they honored them before, had now taken contrary qualitie, and not onely turned into hatred, conspiracie, and accursings against them, but also in place of the malice they bare to the Aragons, there was new insinuation of compassion to Ferdinand, no lesse for the generall expectation of his vertue, then for the memory of the gracious speech which with so great sweetness and constancie he deliuered to the Neapolitans the day of his departure: the same so working that that Citie and almost all the kingdome expected with no lesse desire, an occasion to reappeale the Aragons, then a few moneths before, they had desired their destruction. Now began to be agreeable to them the name so hatefull of Alphonso, calling iust seueritie, that which they had wont to note in him for crueltie: and interpreting to true sinceritie of minde, that which wrongfully, they had wont to conster pride and fiercenesse: such is the nature of communalties and peoples inclined to hope more then they ought, and endure lesse then is necessary, alwayes thirsting after innouations, and neuer contented with the time present. This infection chiefly goeth thorow the inhabitants of Naples: who, of all the regions in Italie are most noted of inconstancie and desire of new things.

Before this new league was made, the French king had determined to returne into France with speede, moued more with a light fancie, and a vehement desire of his Court, then with considerations discreet or well tempered: seeing that in the kingdome of Naples remained vndecided many and great affaires of Princes and estates, and the parts of the Realme being not fully conquered, his victorie had not yetther iust perfection. But after he knew that so many Princes were drawne into league against him, he was much moued in his minde, and fell to deuise with his Lords what he were best to do in so great an accident, specially euery one assuring him that it was long since those Princes had consented in conspiracie against him. Those of his counsell were of aduise, that he should dispatch his departure, doubting that by how long he taried, by so much should he giue oportunitie to the difficulties to increase, seeing the Cōfederats would win time to make greater prouision, the brute running already that a great leuie of Almaynes should passe into Italie, & that men began to speake much of the person of the Emperour: They perswaded that the king would prouide that there might passe with diligence out of Fraunce, new bands of soldiers to the towne of Asi, both to garde that Citie, and to keepe the Duke of Myllan in necessitie to defend his owne countrey, and withall to be in readinesse to passe further according to the occasions and necessities of his Maiesties seruices: it was also determined in the same counsell, to labour with all diligence and corruption of offers, to separate the Pope from the other confederates, and to dispose him to transerre to the kings person the inuestiture of the Realme of Naples, which (notwithstanding he promised absolutely at Rome), yet he had denied it till that day, and with declaration that that graunt or concessio should not beare prejudice to the title & rights of an other: In a deliberation so graue, and amongst so many thoughts of such importance, was not lost the memorie of the affaires of Pysa: for, the king, desiring for many regards, that in him might remaine power to dispose of that estate, and doubting least by the ayde of the confederats the people of Pysa would bereaue him of the citadell, he sent thither by sea together with the Ambassadors of the town which were with him, six hundreth French footemen, who being arrived there, conceiued the same affection which others that had bin left there, had: for, being gouerned with desire to spoyle and pray, after they had receiued money of the Pysans, they went with their companies to encampe afore the towne of Librafrate, where the Pysans (whose Captaine was Luke Malmoze) had bin in campe certaine dayes afore, vpon an aduertisement that the Florentines had sent part of their bands to Montpulcian, and hearing of the approach of their enemies, were raised and gone the day before: but returning thither estoones with the supply of the French men, they tooke it in fewe dayes, for the Florentine armie sent to succout it, could not passe the riuer of Serele for the violence of waters, neither durst they take the other way by the walls of Lucques, for the ill disposition of that people, who were much moued, and fauoured greatly the libertie of the Pysans. These bands with those of the French that remayned of the conquest of Librafrate, ranne ouer the whole countrey of Pysa as enemies manifest to the Florentines: who, when they complained, the king gaue no other answer, then as soone as he should come into Tuskane, he would redeliuer all those places he had promised, desiring them to beare with patience that litle respite.

But the meanes of departure were not so easie to the king, as was ready his desire: for that his armie was not so great, as, being deuided into two partes, it was able to bring him into Asi without daunger, and to suffice both to auoyd the impediments of the confederats, and defend the kingdome of Naples against so many exactions as are in preparing. In which difficulties he was constrained (to the end the Realme should not be naked of defence) to diminish the prouisions reserued for his owne safetie, and yet to keepe his person from manifest perill, his necessities enforced him not to leaue in the kingdome so strong an armie as was needefull: so he determined to leaue there halfe of his Swyzers, and a part of the French footemen, eight hundreth launcemen of Fraunce, and about fife hundreth men at armes of the Italians which were in his pay, deuided vnder the ensignes of the Prefect of Rome, the Collonnoys and Anthonye Sanelle, Captaines who had tasted plentifully of his liberalities, in the distribution of the townes & estates of the kingdome, but specially the Collonnoys: for that to Fabricius he had giue the countrey of Alba & Talle-Cosse possessed before by Virginio Vrsini & Prospero, he had indueed with the Duchie of Tracette, and the Citie of Fondi, with many Castels which belonged to the familie of Caetane and Montfortin, together with many other peeces adioyning, taken from the house of the Comtes. To these forces, he made reckoning that in all necessities, he should vnite the forces of those Barons, who for their owne suretie, were constrained to desire his greatnesse: but specially he reappoled much in the powers of the Prince of Salerno, whom he had restored to the office of Admirall, and of the Prince of Bisignian: He created as Lieutenant generall ouer all the Realme, Gilbert de Bourbon Duke of Montpensier, a Captaine more esteemed for the greatnesse of his house, and that he did participate in the bloud royall, then for his proper vertue: he assigned other Captaines in many partes of the Realme, on whom he had bestowed estates and reuenues; of these the chiefe was Monsieur D'auigny, whom he had made great Constable of the Realme of Calabria: In Caiette, the Seneshall of Beaucaire whom he had raised to the office of high Chamberlaine: And in Abbruzzo Gracian a valiant Captaine of great reputation: promising them all in one generall faith and

and word of a Prince to send them speedy rescue of money and men : But in the meane while to enterthe the warre, he left them no other prouision, then the assignation of those moneys which should be dayly gathered of the reuenues of the Realme, which began already to wauer & shake, for that the name of the Aragons began to reuiue in many places : For, at the same time that the king would depart from Naples, Ferdinand accompanied with the Spanish armie that came by sea into the Isle of Sicile, was discended into Calabria, to whom flocked with a swift readinesse many troupes of the countreymen, the Citie of Regge rendring it selfe to him, whose Castell had bene alwayes kept in his name. At the same time was discouered about the shoares of Pouylla the Venetian armie by sea, ouer whom was Captaine Anthony Grymany, a man in that common weale of great authoritie : But neither for these, nor many other signes of chaunges to wardes, the king did not forbear, no not once suspend or linger his deliberation to go his way : for, besides that haply they were driuen by necessitie, the desire was incredible in the king and all his Court to returne into Fraunce, as though fortune that was sufficient to make them get so great a victorie, had bin so still able to preserue it for them: he did not remember that the getting of a victorie is referred to fortune, but the losse of a kingdome is imputed to the king, who standes then in most necessitie of counsell and discreffion, when fortune makes him belecue he is in most securitie: it is familiar with fortune to do more harme in one day, then she doth good in many yeares, vsing for her delite to rayse vp vaine men for her glorie, and suffer them esloones to fall with the waight of their proper vanitie and want of gouernement. In this time also held good to Ferdinand, the Isles of Tschia and of Lipara, which albeit were neare to Sicile, yet they are members of the kingdome of Naples: he held Reggi which he had newly recouered, & euen in Calabria, he commaunded Villenefine with the Castell, and places about Brondusa where Federik was retired; also Galipoli, la Mania, and Turpia.

Before the king parted from Naples, many things were in negociation betweene him and the Pope: not without great hope of concord: In which action was lent from the Pope to the king, & after returned to Rome the Cardinall S. Denis, and for the French king, M. Francis: The king desired greatly the inuestiture of Naples, and that the Pope, if he would not ioine with him, at the least that he would not be for his enemies, and that he would receiue him into Rome as a friend. To which demaunds, albeit at the beginning the Pope bare some inclination, yet, distrusting much in him selfe of the king, and esteeming that to separate him selfe from the confederats, and consent to the inuestiture, would be supposed a meane sufficient to make a faithfull recõciliation with him: he objected many difficulties to the other demaunds, & to that of the inuestiture, (albeit the king would condescend to take it vnder this condition, not to be preiudiciall to the rights of an other) he answered, that he wished the lawes might be looked into afore, to see to whom the right appertained: And on the other side, seeking to giue impedimēt by force to the kings entry into Rome, he sent to the state of Venice, and to the Duke of Myllan, to returnish him with succours & strength of souldiours; who, immediatly sent him a thousand light horsemen, and two thousand footemen, with promise of an ayde of a thousand men at armes: with which bandes ioyned to his own forces he hoped to be able to make resistance : But the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan considering afterwarde, that it was a thing too daungerous to send their strength and companies so farre from their own estates, seeing that neither the whole armie agreed vpon was yet in order, and part of their peoples occupied in the enterprise of Ast, and ioyning withall to these doubts the infidelitie of the Pope, remembred in a late experience when king Charles past that way, he called Ferdinand into Rome with his armie, and suddenly with a counsell chaunged, made him issue forth againe : they began to perswade him to withdraw to some place of suretie, rather then to aduenture his person to so great a daunger in striuing to defend Rome. These things increased the kings hopes to come to composition with the Pope.

The French king departed from Naples the twentie day of May : but for that he had not taken in the beginning with the ceremonies accustomed, the titles and enseignes regall of the kingdom: a few dayes afore his departure, he receiued solemnly in the cathedrall Church with great pompe and celebrations the royall ornaments, the honours, othes and homages, accustomed to be done to new kings. At this coronatiõ, the oration was pronounced in the name of all the people of Naples by Iohn Ionian Pontan, to whose prayes very cleare and shining for the excellency of his doctrine, his life, and ciuilitie of manners, this action brought no small stayne and a slander, for that as he had bene of long principall Secretarie to the kings of Aragon, and of very private and familiar authoritie, and the teacher and maister of Alphonso: so whether it were iustly the partes proper to Oratours, or to shew his affection to the French, he tooke too great libertie to speake in the dispraises and derogation of the kings by whom he had bene so much aduanced. So hard it is sometimes for a man to keepe in him selfe that moderation and those rules, which he following with so great doctrine, had taught to others writing of morall vertues, and by his wit and knowledge had made him selfe wonderfull to the world in all kindes of Philosophie and learning. The king led with him eight hundred French launces, two hundred Gentlemen for his garde, a hundreth launces vnder the Lord Triunlce, three thousand Swyzers footemen, a thousand Frenchmen, and a thousand Cascoyns, hauing ordained that in Tus-cane Camylla Vitellis and his brother should ioine with him with two hundreth and fiftie men at armes, and that the armie by sea should draw towards Lyuorne. Virginio Vrsin and the Count Petrellane followed the king without other gard or suretie then their faith not to go away without leaue: their cause, for that they reasoned that they were not iustly made prisoners, had bene disputed in the kings counsell, afore whom they alledged, that at the time they yeilded them selues, the king had not onely graunted to those that they sent, but also set downe in writing vnder his owne signature, their safe conduit, whereof being aduertised by their solicitors, which attended the dispatch of the Secretaries, they had vnder that trust at the summons of the first Herald that went to Nola, erected and displayed the ensignes of the king, and giuen the keyes to the first Captaine hauing with him but a few horsemen, notwithstanding their strength being foure hundreth men at armes, they might easily haue made resistance: They preferred besides, the auncient deuotion of the familie of Vrsins, who taking part alwayes with the faction of the Guelfes, had alwayes borne both in themselves and in all the predecessours of that house, perpetuall impressions of honour, reuerence, and seruice, to the crowne of Fraunce: And as from those regardes had proceeded, that with so great a readinesse they had receiued the kings Maiestie into their estates bordering vpon Rome: So therefore, it was neither conuenient nor iust, both hauing regard to the faith giuen by the king, and the merite of their operations and actions, that they should be holden prisoners. But they were answered with no lesse roundnesse by Monsieur de Ligny, whose souldiers tooke them within Nola: that the safe conduit, albe it was determined and subsigned by the king, yet it is to be vnderstood, that it was not perfectly giuen, but when it was confirmed with the kings seale, and with the seale of the Secretarie, and so deliuered to the partie: That in all graunts and letters pattenes such was the auncient custome in all Courts, to the end that if any thing were inconsideratly passed the mouth of the Prince, by reason of many thoughts and affaires, or for not sufficient information of things, it might be moderated and go forth with his due perfection: he alledged that the confidence of that moued them not to yeeld to so small a companie of souldiers, but they did communicate in the generall necessitie and feare, for that there remained no meane either to defend or to flie, the whole countrey about them swarming with the armies of the victors: That what they alledged of their merits was false, which if it should be affirmed by an other, them selues ought to denie it for their honour: for that it was manifest to all the world, that not of will or free consent, but to auoyd danger (leauing in aduersitie the Aragons, of who in prosperitie they had receiued great benefits) they agreed to giue the king passage thorow their lands: therefore seeing they were in pay of the enemy, and bare mindes estraunged from the name of the French, and that they had perfectly no safe conduit or suretie, they were made prisoners by good law and right of armes. These reasons thus auouched against the Vrsins, & sustained by the power of Monsieur de Ligny, and authoritie of the Capitonnys, who aswell for auncient enuies, as for the diuersitie of the factions, quarrelled them openly: there was no resolution nor sentence, onely they were commanded to follow the king, leauing them naked hopes to be deliuered when his Maiestie was come to Ast.

Their reasons are disproved by Monsieur de Ligny.

But albe it the Pope, (the confederates hauing counselled him to go his way) was not without inclination to be reconciled with the king, with whom he negociated continually: yet, suspicion and ielousie being strong in him, he nourished the king with hopes that he would attend him: and yet after he had bestowed a sufficient garrison within the Castell S. Ange, two dayes before the king should enter Rome, he went to Orniette accompanied with the Colledge of Cardinals, and two hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and three thousand footemen: he left behind him as Legat, the Cardinall of S. Anastasio, to receiue & honour the king, who entered by that quarter on the further side of Tyber, to the end to auoyd the Castell S. Angelo: and refusing the lodging that was offered him by the Popes cōmissiō in the Pallace of the Mount Vatican, he went and lodged in the suburbes: And when the Pope vnderstood that the king came neare to Viterbe, notwithstanding he entertained him with new hopes to cōpound with him in some place conuenient betweene Viterbe and Oruiette, he left Oruiette and went to Perouse, with intention (if the king tooke that way) to go to Ancona, the better to haue meane, by the comoditie of the sea, to retire to some place absolutely assured. All this notwithstanding, the king being not a litle discontented with his vniustfeares and ielousies, rendred the Castels of Ciuitanuochia and Terracina, reseruing Ostia, which when he came out of Italie, he gaue vp to the power of the Cardinall of S. P. ad vincula, who was Bishop thereof: he passed in like sort by the countreys of the Church, as thorow the dominions of a friend: sauing that they of Tuscanella refusing to receiue into their towne his vauntgarde, the souldiers tooke it by force, and sacked it, not without murder and slaughter of many.

After this, the king remained without any occasion at Sienna six dayes, not considering (neither of him selfe nor by the straite aduertisements of the Cardinall de S. P. ad vincula, and by Trinulce) how hurtfull it was to giue time to his enemies to make their prouisions and vnite their forces: neither did he recompence the losse of the time, with the profit of counsels or deliberations: for there was debated at Sienna the restitution of the fortresses of the Florentines promised by the king at his departure from Naples, and confirmed by many voluntary graunts on the way: And therefore, the Florentines, besides that they were ready to pay the thirty thousand duckats remaining of the summe agreed at Florence, offered to lend seuentie thousand more, and to send with him till he were arriued at Ast, Francisco Secco their Captaine with three hundred men at armes, & two thousand footmen. The necessity which the king had of money, the oportunitie to augment his armie, ioyned to the consideration of his faith and othe, induced almost all those of his counsell to perfwade effectually the restitution of the Castels and preeces of strength reseruing Petra Santa and Serezana, as conuenient instruments to draw more easily to his deuotion the hearts of the Genoways: But it was a resolution in destinie, that the matter of new calamities should remaine kindled in Italie for, Monsieur de Ligny, a man for his youth more ready to enterprise, then ripe in counsell, and whose experience had not yet wrought in him a perfection of iudgement, being borne of one of the kings sisters, and of no small fauours with him, made his lightnesse together with the disdain he bare to the Florentines, for that in all their sutes they addrested their meanes to the Cardinall of S. Mallo, the onely impediment to this deliberation, alledging no other reason then the pietie & compassion of the Pyrians: And touching the offer of the forces which the Florentines made, he despised them, vaunting that the armie of France was able to fight with all the men of warre in Italie knit in one strength: Monsieur de Pienes was a supportr of his opinion, for that he thought the king would bestow vpon him the iurisdiction of Pysa and Lyuorne: There was debating also at Sienna of the gouernement of that Citie, for that many of the orders of the people & of the reformers (to plucke downe the brotherhood of the order of Montenoue), made instance; that erecting a new forme of gouernement, the garde which they of Montenoue kept at the publike Pallace might be taken away, and the place supplied by a garde of French men vnder the leading of Monsieur de Ligny: And albeit this counsell was reiected in the counsell of the king, as a thing of litle continuance and impertinent to the time present: Monsieur de Ligny who had layed a vayne plot to make him selfe Lord of it, obtained that the king would take into his protection that Citie vnder certaine conditions, binding him selfe to the defence of it: and all the circumstances except Montpulcian: which he sayd he would not intangle him selfe withall, neither for the Florentines nor for the Siennoyes: The communalitie of Sienna (albeit no mention was made of any capitulation) chused by the consent of the king Monsieur de Ligny for their Captaine, promising him twentie thousand duckats by yeare, vpon condition, that he would keepe there a Lieutenant with three hundred footemen for the gard of the place, which strength he left there culled out of such as were of the French armie: The vanitie of which deliberations appeared immediatly, for that the order of Montenoue hauing eftsoones reconquered with armes their authoritie accustomed, chased out of Sienna the gard, & gaue leaue to Monsieur de Lisle whom the

The Venetians and Lodowyke Sforce prepare to stoppe the French kings returning into Fraunce.

But there were now great stirres and emotions in Lombardie: for the Venetians and Lodowyke Sforce (who had euen then receiued from the Emperour with much solemnitie the priuiledge of inuestiture of the Duchie of Myllan, and made publike homage and othe of fidelitie to the Ambassadours that brought them) raysed great preparations to stoppe the king that he should not returne into Fraunce, or at least to assure the Duchie of Myllan, to come to the which he must passe ouer so great a circuit and space of countreys. To these endes, euery of them readdressed their forces, and leauied of new, partly in common, and partly at expences separate, many men at armes, obtaining after many difficulties, that Iohn Bentiuole whom they had taken into their common pay, should sticke to the league with the Citie of Bologna: Lodowyke armed at Genes for the garde of the same Citie, ten galleys at his owne charges, and foure great shippes at the common expences of the Pope, the Venetians and him selfe: And being at the point to execute that

whereunto he was bound by the covenants of the confederation touching the towne of Ast, he sent into Germanie to leauie two thousand footemen, and conuerted to that enterprise Galeas S. Senerin with seuen hundred men at armes, and three thousand footemen: in so much as assuring him of the taking of that towne, and to achieue all things to his honour, (he was naturally very insolent in his prosperities) he sent this message to the Duke of Orleance the more to terrifie him: That hereafter he should forbear to vsurpe the title of Duke of Myllan; which title Charles his father had taken since the death of Philip Maria Viscounte: That he suffered not new bands to passe out of Fraunce into Italie: That he caused to returne home againe such as were already within the towne of Ast: And for the assurance of these things, that he should put the towne of Ast into the hands of Galeas S. Senerin, in whom the king might reappose trust aswell as in him, hauing the yeare before bene receiued by the king into the brotherhood and order of S. Michael in Fraunce: he vaunted much in the same kinde, of boasting of his forces, of the prouisions the confederates made to make head against the king in Italy, the great preparatiōs of the king of Romaines & the king of Spayne to moue war beyond the Mounts. But the Duke of Orleance was made nothing affrayd with these vaine threatens, and being well assured that there was made a new confederation, he studied to fortifie Ast, and solicited with great instance to send out of Fraunce new supplies & companies, who, vnderstanding that they were to be employed in the proper succours of the kings person, began with great diligence to passe the mountes: By reason whereof the Duke of Orleans not fearing his enemies, marcheth into the field, and takes in the Marquisdom of Saluce the towne and Castell of Galsimeres which Anthony Maria of S. Senerin possessed: which being knowen to Galeas, who had a litle before taken certaine small villages, retired with his armie to Anon, a towne of the Duchie of Myllan neare to Ast, neither hauing hope to be able to offend, nor feare to be offended: But the nature of Lodowyke alwayes inclining to entagle him self with enterprises which demaund great expences, & yet of a condition to flie & feare (yea euen in greatest necessities) things that brought costes and charges, was the cause to commit his estate into right great daungers: for that by reason of his very spare and needie payments, a very few footemen came out of Germany, & for the same niggardnesse, the bands that were with Galeas were diminished euery day: where, on the contrary, were increased continually the supplies that came out of Fraunce, who for that they were called to the rescue of the kings person, marched with such diligence, that the Duke of Orleans had already assembled three hundreth launces, three thousand Swyzers footmen, & three thousand Gascoynes: And albeit the king by a commaundement speciall and peremptory had aduertised him, that abstainig from all enterprise, he should stand vpon continuall readinesse and preparation to meete his Maiesty when so euer he should be sent for: yet (it is hard for a mā not to make reckoning of his proper profit & to resist it) he determined to accept the occasiō to possesse the city of Novaro, wherein he was offred to be put by two of the Orleans Gentlemē of the same citie hating much the Duke of Myllan, for that aswell vpon the as many other of the town, he had with vniust sentēce & iudgement vsurped certaine conduits of waters & other possessions: The enterprise & the manner of it being resolued vpon, the Duke of Orleans passed by night the riuer of Pan at the bridge Senuro, within the iurisdiction of the Marquis of Montferat, hauing in his companie the Marquis of Saluce: he was receiued by the conspiratours of the enterprise into the towne with all his forces, and found no resistance: And from thence making suddaine iucursions with part of his horsemen euen vntill Vigenena, it was beleued that if he had drawne drawne his whole army with speede towards Millan, there would haue risen no small insurrection, for the losse of Nouaro and the present face and consideration of troubles towards, kindled in the Millanoys a wonderfull inclination to reuolt and change: wherein Lodowike, no lesse timorous in aduersity, then insolent in prosperity, was seene with teares vnprofitable to acknowledge his cowardize (for the most part is ioyned in oneselfe subiect, insolency and timorousnesse) they also that were with Galeas, in whome onely consisted his defence, remayning behind, shewed them selues in no place to his rescue: but because the conditions and disorders of the enemy, are not alwaies knowne to the other Captaines, it happeneth often in warres that many goodly occasions are lost, there being also no apparance that so sodaine a mutation could succcede against so great a Prince, seeing withall it is a principall pollicy in Princes in seasons daungerous and conspiring, to make their strength at home free from feare, ieaousie, or suspition. The Duke of Orleans, to assure the conquest of Nouaro, determined to haue the castell, which the fift day accorded to yeeld, if within xxiij. houres they were not succoured: during which time, Galeas de S. Senerin had leasure to conuay his companies to Vigenena, and the Duke (who the better to reconcile the mindes of the people, had by proclamation called in many exactions imposed afore vpon the communalty) good respice to encrease and refurbish his army. All which notwithstanding, the Duke of Orleans hauing ranged his bands neare the walles of Vigenena, offered battell to his enemies, on whom fell so generall astonishment, that they were vpon the point to abandon the town, and passe the riuier of T. hesin by a bridge they had made vpon boates, and other matter necessary to their succours in the passage. The enemy refusing to fight, the Duke of Orleans retired to Trecas: from this time the affaires of Lodowike began to faile with a better gale, many supplies of horsemen and footmen arriuing in his army: for the Venetians being content that the charge to meete the french King, should be in effect to them alone, consented that Lodowike should call backe part of those bandes he had sent vpon the coasts of Parmesan, and withall they refurbished him with foure hundred stradiots: insomuch as the meane to passe further, was taken from the Duke of Orleans, who making a road with fife hundred horsemen euen to Vigenena, and the horsemen of the enemy encountering with them, a great losse light vpon the Duke of Orleans. This encounter gaue courage to Galeas S. Senerin, both superiour in forces, and nothing inferiour in fortune, to present battell to the Duke at Trecas. At length all the army being assembled (wherein besides the Italian souldiers, was arriued a thousand horsemen, and a thousand footmen of Alemans) incamped within a mile of Nouaro, whither the Duke of Orleans was retired with all his regiments.

The newes of the reuolt of Nouaro, procured the King being then at Sienna, to make way: and therefore he auoyded all occasions that might make his departure slow, or hinder his resolutions: wherein being well aduertised that the Florentines, warned by the perils past, and newly salne into suspition, for that Peter de Medicis followed him, albeit they had determined to receiue him into Florence with honours due to his greatnesse, yet for their more surety, they filled their towne with men of armes and piked bandes: hee drew to Pysa by the lands of the Florentines, leauing the city on the right hand: In the towne of Poggibonse met him Ieronimo Sauonarola, who according to his custome, vsing the name and authority of God to his purpose, shewed him vnder vehement inuectiues and gesture, that he ought to restore to the Florentines their towne, ioyning to his persuasions, threatnings absolute and terrible, that if he obserued not that he had sworne with so great solemnity, and that vpon the holy Gospels, yea almost afore the eyes and presence of God, a punishment would follow equall to his infidelity and perjury: The King made him sundry answers according to his inconstancy, hauing as little conscience to keepe his faith, as he had regarded to giue it: sometimes he promised the Frear to make restitution as soone as he was come to Pysa, and immediatly (wresting his promise and oth) he sayd he had sworne to the Pysans, to protect their liberty afore he made any oath at Florence: and yet he gaue hopes alwaies to their Embassadors, for the restitution of their peeces as soone as he was come to Pysa: where being arriued, the matter was estoons proponed in the kings counsell, for that the preparations, vnity, & strength of the confederats about the borders of Parma increasug daily, they begā to look into the difficulties to passe through Lombardy: for which cause many desired the moneyes & other succors offered by the Florentines: But to these councelles were contrary euen those Captaines and gentlemen who had resisted them at Sienna: They alleadged, that albeit there happened by the opposition of the enemy, any disorder or difficulty to passe through Lombardy, yet it were better to haue in their power the city of Pisa (whither they might retire) then to leaue it in the hands of the Florentines, who, hauing once reobtaind the places they demaunded, would be of no better worth then had bene the other Italians. They added, that in comparifon of commodities, it was very conuenient for the furety of the kingdome of Naples, to hold the port of Lynorme: for that the plot layd to alter the ftate of Genes fucceeding well to the King (whereof the hope could not be doubtfull) he fhould be foueraigne Lord almoft of all the feas, euen to the hauen of Naples: fure thefe reafons were able to doe much in the mind of the King, as yet little capable to choofe the beft counsell: but of farre greater power were the petitions and teares of the Pifans, who in great concurfe of men, women, and children, fometimes prostrate at the Kings feete, and elfefoones recommending to euery one (yea euen the leaft of his Court, and the fouldiers, with lamentable cryings and compaints bewayled their miferies and calamities to come) the infatiable hatred of the Florentines, and the laft defolation of their countrey: which fhould not haue caufe to lament for any other thing, then for that his maiefty had put them in liberty, and promifed to protect them in it in affurance whereof, they beleeuing the word of a right Chriftian King of Fraunce, to be a word firme and refolute, they had taken boldneffe fo much the more to prouoke the hatred of the Florentines: with thefe complaints and exclamations accompanied with the prefent afpect and view of their miferies, they defcended with fuch compaffion into the harts euen of the moft fimple men at armes, the archers of the army, and many of the Swizzers; that they went in great numbers and tumult to the King, whom (Salzart one of the Pensioners fpeaking in the name of them all) they befought with inftance, vehement, and humble; that for the honour of his perfon, for the glory of the Crowne of Fraunce, and for the confolation of fo many of his feruants, prepared alwaies to put their liues in hazard for him, and who perfwaded him with a faith more loyall, fimple, and innocent, then fuch as were corrupted with the money of the Florentines, he would not take from thofe poore and naked Pifans, the benefite which fo graciously he had beftowed vpon them: They offered him, that if for want of money, he fuffered him felfe to be caried into a deliberation fo infamous, he fhould rather take their chaines, their iewels, and their treafures, yea and retaine in his hand their paies and pensions which they were to receiue of him. This vehement affection of the fouldiers tooke fo great a liberty, that a fimple Archer had boldneffe to threaten the Cardinall of S. Mallo; and others by his example with iealous and braue fpeeches quarrelled with the Marefhall of Gie, and Prefident of Gannay, whom they knew to labour the redeliuery of the Pifans to the feruitude of Florence. Infomuch that the King fomewhat confused by fo great a variety of his people, let things hang in fufpence, and was fo farre off to take any certaine refolution, that at one time he promifed the Pifans neuer to paffe them into the power of the Florentines; and the Embaffadours of Florence attending at Lucquea, he gaue intelligence, that that which he did not at that prefent for iuft occafions, he would doe immediately after he was arriued in Aff; willing that their common weale fhould fend Embaffadours thither.

reth to the furprifing of Genes.

The King departed from Pisa after he had chaunged the Captaine, and left fufficient garrifon within the Citadell, doing the like in the other fortrefles and peeces of defence: and as it agreed with the greenneffe of his youth to embrace enterprifes, and no leffe equall to his greatneffe and title to nourifh ambition; fo carrying a defire incredible to conquere the towne of Genes, being fet on by the Cardinals of Rouere and Fregofe, and by Obetto de Fiefquò, and others of the banifhed, who gaue him hopes of a fodaine mutation there: he fent with them from Serazama (contrary to the opinion of all his counsell, who allowed not to diminifh the forces of the army) the Lord Phillip de Brexe, brother to the Duke of Sauoy, with fixe hundreth lances, and fiue hundred footemen newly arriued out of Fraunce by fea, ordaying that the men at armes of the Vicellies coming behind with a flow march, and therefore not able in time to ioyne with him, fhould follow them: and that certaine others of the banifhed, together with the bandes fupplied by the Duke of Sauoy, fhould enter the riuer of the West. And laftly, that the army by fea, reduced to feauen gallies, two gallions, and two foyftes led by the Captaine Miols, fhould go to make backe to the army by land.

By this time the vanguard guided by the Marefhall of Gie, was come to Pontreme, which towne, after it had difmiffed three hundred footmen ftrangers, left there for the gard of the place, did yeeld fodainly by the meane of Trinuice, with couenant, that they fhould not be vexed, neither in their perfons, nor in their goods: but the faith giuen by the Captaines, could doe little for the furety of the

The towne, for that the Swizzers, whose fury being long kept smothered, burst out now to a greater flame & taking occasion of reuenge, for that when the army going to Naples passing through Punigiana, about xl. of their nation (for a quarrell hapning at aduventure) were slaine by the of Pontremia: they sacked & burnt the towne, after they had made barbarous slaughters of the inhabitants.

In these times, the army of the confederates assembled diligently about the borders of Parma: The army of the confederates. they contayned about two thousand, two hundred men at armes, eight thousand footemen, and more then two thousand light horsemen, the most part Albanous & of the prouinces near to Greece, who brought into Italy by the Venetians, retained the same name they had in their countrey, and were called Stradiots: of this army the sinewes and principall strength were the bands of the Venetians, for that those of the Duke of Millan (hauing turned most of his forces to the seruice of Nouaro) made not the fourth part of the whole army: ouer the bands of the Venetians, wherein were many notable Captaines, commaunded as generall Francis Gonzague Marquesse of Mantua, a man albeit very young, yet what for his great courage and naturall desire of glory, his expectation surmounted his age: with him were ioyned as commissioners two of the chiefest of the Senat, Luke Pisan and Melchior Trenisan: ouer the regiment of Lodowike Sforce, commaunded vnder the same title of generall, the Count Caiazzo, in whom Lodowike reapposed much: but for his partes, being nothing equall in armes to the glory of his father, he had rather got the name of a subtil and pollicke warriour, then of a hardy and resolute Captaine, and with him was Commissioner Francis Barnardin Visconte chiefe of the faction of Gebelins at Millan, and therefore vsed as opposite to John Iackes Trinulce. Amongest these Captaines and principals of the army, consulting whether they should goe incampe at Furnone, a little village at the foote of the mountaine: it was determined, for the straightnesse of the place, and perhaps (as was afterwards spread abroad) to giue occasion to the enemy to descend into the plaine: that they should lodge in the Abbey of Guaruola distant three miles from Furnone. This aduise was the cause that at Furnone was lodged the vanguard of the french, which had passed the mountaine much afore the residue of the army being hindered by the great artillery, which with many difficulties was drawne ouer that sharpe mountaine of the e Appenin, and yet had passed with farre greater troubles, if the Swizzers (desiring to satisfie the fault they had done to the Kings honour at Pontremia) had not applied a wonderfull readinesse, diligence, and force.

The vanguard being arrived at Furnone, the Marshall of Gies sent a trumpet to the Italian campe, to demand passage for the army in the name of the King, who not offering to offend any person, and receiuing victuals at conuenient prices, had to passe that way to returne into his realme of France, dispatching at the same instant certaine light horsemen to view the enemy and the country, who were broken and put to flight by certaine Stradiots which Francis Gonzague sent to the encounter: if this occasion had bene followed, and that the Italians had giuen vpon the trenches of the french, they had easily (by all discourse and coniecture of warre) broken the vanguard, and so taken away all possibilities of the Kings passage: This occasion remained in their fauour also the day following, notwithstanding that the Marshall after he had considered the daunger, had retyred his people into a place more high: but there lacked resolution of mind to the oportunitie that was offered, for the Italian Captaines had not boldnesse to assaile them, as well for the aduantage of the place whither they were retired, as for that they feared the ouergreatnesse of the vanguard, and that they were the maine army: It is certaine that euen then the confederats had not assembled all their forces, specially the bands of the Venetians, who were so slow to ioine in one strength at Guaruola, that it is manifest, if the King had not dallied so long vpon the way at Pisa, Sienna, and other places without all occasion, he might haue passed without impediment or encounter of the enemy: hee was ioyned at last to the vanguard, and lodged the day after with all his army at Furnone.

The Princes confederate neuer beleued that the King durst haue passed the Appenin by the high way with so small an army, for they were of opinion, that leauing the greatest part of his people at Pisa, he would returne into France with the residue by sea, and afterwarde vnderstanding that he continued his way by land, they supposed, that to eschew their army, he would lay his plot to passe the mountaine by the way of the boroughs of Vandier and by the hill Centrong very sharpe and hard, and from thence to the borders of Ortoney, hoping to meete the Duke of Orleans vpon the confines of Alexandria. But when they knew certainly that he was come to

Furnoue, the Italian army, very well resolved afore, both for the show of courage in so many valiant Captaines, and for the reappoynt of the little number of the enemies, began now to tremble and shake, making opinions fearefull of the valour of the men at armes of France, and the vertue of the Swizzers, to whom without all comparison, the Italian footemen were esteemed much inferior: they considered much of the agility of such as managed the great artilleries: but specially (which moueth much the mindes of men when they haue taken a contrary impression,) they redoubted greatly the vnhoped for hardinesse of the french, who, not waighing the inequality of their numbers inferior to theirs, durst yet affront them: for these considerations, the courage of the Captaines being well moderated, they held a councell amongst them selues what answer they should make to the trumpet sent by the Marshall of Gie: on the one side it seemed too daungerous to put the state of all Italy in the discretion of fortune, and on the other side it could not but bring preiudice to the valour of all the souldiers and men of seruice in Italy, to show that they had no courage to oppose against the army of the french, who, being farre inferiour in numbers, and lesse expectation of other oportunities in a countrey straunger, durst yet offer to passe euen in the face and eyes of them. In this councell the aduise of the Captaines being diuerse, and all the best experienced and stayed, either giuen ouer wholly to feare, or at least very vnrésolute; after many disputations, they lastly agreed to send aduertisement to Milan of the Kings demaund, and to execute that which should be determined by the Duke and the Embassadours of the confederats: who being drawne into councell as a matter of generall importance, the Duke and the Venetians being most nearest the daunger, were of this opinion, not to stoppe the way of the enemy, seeing he would goe, but rather (according to an old councell) to make him a bridge of siluer: otherwaies (according to many auncient examples) there might be daunger, that necessity turned into despaire, he would make his owne way with great effusion of blood of such as vndiscreetly would hinder him. But the Spanish Embassadour, desiring that without the danger of his King, they would make a triall of fortune, perswaded vehemently and almost with protestation not to let passe the King, nor to lose the occasion to breake that army, which passing in quiet, the matters of Italy would remaine notwithstanding in greater dangers then before: for that the french King keeping Ast and Nouari, all Piemont obeyed his commaundements: And hauing at his backe the realme of France, a realme mighty and rich, and the Swizzers his neighbours ready to come into his pay in what numbers he would: and lastly being a great encrease of his reputation and courage, if the army of the league so farre about him in numbers, would consent to towards to his passage: he would estoones torment Italy with greater courage, knowing that the Italians either would not or durst not fight with the french men. All this notwithstanding, the furt opinion preuailing most in this councell, they determined to write to Venice, with whom bare rule the same aduise.

But these consultations were in vaine, like as the arrow being shot, it is too late to wish it may doe no hurt where it falles: for, the Captaines of the army after they had written to Milan, waighing that by reason of the extremity of time, they could not haue returne of answer in season conuenient, how much it would touch in dishonour all the men of warre in Italy, to leaue the passage free to the french men, sent backe the trumpet without any answer certaine, being resolved to assaile the enemy, and charge them in the passage: the Commissioners of Venice being of the same aduise, but Trenisan much more then his companion. The french men marched on with great arrogancy and boldnesse, as they that till that time hauing encountred no resistance in Italy, were perswaded that either the army durst not oppose any impediment, or at least if they did, they iudged their proper vertue intwinable, & disdainig the strength of the enemies, they thought their fortune would be the same in this fight, that it was in their late conquest of Naples: but when in discending from the mountaine, they discovered the army lodged in infinite numbers of tentes and pavilions, and in a place so large that (according to the custome of Italy) they might range them selues all in battell: and waighing what by their great numbers, and lodging so neare them, with other demonstrations of resolution of minde, that there could want no will nor disposition to fight: their late arrogancy beganne to take another habite, and in their counsels began to fall so many coniectures of feare & doubt, that they would haue receiued it for a good newes, to heare that the Italians would be content to let them passe. This feare was redoubled by this occasion; The King, since the answer, had written to the Duke of Orleans to meete him with all the power power he could make, and to march with such speede as he sayled not at the day and place appointed. But the Duke returned aduertisement, that the army of Sforce (opposed against him standing vpon a strength of nine hundred men at armes, twelue hundred eight horsemen, and five thousand footemen,) was so mighty, that without manifest perill he could not aduance to observe his maiesties appointment, considering besides, that he must be enforced to leaue part of his bands for the gard of Ast and Novaro. These necessities constraining the King to turne his mind to new counsels, he commaundell M. D. Argenton (who, a little before had bene his Embassadour at Venice, where Pisan and Trenisan now their deputy Commissioners perswaded him to dispose the kings mind to peace) to send a Trumpet to the sayd Commissioners, to let them vnderstand that he would common with them for the common benefit: they accepted his desire, and appointed the next morning to meete in a place conuenient betweene both the armies: but the King, either for that in that place he had want of victuals, or for some other occasion, chaunged aduise, and would not in that place attend the issue of that meeting.

The front of the tents and trenches of the one and other army, was distant little lesse then three miles, stretched out along the right shore of the riuer Taro, which is rather a land flood then a riuer, for that falling from the hill Appenin, after it hath runne through a little valley inclosed with two banckes, it discends into the large plaines of Lombardie, and so falles into Paw: vpon one of these two banckes, which was that of the right hand discending then to the shore of the riuer, was lodged the army of the confederates, incamped by counsell of the Captaines rather on that side, then on the left shore (where must be the waies of the enemies,) to the end they should not haue meane to turne to Parma: of which city for the diuersity of factions, the Duke of Myllan was not without suspition, the rather for that the french King had by the appointment of the Florentins for his conduit to Ast Francis Secco, whose daughter was married into the house of Iorelli, a family noble and mighty in the territory of Parma. The lodgings of the confederats were fortified with ditches and rampiers, and well furnished with artillery, by the mouth of the which, the french men going to Ast, must of necessity passe Taro on the side of Furnone, and march, no other thing remaining betweene them and the Italians then the riuer. All the night the french were in great trauell for the vexations of the Italians, who made their estradiots to make incursions euen to their campe, which was so ready at euery brute, as if there had bene a continual alarme: to this trouble and perplexity of minde, was ioyned a sodaine and most thicke raine mixed with lightnings and thunders fearefull, with many horrible crackes and flashies, that they tooke it as a foreshewing of some sorrowfull accident; a matter which did more amaze them then the army of the Italians: not onely for that, being in the middest of mountains and enemies, and in a place which (if they preuailed not by fight) fauored them with no hopes or meanes of safety, the consideration of those great difficulties, gaue them iust occasion of extreame feares: but also (to mindes fearefull all fancies and coniectures seeme things of truth) they made constructions of the threatnings of the firmament, not accustomed to shew it selfe ill disposed, but towards some great variation, the storme (in their opinions) raging most toward that part where was the person of the King of so great maiesty and power.

The morning following being the sixt day of Iuly, the french army began by the peepe of the day to passe the riuer: afore, marched the most part of the artillery, being followed with the vauntgard, wherein the King (supposing that against it would be bent the greatest forces of the enemy) had put three hundred and fifty french launces, Trunice with his company of a hundred launces, and three thousand Swizzers which were the sinewes and hope of that army, and with them on foote Engilbert brother to the Duke of Cleues, and the bayliffe of Dion that had leauyed them: to these, the King adioyned three hundred archers, and certaine crosse-bowmen on horsebacke of his gard, whom he made alight on foote, and almost all the footemen which he had with him: After the vauntgard marched the battell, in the middest whereof was the person of the King armed at all parts, and mounted vpon a fierce courser: & neare to him, (to gouerne with his counsel & authority that part of the army) was the Lord of Trimonille, a leader much renowned in the realm of France. Then followed the arearegard guided by the Cout de Foie: & in the last place was bestowed the baggage of the army. Notwithstanding this marching of the army, & the present readinesse to fight, yet the king, who could haue bene contented with some accord, solicited Argenton to go and negociat chissons with the Venetian Commissioners, euen at the same time that the campe began to moue: But the Venetian army being all in armes, and the Captaines determined to fight, the shortnesse of the time and nearnesse of the enemy, left no respite or space of time to entertaine Parley: for, now began the light horsemen on both sides to skirmish, the artillery from all quarters to shoote off with a noise horrible, and the Italians issued out of their tents, and spread vpon the shoare of the riuer their esquadrons and rancks prepared to the battell. These things notwithstanding, the french men forbore not to march, partly vpon the breach or greaue of the riuer, partly by the skirts or stretching out of the bancke, for that in so straight a plaine they could not display their ordinance, and the vanguard being now led to the right way of the campe of the enemies, the Marquesse of Mantua with an esquadron of fixe hundred men at armes of the gallantest of all the army, and with a great band of stradiots and other light horsemen, followed with five thousand footemen, passed the riuer at the backe of the arearegard of the french, leaving vpon the bancke on the other side Anthony of Montefeltre bastard to Federike late Duke of Vrbyn with a great esquadron, to passe when he should be called to refresh the first battell: he ordained besides, that when the fight was begunne, another part of the light horsemen should charge the enemy in flanke, and the residue of the estradiots passing the riuer at Furnoue, to giue vpon the baggage of the french, which either for want of men, or (as was bruted) by the counsell of Trunice, was left without guard to who would make pray of it: on the other side, the Count Gaiazzo with foure hundred men at armes (amongest whom, was the company of Dome Alphonsò D'Este come to the campe without his person, for that his father would it so) and with two thousand footmen, passed the riuer of Taro to assaile the french vanguard: hauing in like sort left on the bancke on the other side Amyball Bentiuole with two hundred men at armes, to giue rescue when he should be called. And for the defence of their lodgings and tents, remained two great companies of men at armes, and a thousand footmen, for that the Commissioners of Venice would reserve in all fortunes a whole succor for their safety. But the King seeing that (contrary to that his Captaines had perswaded him) so great a strength came to charge that arearegard, he turned his backe to the vanguard, and began to draw neare to the arearegard with the battell, hasting so diligently with an esquadron afore the rest, that when the charge began, he was in the forefront with the first that fought. Some haue written that the companies of the Marquesse past the riuer not without disorder, both for the height of the bankes, and for the impediments of trees, of blockes, and boughs, whereof commonly the riuers of land-floods are full. To this others haue left in memory, that his footmen for the same difficulty, and because the water was swelled with the raine that fel in the night, either came late to the seruice of the battell, or at least all were not there, a great part remaining on the other side the riuer: howsoeuer he was followed, it is most certaine, that the charge which the Marquesse gaue was resolute and furious, and was no lesse valiantly answered by the french, the esquadron on both sides entring the conflict pellmelle, & not according to the custome of the warres of Italy, which was to fight one esquadron against another, and in place of him that was weary and began to retire, to supply the fight with a fresh, making in the end but one great esquadron of many esquadrons, in so much as for the most part the skirmish or triall of armes wherein commonly died but very few people, endured almost a whole day, and oftentimes the sodaine comming of the night was the cause that they brake off without victory certaine on either partie. The launces being broken, at the encounter of whom fell to the earth as well on the one part as on the other, many men at armes, and many horses, euery one beganne with the same fury, to lay handes vpon their mases, estockados, and other short weapons, the horses fighting with their fecte and their teath, and with the shocke, no lesse then the men that gouerned them: And truly the vertue of the Italians gaue a great shew in the beginning, but the valour and resolution of miude in the Marquesse, who being followed with a valiant company of young gentlemen and Lanceperzades (these are braue and proued souldiers intertrained about the ordinary compaines) forgot nothing which appertained to a Captaine couragious: The french men, sustained with great valour so hot and furious a charge, but being overlaid with such odds of numbers, they beganne almost manifestly to shake, not without the daunger of the King: within a very few pases of whom the bastard of Burbon was made prisoner, notwithstanding he fought with great vertue: the fortune of him put hope into the Marquesse, to haue the same success against the person of the King, being vndiscreetly led into a place so dangerous, without that guard and order which was conuenient for so great a Prince: The Marquesse with his people, made many adventures to come neare him: against whom, the King albeit he had few of his people about him, yet his vertue defended his person, and his naturall courage ouercame his present danger, the fiercenesse and agility of his horse doing more to his safety, then the succours of his people. In these great perils, there wanted not in him those counsels, which in actions dangerous are wont most to appeare in mens memory and fancies: for that in so great a distresse of fight seeing him selfe almost made naked of his gird, and abandoned of fortune and worldly succors, he had recourse to the heauenly aides, making a vow to S. Denys and S. Martyn, reputed protectors particular of the realme of Fraunce; that if hee passed safe into Piemont with his army, he would, as soone as he was returned on the other side the Mounts, make personall visitation, and that with great gifts, to the holy temples dedicated to their names, the one standing neare to Paris, and the other in the towne of Tours: and that euery yeare with most solemne feasts and sacrifices, he would honour and celebrate so great a grace receiued by their meane. After this contemplation and promise to accomplish these vowes, he entred into a new courage, the strength of his body redoubling in the spirit and comfort of his minde, and so began eftsoune to fight with greater valour then his complexion could naturally beare. The daunger of the King so touched and enflamed those that were left farre off, that running to couer with their persons the person of the King, they sustained the Italians: and his battell which remained behind, pressing in at the same time, an esquadron of the same charged so furiously the enemy in the flank, that it moderated somewhat their heate, and presently reskued the kings danger: whereunto was added this helpe, that Rodolphe Gonzague Vncle by the mother to the Marqueffe of Mantua, a Captaine of great experience, as he encouraged the souldiers and reordered such as hee saw out of order, doing alwaies many other good offices of an excellent Captaine, as he raised by chance his beauer, was so hurt in the face with an estockado by a french man, that falling from his horse, his people could neuer rescue him in so great a confusion and tumult, and so thicke troupes of fierce horses raging without gouernment; but hauing other men and horses falling vpon him, he died rather stifled and smothered with the throng of horses feete and treadings, then by the armes or blows of the enemies: A chaunce truely vnworthy such a man, for that in the counselles of the day before, and the same morning, he perswaded (contrary to the will of his nephew) to abstaine from fight, iudging it a great want of discretion to hazard them selues to the will of fortune without any necessity. Thus the battell changing by diuerse accidents, and no aduantage appearing more for the Italians then for the french men, the difference was now more then euer to whom the victory would remaine: in so much that hope and feare being equall on both partes, they fought with an incredible fury, euery one esteeming that the victory rested in his right hand and strength, and not at the disposing of fortune: An auncient perswasion in old souldiers, that in actions of battell and warre, the successe of the victory followeth not the number of the souldiers, but resteth in the resolution of their mindes and innocency of their cause. The french men had a desperate courage, as well for the presence and daunger of their King (for that nation hath alwaies borne no lesse reuerence to the maiesty of their kings, then to things of diuinity) as for that they were hemmed into such straights and places, as gaue no hopes of their safety, but by the onely victory: The Italians were encouraged, by the couetousnesse of so rich a pillage, by the honorable example of the Marqueffe leading them to the battell with so happy successe, and with the great number of their army, by whom they had expectation of great succours from their friends and countreys enuironing; a thing which the french could not hope for, for that either their whole companies were already in the fight, or at least attended euery instant to be charged and brought into the fortune of their fellowes. But it is not doubted, that the power of fortune is great in all our humaine actions, more mighty in matters of warre then in any other thing, but most infinite and inestimable in the feates of armes, where, one commaundement ill vnderstood, one order ill executed, one rashnesse, one vaine voice, yea sometimes euen of the meanest souldier, carrieth many times the victory to such as seemed euen then vanquished and ouercome, and where vnlooked for do happen many sodaine accidents, which it is impossible to the Captaine by his experience to foresee, or let by his counsell, or assure by his wisdom: In so much as, in so great a doubt, not sayling of other custome, she did that, which neither the vertue of men, nor the force of armes had not yet done for, the estradiots sent to charge the tents and baggage of the french, hauing begunne to spoyle without any resistance, and beginning to leade away to the other side the water, some inlets, some sompters, and some armour: not onely the other estradiots appointed to charge the french in the flankes, but euen such as were already within the fight, stirred vp with the sight of the gaine wherewith they saw their companions goe laden to their tents, left the battell, and turned their weapons to pill and spoile that that was left of the french pillage: and one cause, one respect, and one example drawing the residue, you should see many horsemen, and footmen issue by troups out of the battell, to doe the like. By which occasion, not onely the succours ordained, failing the Italians, but euen the number of those that fought diminishing with so great disorders, and Anthony of Montfetre not remouing for that no mā called him, Gonzaga being slaine, vpon whose calling he depended, the french men beganne to winne so much ground, that now nothing did more sustaine the Italians (manifestly declining) then the vertue of the Marquesse, who expressing in his person all the actions required in a valiant Captaine, made head yet against the new fortune and fury of the enemies, and labouring with euery possibility to keepe them from the victory, sometimes he encouraged his people by his owne example, and eftsometimes with sweet and piercing speeches perswaded them, rather to lose their liues then their honors, seeking to resolue their mindes with all those respects of honor, profit, reputation, and necessity, which make the souldier goe to the battell. But it was impossible that in a few should be continued long resistance against many, or that the vertue which is not fauoured with fortune should not at last faile. The enemies multiplied vpon them on all sides, a great part of their owne were slaine, and many hurt without hope of further helpe to the seruice, yea euen of the particular band of the Marquesse: by which extremities, they were driuen to fall into disorder, and flie to repasse the riuer, which by the raine ouer night, and the hailes and watery stormes falling in great abundance during the fight, was risen so high, that it gaue great impediments to such as were forced to repasse ouer it. The french men followed the chase with a fury equall to their fortune, euen to the riuer, regarding nothing more then to make slaughter of those that fled, without taking any prisoner, or respecting the spoils and gaine of the chase: onely they cried with redoubled voices; Companions remember Guinegate: Guinegate is a village in Picardie neare to Terouane, where, in the later yeares of the raigne of Louis the xj. the french men almost victorious in a battell against Maximilian king of Romans, being disordered because they beganne to fall to pillage, were put to flight. But at the same time that on that side of the army the fight was valiant and obstinate, the vauntgard of the french (against the which the Count Caiazzo led one part of the horsemen, came to the battell with so great a fury, that the Italians astonished when they saw they were not followed of their peoples, inclined of them selues so fast to disorder, that many of their leaders being slaine, amongst whom was Iohn Piccingu and Galeas of Correge, they returned in manifest flight to the great esquadron. But the Marshall of Gie, discerning (besides the Squadron of the Count) an other regiment of men at armes prepared to the battell on the other side the riuer, would not suffer his souldiers to follow them: which afterwards by some was reputed a counsell discrete and wise, and by others, looking perhaps lesse into the reason then into the euent, it was iudged a resolution rather cowardly, then constant: for that, if they had pursued them, the Count and his companies had giuen him their backs, by which disaray he had so amazed the residue of their strength remaining on the other side the water, that there would haue bin great impossibility to retaine them, seeing that the Marquesse flying as well as the others, and repassing the riuer as strongly and in as good order as he could, found them in such tumults and separations, as euery one thinking to saue him selfe with his cariage, the high way that goeth from Plaisance to Parma was already full of horses, of men, and cariages which drew to Parma. This tumult partly was stayed by the presence and authority of the Marquesse, who reassembled them, and put eftsometimes all in order: But much more did reasssure the diuided mindes of the Italians the comming of Count Petillane, who in so generall a confusion of both the armies, vsing the occasion, fled to the Italian campe: where dispersing comfort to euery one, and affirming that amongst the enemies, was no lesse disorder and amaze, he eftsometimes confirmed and reassured their mindes: In so much that both by opinion and reason, euery one supposed that without him, either at the instant, or at least the night following, all the campe had dispersed in great terrour. Thus the Italians retired to their campe, except such as being caried with confusion and tumult, and thinking to finde safety in flying, were separate into sundry places, whereof many falling into the hands of the french men, found at one instant an end of their life and fortunes. The king with his people drew to his vauntgard which had not stirred: And

And there deuising with his Captaines, whether he should suddenly passe the riuier and giue vpon the french their lodgings, he was councelled by Triumice and Camilla Vuelli, (who was come to the battell with a few horsemen, hauing sent the residue of his company to the enterprise of Genes) to set vpon them: and Francis Secco furthering the expedition more then any other, told the King that the way that was scene so farre off, was full of men and horses, which argued that either they were fled to Parma, or hauing begunne the chase, were eftsloons returned to the campe. But truely the difficulty to passe the riuier was not little: and the bands that partly had fought, and partly were kept armed in the field, were so weary and ouer-trauelled, that by the counsell of the french Captaines, it was determined to seeke harbour: and so they went to lodge vpon the hil in the village of Medesane, of little more distance then a mile from the place of the battell: there they pitched their lodging without any order, but with great incommodity, for that the most part of their baggage and stufte was made pillage by the enemy.

This was the discourse of the battell betwene the Italians and the french vpon the riuier of Taro, not vnworthy of memory, for that it was the first of very long time that was fought in Italie with slaughter and bloud, seeing that in all battels or actions of warre in that countrey, the liues of men were wont more to be put to raunsome, then sold with the price of bloud. But in this, notwithstanding of the french part, the slaughter scarcely contained three hundreth bodies, yet of the Italians were found dead more then three hundreth men at armes, and of others as many as made vp the number of three thousand persons, amongst whom was Ramiccio de Farnese leader of the Venetian horsemen, with many other gentlemen of marke. Barnardin de Montone also a Captaine of horsemen vnder the Venetians, whose name was more populous and renowned by Braccio de Montone his grandfather, one of the first beautifiers of the Italian discipline of war, then by his proper vertue or fortune, receiued a blow with a mase vnder his helmet, with the which being fallen from his horse, he was left on the ground for dead. This slaughter was so much the more wonderfull to the Italians, by how much the encounter endured not aboue an houre, euery one on both sides fighting with his proper force and valour, without helpe of the artillery or shot. Touching the honour of the journey, either part laboured to appropriate to his particular, the renowne and glory of the victory: The Italians occupied this reason; for that their tents and carriages remained vntouched, where the french on the contrary, had their lodgings rifled, and lost much of their best stufte, yea part of the proper pavilions of the King: They alleadged further, that they had vtterly discomfited the enemies, if one part of their people appointed to enter the battell, had not turned to the pillage of their trenches; a thing which the french confessed to be true. The Venetians were so partiall, that with a peculiar glory they made them selues victors, and by publicke commaundement through all the landes of their obedience, and specially at Venice, they made bonfires, with other feastes and testimonies of gladnesse. This publicke example was followed with no lesse affection of sundry particulars, for that vpon the sepulchre of Melchior Trevisan, were stamped these characters of letters in the Church of the Freat minoris: He fought prosperously vpon the riuier of Taro against Charles King of France. But by the vniuersall consent of men indifferent, the palme, merit, and true glory of the victory, was adiudged to the french men, both for the numbers of the dead, so farre different and vnequall, and for the chase of the enemies ouer the riuier, and also for that they wonne their liberty to passe further; which was the controuersie for the which they came to the battell. The king remained all the day following intamped in the same place, procuring (by the meane of Argenton) a parley with the enemies, by which was accorded a truce til night: that abstinence or truce was not vnwelcome to the King, for that he desired to passe with surety, knowing that many of the Italian army had not yet fought, and remaining in order about their trenches, the march of so many daies journey through the Duchy of Millan with the enemy in his taile; could not but be daungerous: Besides, he knew not what resolution to take, such was the simpleness of the counsell with whom he vsed most conference and direction in his most waightiest deliberations, rejecting for the most part the aduises of men graue and experienced. No lesse doubt and incertainty trauelled also the mindes of the Italians, who albeit at the beginning were false into no small astonishment, yet they were eftsloons so reassured, that the night after the battell, they held counsell, (by the encouraging and comfort chiefly of the Comte Perillane) to inuade the french campe in the night, being disordered with many incommodities, and not fortified: by the plurality of voices this counsell was rejected, as bringing more perill then profite. There ranne a brute through all Italy, that the bands of Lodowike Sforce, according to his secrete direction, would not fight much, least hauing so strong an army of the Venetians vpon his estates, he was in more feare of their victory, then of the forty thousand of the french, touching whom he was indifferent whether they were victours or vanquished, and therefore for his better surety in all chaunces, he was blamed for his subtilty to keepe his forces whole, vpon which was imposed the occasion that the Italians army did not obtaine the victory. This opinion was maintained by the Marquesse of Mantua and the other Venetian Captaines, to make their reputation the greater: neither was it receiued with lesse will of all such as desired the augmentation of the glory of the Italian souldiers: But I haue heard this brute confuted, by a personage of iudgement and grauity, and remaining then at Millan in such degree, as the absolute and true knowledge of affaires was brought to him: he purging Lodowike, assured the world, that hauing sent most of his forces to the siege of Novaro, he had not so many at the battell of Taro as were of great consequence for the victory, which in deede the army of the confederates had obtayned, if their proper disorders had not hurt them more then the want of a great number of men, seeing withall, that many whole companies of the Venetians fought not at all: and where the Count Caiazze sent against the enemy but one part of his companies, and that very coldly, he did it perhaps, for that the vauntgard of the french was so strong, that the daunger was apparant to commit him selfe to fortune, and perhaps because ordinarily actions couragious and venterous haue made him more wonderfull, then such wherein was surety: notwithstanding, the companies of Sforce were not altogether vnprofitable, for that albeit they fought not, yet they kept at a bay the vauntgard of the french, and were the cause that it gaue no succours to the king, who with the lesse or most weake part of the army, sustained with the great daunger of his person, all the brunt and swaigh of that daies fight. In my iudgement this testimony is no more confirmed with authority then with reason: for, how is it likely that if that intention had bene in Lodowike, he would not rather haue instructed his Captaines, to dissuade from letting the french men to passe: seeing that if the victory had falne on the french, his bands being so neare the enemy, had bene no more in safety then the others, notwithstanding they medled not in the battell: and with what discourse, with what consideration, or with what experience of things could he promise to him selfe, that comming to the fight, fortune would be so equall, that the french king should neither be victor nor vanquished.

The morning following, the King departed with his army before day, without sound of trompets, to couer his discamping as much as he could: and for that day he was not followed by the army of the confederates, who though they had had will to haue pursued him, yet they should haue found impediments in the waters of the riuier, which were so much increased by raines that fell in the night, that there was no possibility of passage for the day following: Onely at the declining of the Sunne passed ouer not without daunger, the Count Caiazze with two hundred light horsemen, and following the trace of the french men, who marched the right way towards Plaisance, he gaue them the day following many alarmes and impediments: and yet, all wearied and trauelled as they were, they kept their way without disorder, the villages refreshing them with plenty of victuals, partly for feare to receiue hurt by them, and partly by the meane of Trinulce, who scouring before for the same effect with the light horsemen of the army, made perswasions to men, sometimes by threats, and sometimes with his authority, great in that Duchy with all sortes, but more great with the family of the Guelfes. The army of the league which remoued the day after the discamping of the french, and but little disposed (specially the prouisors of the Venetians) to put them selues any more in the arbitrement of fortune, came neuer so neare them, as to annoy them with any little discommodity: but being lodged the second day vpon the riuier of Trebia a little beyond Plaisance, (the Swizzers and two hundredth launces and almost all the artillery remaining betweene the riuier and the city of Plaisance for the commodity of incamping,) the floods were so great by reason of the raines falling in the night, that notwithstanding their extreame diligence, it was impossible that either the footemen or horsemen could passe but at high daies, and then with difficulty, although the waters began to abate: notwithstanding all which opportunities fauoring the army of the league, yet they neuer executed any action against the french but a farre off, nor yet the Count de Caiazze who was entred within Plaisance, for suspicion of reuolt or tumult: which suspicion was not altogether without occasion, for that it was beleueed that

The King according to the councell of Triuulce, had displayed his ensignes vnder the name of Francis, the little sonne of Iohn Galeas, the Duchy would easily haue falne into some mutation, so laurable was the name of him whom they held for their lawfull Lord, and so hatefull the remembrance of the vsurper, and of speciall importance the credit and friendships of Triuulce. But the King in whom was setled no other impression then to passe on, would not be entangled with new practises, but followed his way with diligent and speedy march, finding great want of victuals after the first daies trauell, and in all places, the forts and peeces well garded, Lodowike hauing distributed what into Tortone vnder Iasper S. Senerin, surnamed Freccasse, and what into Alexandria, many horsemen with twelue hundred lance-knights, which he had drawne from the campe of Nonaro. After the King was passed Trebia, his army was alwaies vexed in the taile by the Count Caiazzo, who had ioyned to his light horsemen fye hundredth launce-knights of the garrison of Plaisance, not being able to obtaine to be sent to him from the army, all the residue of the light horsemen and foure hundredth men at armes, for that the Venetian Commissioners, warned by the perill at the battell of Taro, would giue no consent estoones to hazard their forces: at last the french men taking (when they were neare to Alexandria) their way more high towardes the mountaine where the riuier of Tanaro runnes with shallowest water, were brought without losse of men in eight remoues or sojournings of the campe afore the wals of Asti: in which city after the King was entred, he disperfed his men of warre into the champion, with intention to encrease his army, and to abide in Italy vntill he had succoured Nonaro: and the campe of the league which had pursued him to the countrey of Tortone, despairing now to vex him more, went and ioyned it selfe to the companies of Lodowike Sforce besieging the sayd city of Nonaro, which euen now began to suffer great scarcity of victuals, for that by the Duke of Orleans nor his people had bene used any diligence for prouision, which by reason of the fertility of the countrey, they might haue done in great plenty and at easie rate: but like men either blinded with security, or else of litle policy, they neuer considered of the daungers, till the meane of the remedy were past, consuming without sparing all the store of victuals which they found there.

About this season returned to the King those Cardinals and Captaines, who with ill successe had bene at the enterprise of Genes; for after the Kings army by sea had taken the towne of Spezia, it set vpon Rapalle and possessed it easily: but there issued out of the port of Genes a nauy of eight light gallies, one carracke, and two barks of biskayes, which by night put on land seuen hundredth footemen, who without any difficulty tooke the borough of Rapalle, with the french garrison that were within, and then accoasting the french nauy retired to the gulfe, after long fight they remained victors, taking and burning all their vessels, the Captaines made prisoners, and the place by this victory made more renowned, for that in the yeare before, the Aragons were there defeated: neither was this aduersity recompenced by the army that went by land, who guided by the East riuier to Valdibisagne, and so to the suburbs of Genes, found them selues deceiued in their hopes, that in Genes would rise tumults: and therefore vnderstanding of the spoile and losse of the nauy by sea, they tooke way with no lesse speede then feare, to the mountaine sharpe and vn easie, and from thence descended to the valley of Pozzenere, which is on the other part of the city: from whence, notwithstanding their troupes were strong and great by the concourse of pay sants and other populars, whom the Duke of Sauoy had sent in their fauours, they drew with the same diligence towards Piemont. In the action of this enterprise it is certaine, that if they within the towne had not bene restrained from issuing forth, for doubt least the faction of Fregosa would make some innouation, they had wholly broken the french army and put them to flight. The horsemen also of Vielli (now come to Chiaure, vnderstanding the successe and great disorder of those with whom they went to ioyne in strength) retired with no lesse hast then daunger, to Severana: in so much, that except Spesia, all the places of that riuier that had bene occupied by the banished, reappealed or called againe forthwith the Genowayes, as did in like sort in the riuier of the Ponent, the city of Vintemille, which in the same daies had bene occupied by Paul Baptista Fregosa, and certaine others of the banished.

In the same times, the warre was also as hoat in the realme of Naples, as in the partes of Lunardy, but with a more diuerse fortune: for, Ferdinand after he had taken Reggio, considered how he might recouer the places bordering, hauing in his army six thousand men, comprehending such of the countrey and Sicile, as willingly followed him, together with the horsemen and footmen of

of the Spanish, ouer whom was Captaine, Consaluo Ernandes of the house of Aghilar, a country of Cordone, a man very valiant and long exercised in the warres of Granada. This man, at his first coming into Italy, being called (by a Spanish bragge) the great Captaine, the be to signifie with this title, the soueraigne power that he had ouer them, did well deserue by many goodly victories which he there atchieued, that that surname might be iustly appropriated, confirmed, and perpetuated in him by vniuersall consent, in testimony of his great vertue and excellency in the knowledge of warre. To this army, which had already stirred vp a great part of the country, Monsieur D' Aubigny presentes him selfe neare Seminara, a towne vpon the sea, with the men at armes of Fraunce remaining for the gard of Calabria, and such bands of horsemen and footemen as the Lords of the country of the french faction had sent to him: and being come to the battell, the valour of the souldiers which were of traine and exercise, caried the victory against the ignorance of the other litle experienced: for, not onely the Italians and Sicilians which Ferdinand had gathered in hast, but also euen the Spaniards, were souldiers new and vntained to seruice; with whom notwithstanding, he maintained the skirmish with great stoutnesse, for that the vertue and authority of the Captaines failing nothing of their place and office, sustained such as for all other regards, were much inferiour: Ferdinand aboute the residue, applying vertue to the innocency of his quarrell, behaued him selfe as well appertayned to his vertue: in so much as his horse being slaine vnder him, he had in all coniecture, remained either dead or taken, if Iohn de Capua brother to the Duke of Terminy, (who had bene his Page from his childhood, and whom he entirely loued in that floure of age) had not alighted and remounted him vpon his horse, and with an example of faith and loue very notable and worthy, offered his owne life for the safety of his Lord, in whose presence he was slaine vpon the place: Consaluo fleeth along the mountaines to Regge, and Ferdinand to Palma, which lieth vpon the sea neare to Seminara, and there tooke gallies and sayled to Messina. And as in aduersities necessity is mighty to make men resolute, so by this ouerthrow, there encreased in him a new courage and will to assay againe the triall of fortune: for, he was not onely aduertised, that the whole city of Naples thirsted with great desire to haue him, but also by secret intelligence he knew, that he was generally called by the principals of the nobility and people: and therefore eschewing delaies where was so great necessity of expedition, and fearing least lingring ioyned to the reappoynt of his ouerthrow in Calabria, might not estoones make cold that new disposition: after he had assembled (besides the gallies which he had led from Tschia, and the foure that serued his fathers first departure from Naples) the other vessels that brought the Spaniards into Sicile, with all others that he could recouer of the cities and Barons of Sicile, he hoyseth saile out of the port of Messina, not tarrying, for that he had not men of warre sufficient to arme them: wherein wanting forces conuenient for such an enterpryse, he was constrained to furnish and serue his turne, no lesse with demonstration and appaurance, then with the effect and substance of things: he departed from Sicile with lxx. vessels of cable and anker, and twenty others of lesse proportion, accompanied with Ricaiense of Catelogma, Captaine of the Spanish vessels, a man whose experience was equall to his resolution in seruices at sea: he had so small proportions of fighting men, that in most part of these vessels, there were almost no other sortes or natures of men, then such as necessarily were appointed to the seruice of the navigation: In this sort his forces were small, but great towards him were the fauors and good wils of the people: in so much that being arriued in the road of Salerno, Salerne it selfe, the coast of Melff, and of Cano, hoised their streamers to the wind. Afterwards he remained two daies aboute Naples, in expectation to heare of some tumult, in the towne: but for the time his fortune being slow, made his desire vaine, for that the french men running presently to armes, & planting sure gard vpon places of perill, suppressed immediately the rebellion that euen already was kindled: yea, they had put remedy to al their dangers, if they had valiantly followed the counsell of some amongst them, who getting that the vessels of the Aragons were ill manned with souldiers able to fight, aduised Monsieur Montpensier to refurnish the french vessels which were in the hauen, with bodies resolute and men of action, and so giue the charge to the enemy. The third day Ferdinand despairing of commotion in the city, turned his sailes into the seaward to retire to Tschia: by which it hapned, that the conspirators with Ferdinand, considering that their faction & intelligence was now discouered, and therefore his cause was become theirs, and proper and generall to euery one of them, drew them to an assembly, and determined to be blinde against all daungers and difficulties, making of their

Common necessitie a speciall vertue : This deliberation was followed to effect ; for that they dispatched secretly a litle boate to call home Ferdinand , beseeching him to put on land either all or the greatest part of his companies , to the end to ioyne meane and courage to such as were inclined to make insurrection in his fauour. Vpon this intelligence, Ferdinand returned eftsouones a-bore Naples , and the day after the battell of Furrowe , he approched neare the shoare to take land at Magdalena a myle from Naples , and where the riuer of Sebera falls into the sea : it is rather a small brooke then a riuer , which yet had lyen vnknownen if the verses of the Poets of Naples had not giuen it a name: Monsieur Montpensier to whom all things were disclosed , shewed him selfe no lesse hardy & ready to charge them when was cause to feare them, then he was vnresolute and fearefull the day before when courage was necessary : In so much that issuing out of the Citie almost with all his strength to stop the descending of Ferdinand , the Neapolitanes taking the oportunitie of the occasion (which was such as they could not haue desired better) rose suddainly into armes: and sounding alarme by ringing the great bell of the Friers next to the walls of the town, all the other Churches doing the like, they seized vpon the gates of the towne , and began to publish the name of Ferdinand . This suddaine tumult so amiazed the French men , that holding it a place of no suretie to remaine betweene the enemies and the Citie rebelled, and lesse expectation to returne by that way they issued out, they determined to reenter Naples by the gate that belonged to the new Castell : for the accomplishment whereof they must take a long way, full of hills and troublesome, and compassing the walls of the towne . But in this meane while Ferdinand being entred, and mounted on horsebacke with certaine of his followers by the Neapolitanes , rode through the towyne, to the incredible ioye and gladnesse of euery one , the communitie receiuing him with great cryes and showtes , and the Ladies and women beholding him out of windowes and casements, could not be satisfied to couer him with flowers & sweet smelling waters: yea many of the Nobles ranne in the streetes to embrace him and wype the sweat from his face , not being negligent for all this in things necessary for the defence of the Citie: for, the Marquis of Pis-saire accompanied with the souldiers which were entred with Ferdinand and the youth of Naples , looked to the intrenching and fortifying of all places for their defence against the French: who after they were come vpon the greene of the new Castell , and doing what they could to reenter into the hart of the Citie , were so repulsed by crosbow men and small shot , that finding at all the entreyes and commings to the streetes , a resistance strong and sufficient, and the night now drawing on, they retired to the Castell, leauing almost (of all fortes) two thousand horses vpon the greene, hauing no place nor feeding for them in the Castell: within the Castell were inclosed with Monsieur Montpensier, Messire Yves d' Alegro, a Captaine of reputation, and Anthonie Prince of Salerne, with many others French and Italians of marke : who albeit spent certaine dayes in skirmishing, as well on the Castell greene as about the port, discharging their artillerie into the towne, yet finding in their repulses a redoubled vallour in theemie, they remained voyde of hope to be able to reouer the Citie of them selues.

The example of Naples was immediatly followed by Capua, Auersa, the rocke of Montdragón, and many other peeces thereabouts, yea most part of the kingdome was suddenly in reuolt: Amongest whom those of Caietta taking armes with more courage then force , and their hopes farre greater then their fortune , for that certaine galleys of Ferdinand were discovered afore the haven, they were with generall slaughter oppressed by the French garrisons there, who with a furious agreeing with the cause giuen, sacked all their Citie.

At the same time the nauie of the Venetians being come neare to Mompoly one of the Cities of Romylla , after they had set on land their Estradiots and many of their footemen, assaulted it both by sea and land, where Peter Bembo owner of one of the Venetian galleys was slaine with a shot out of the towne . But in the end fortitude yielding to vertue, the Citie was taken by force, and the Castell likewise rendred for feare which the French Captaine had that kept it: the said nauie took also by composition the towne of Pulignone.

Ferdinand was not without apparant hopes to haue the new Castell and the Castell of the egge, for that famine (which is an enemye troublesome) serued more for him then his force or pollicie, there remaining a verie small quantitie of victuals in regard of the proportion of men that were within ; and winning vpon them continually the places about the Castell to the end to keepe them at a straiter compasse: the French men succouring the aduersities of their fortune with industry & pollicie, seeing their armie by sea had no suretie in the hauē, which containede fīue ships, foure light galleis, a galliot, & a gallion: they retired them betweene the tower of S. Vincent, the eggs-castell, & Pizzafalcone, which yet they held, as also the hinder parts or skirtes of new castell where were the gardins of the kings: in so much as keeping peeces euen to Capella, & fortifying the monasterie of the crosse, they made incursions euen to Pizzoforte & S. Martin. Against whom Ferdinand hauing taken & fortified Hipodrome, & made couert wayes by Incoronato, he possessed the Mount of S. Herme, & afterwards the hill of Pizzafalcone, the Frēch holding the castell seated in the highest part of it. To hinder the succours that were to come frō it (for in taking it they might endamage & batter frō the steepe places the nauy of the enemy) Ferdinand assailed the monasterie of the crosse: at whose first approch they receiued such harmes by the artillery, that despairing to win it by force, they deuised to betray it by practise and intelligence; a deuise very vnhappy and wretched to him that was the authour: for that a More which was within, hauing fraudulētly promised to the Marquis of Piscare (aforetimes his master) to put him within the place, & in that action, hauing made him come by night by a ladder fastened to the wall of the monastery to speake with him, to the end to agree vpon the manner and time to enter it the same night: he was by great treason and double intelligence slaine with the shot of a crosbow running through his throat.

Collony returns
Ferdinand.

It was not of litle importance for the affaires of Ferdinand, the reuolt first of Prosper and then of Fabrice Collonne, who during the bond of their seruice and oath contracted with the French king, (going with the streame of the time) returned to the pay of Ferdinand almost as soone as he had recouered Naples: They excused them selues, that they were not satisfied in time of their due payments promised; and that to Virginia Vrsin and the Count Pellisane (with small regard to their merites) were giuen many fauours and aduancements of the king: a reason that seemed to many very weake, and farre inferiour to the greatnesse of the benefites which they had receiued of him: But it may be doubted, that that which reasonable ought to serue as a bridle to restrain them, was the very motion that led them to do the contrary, seeing by how much the benefites they had receiued were great and many, by so much perhaps was great in them the desire to keepe them, looking withall into the ill disposition of the affaires of the French, which began euen then to shake and decline.

But now the Castell thus hemmed in, and the sea restrained by the nauies of Ferdinand, the want of victuals increased more and more, and they that were besieged interteined them selues onely with hopes to haue succours out of Fraunce by sea, the rather for that the king (as soone as he was arriued at Ast) had dispatched Peron de la Basche to rigge in the haven of Ville Franche neare Nice an armie at sea of two thousand Gascoynes and Swyzers with prouision of victuals, whose leader and Captaine should be Monsieur d'Arban, a man warlike, but not experimented in the seruice of the sea. This nauie being put vnder sayle and arriued as far as the Isle of Poreze, discovering thereabout the nauie of Ferdinand containing thirtie sayles and two great ships of Genowa, retired and fell forthwith into flight: and being pursued vnto the Isle of Elba, they made way in such feare to the haven of Lynorne, with the losse of a litle shippe of Biscay, that it was not in the power of the Captaine to withhold most of his men from going on shoare, and against his discipline & will to runne amaine to Pysa. By reason of the retire and deffeaite of this armie at sea, M. Montpensier with his companies, pressed with want of victuals, accorded to render the Castell to Ferdinand, hauing now endured the siege three moneths, & frō thence to go to Proience, if they were not rescued within thirtie dayes. This contract included suretie of life & goods to all such as were within the castell, giuing ostage to Ferdinand, Tues d'Alegre with three others for assurance of the cōditions. But the shortnesse of time made impossible all hope or expectatiō of succours, other the such as they had within the realme: In which respect M. de Perse one of the Captaines of the king, accompanied with the Swyzers and part of the Frēch launces, & the Prince of Bysignia with many other Barons, drew straight to Naples: against whom Ferdinand hauing espiall of their comming, sent out to Eboli the Count of Matalono with an army for the most part confused, compounded of bodies whom he trusted, & esteemed his friends: This armie albeit much superiour in numbers & furniture, yet encountering the enemy at the lake of Pizzola, which is a litle borough neare Eboli, they fell into generall disorder & present flying without fighting. In which chase was taken prisoner Venutio sonne of Iulius Parano Lord of Camaris: but being not pursued by the Frēch, they retired without great losse to Nola & so to Naples. The Frenchmē taking courage by this felicitie) followed their enterprife to succour the Castels , and that with so great reputation for the victorie obtained, that Ferdinand was at point once againe to abandon Naples: but receiving courage by the comfortes of those of the towne , who were no lesse pushed forward perhaps with the feares their had of their liues, (remembring their rebellion) then with the friendship they bare to Ferdinand, incamped at Capella and the better to let the enemies for approaching the Castell, casting a trench from the Mount S. Hermo vntill the egge Castell, he furnished with artillerie and footemen all the hills vnto Capella and aboue Capella : In so much that albeit, the Frenchmen, who being come to Nocere by the way of Salerna, passing by the caue and the hill Piegrotte, were guided to Chiaie neare to Naples: yet all things hauing good defence, and by the valour of Ferdinand, the artilleries thundring vpon the Frenchmen, but specially those that were, planted vpon the hill of Pizzifolcone which commanded the egge Castell (where earst were the singularities and pompes so much renowned of Lucullus) they could passe no further, nor approach Capella : and hauing no meane to make further abode there , for that nature fauoreth the place with all pleasures and commodities sauing fresh waters, this necessitie constrained them to retire sooner then they would , leauing behind at their disamping three peeces of artillerie , and part of the relieffes which they had brought to reuictuall the Castels : they tooke their way towards Nola, against whom Ferdinand opposed him selfe, leauing the Castell besieged , and incamped with his companies in the plaine of Palma neare to Sarnie. Monsieur Montpensier seeing by their departure , nothing but an vtter losse and priuation of all hopes for rescues , leauing three hundred men within the Castell (a number no lesse proportioned for the victuals which now were short , then for the seruice and defence) and a garrison within the egge Castell : drew away with him the residue (which were in all two thousand five hundred souldiers) and by night embarking him selfe and his companies in the vessels there, he went to Salerna, not without the great complaints of Ferdinand , who pretended, that is was not lawfull for him (during the terme wherein he had promised to yeeld) to depart with such a companie, vnlesse he had rendred both the Castels according to the contract. This escape wrought many passions in Ferdinand, in whom was no want of inclination (according to the rigour of the contract) to reuenge the iniurie and infidelitie of Montpensier, vpon the bloud and life of the Ostages: for that the Castels not redeliuered at the terme accorded , he had abused the wordes of his promise with a meaning dissembled : Notwithstanding extrenities redoubling with time vpon those that remained , not able any longer to keepe force against the rage of hunger , within lesse then one moneth after he was parted , they rendred the Castell with conditions to haue the ostages deliuered . And almost at the same time , and for the same occasion they that were within the egge Castell, agreed to yeeld the first day of the next Lent , if they were not rescued before . Much about this time dyed at Messina, Alphonso of Aragon : the glory and fortune of whom (by which whilst he was but Duke of Calabria , his name was made honofable and famous,) were conuerted into a great infamie and infelicitie when he came to be king of Naples: It was said, that a litle before his death, he made instance to his sonne to returne to Naples, where the hatreds that were generall against him before time, were now almost reconuerted into affections and good likings: To whom it is supposed that Ferdinand (ambition & desire to reigne bearing more rule in him the reuerence and respect to his father) answered no lesse suttly then in scorne, that he should attend & expect till he had so assured the Realme, that he should not eftsouones be driuen to abandon it and flie.

Ferdinand, to enterteine him in the friendships of the king of Spayne with a bond more strait and assured, tooke to wife with dispensation of the Pope, Iane his aunt, daughter to Ferdinand his grandfather, and of Iane sister to the sayd king of the Spanish.

In this meane while that the siege was continued with diuerse successe about the Castels of Naples (as hath bene set downe) the siege of Novaro also was still holden and brought to very strait and hard termes : for the Duke of Myllan had there a puissant armie , which the Venetians had succoured with such a readinesse, that in no enterprife within memorie haue they bene knownen to make lesse sparing of charges , nor vsed more fidelitie and diligence : there were in this campe of the confederates three thousand men at armes , three thousand light horsemen, a thousand Almaines on horsebacke, & five thousand footemen Italians: but the principall strength of their armie stood vpon the ten thousand Launceknights (for so are the Almaines footemen called) entertained most part by the Duke of Myllan, to be opposed against the Swyzzers, for that the

Italian footemen could not endure their name, and much lesse heare speake of them without feare, so greatly were they diminished in reputation and courage, since the French men had action in Italie: ouer them were gouernours many Captaines of vallour, resolute, and for experience generally recommended, amongst whom bare a name most singular George Pietrepante of the countrey of Austrich, who a few yeares before, being in the pay of Maximilian king of Romaines, conquered with an honorable prayse vpon the French king, the towne of S. Omer in Picardie. The Senate of Venice was not onely carefull to send to this siege many bands of souldiers, but also to entertaine them in a greater courage, they created gouernour and Captaine generall ouer the armie, the Marquis of Mantua, honoring in him by the collation of that dignitie, the vertue he shewed in the battell of Furnoue or Taro, and with an example worthy of eternall memorie, they had not only increased the payes of such as shewed vallour there, but also indued with pensions and sundry recompences the sonnes of many that dyed in that battell, and transferred dowrie to their daughters. The siege of Nonaro was continued with this mighty armie, for that the councill of the confederates (referring all things appertaining to that action to the will of Lodowyke Sforce) was not to hazard the triall of battell with the French king, vnlesse they were constrained; but rather in fortifying about Nonaro the places necessarie, their intentions were to let victuals for entring: They hoped that those within could not hold out long, for that they had lesse store of victuals then would serue their numbers and proportion, and no expectation of remedie in a case so restrained: for, besides the people of the Citie, and the payfants which were thither retired, the Duke of Orleans had of French and Swyzers more then seuen thousand of choise. In which respectes, Galeas de S. Seuerin, giuing ouer all cogitation to take the towne by force, for the multitudes of men of warre that were within, had incamped him selfe with the Dukes armie at Mugnes, a place of suretie vpon the high way, very conuenient to giue impediments to the prouisions that might come to Verceill: and the Marquis of Mantua with the bands of the Venetians, taking at his arriual by force, certaine peeces there about, together with the Castell of Brione, a seruice of some importance, had also refurbished Camarian and Bolgare which are betweene Nonaro and Verceill, distributing the armie into sundry places about Nonaro, the better to stoppe the course of victuals, and fortifying euery particular lodging and trench, to be the more easie and ready to resistance.

On the other side the French king, to haue more oportunitie to the succours of Nonaro, was remoued from Ast to Thurn: and albeit he made many iourneyes euen to Chyars, to make court to a Lady remayning there, yet that vanitie brought no negligence to the common affaires, for that they ceased not without intermission to consider of the prouisions for the warres, soliciting continually the companies conte out of Fraunce, with intention to put to the field two thousand French launces: They were no lesse diligent to sollicite the descending of ten thousand Swyzers, for the leuye of whom was dispatched the Baylisfe of Dyon: Their resolution was, that as soone as the armie was possessed of them, to aduaunce all meanes possible to rescue Nonaro: without the strength of the Swyzers, there was litle abilitie in the French to accomplish any worthy enterprise, seeing the Realme of Fraunce in those times albeit mighty in horsemen, and well furnished with artilleries and men most apt and nymble to manage them, yet it was verie weake in footemen of the proper region: The reason was, that armes and exercises of warre resting onely in the Nobilitie, the auncient vallour of that nation was fayled in the multitudes of men of base condition, ignorant in seruice martiall for the long time they had not managed armes, in place of which they had giuen them selues ouer to trades, profites, & delights of peace: for, many of the auncient kings before, fearing the fury of the popular sort, by the example of diuerse conspiracies and rebellions hapning in the same kingdome, thought it necessary in pollicie to disarm them, and draw them from the vse and practise of armes. For these reasons the Frenchmen, not trusting in the vertue of their owne footemen, neuer went to the warres with courage, vnlesse their armie were strengthened with certaine bands of the Swyzers: which nation (in all ages resolute & hardy in armes) had about twenty yeares before much increased their reputation, for that being assayled by a mighty army led by Charles Duke of Bourbo (he that for his power & fiercenesse was much redoubted, not onely in the realme of Fraunce, but of all his neighbours) they had in lesse then one moneth put him thrise to flight, & at the last chase, either as he fought, or as he fled (the certaine manner being doubtfull) they tooke from him his life: So that what for their resolute

valour, and that the French had no controuersie with them, and lesse feare to doubt them for their interests particular, as they had of the Launceknights, they entertained no other forreine souldiers then the Swyzers, vsing their seruice in all their warres of importance: but more willingly at that time then at any other, for that they saw how hard a thing it was and full of daunger, to relieue Nouaro enuironed with so great an armie, & wherein were so many bands of Launceknights gouerned by the same discipline that the Swyzers were.

The Citie of Vercell is situated in the mid way betweene Thury and Nouaro, and hauing Vercell giuen to the Duke of Savoy. in auncient times bene a member of the Duchie of Myllan, it was giuen by Phillip Maria Viscounte (during the long warres he had with the Venetians and the Florentines) to Ayme Duke of Sauoy, to separate it from them. Into this Citie was not yet entred any bands of either part, for that the Duchesse mother and tutor to the young Duke of Sauoy, who in her hart was wholly French, would not discouer her selfe for the king till he were more strong; giuing in the meane while to the Duke of Myllan gracious wordes and hopes: but as soone as the king was strong in men and come from Thury, a Citie of the same Duchie, she consented that he and his souldiers should enter within Vercell, when by the oportunitie of that place he entred into a greater hope to be able to succour Nouaro when all his strength should be assembled. And on the other side the confederates, for the same reason began so to doubt, that to debate with a more rype and full counsell how they should proceede in such difficulties, Lodwyke Sforce went to the armie with Beatrice his wife, who ordinarily accompanied him no lesse in matters of importance, then in actions familiar: in the presence of whom, and (as the brute went) chiefly by her counsell, the Captaines after many reasonings, concluded with one consent, that for the more common suretie of them all, the bands of the Venetians should be ioyned to the armie of the Duke of Mugnes, leauing sufficient gard in all the other places about Nouaro seruing to the siege: That Vogaro should be abandoned, for that being within three myles of Vercell, it was necessary, if the French men came with strength to get it, either to loose it with infamie, or to succour it with the whole armie: That in Camarian three myles from Mugnes where the campe was, the garison should be refurnished: Lastly, that the whole campe being fortified with trenches and rampiers, and supplied with sufficient artilleries, the Captaines and assistants should daily enter into other counsels according to the behauiours of the enemie. They forgot not in this consult, to giue order to spoyle and cut downe all the trees euen to the walls of Nouaro, to giue incommodities to men and forage for horses, whereof there were great quantities in Nouaro. These resolutions established, and a generall muster made of the whole armie, Lodwyke returned to Myllan to make with more readinesse such prouisions as daily should grow necessarie for the seruices wherein to giue fauours to the forces temporall, with the authoritie and armes spirituall, the Venetians and he wrought so much with the Pope, that he sent one of his officers at the mace to the king, commaunding him within ten dayes to depart Italie with all his armie, and within an other short terme to send all his people out of the Realme of Naples; otherwayes that vnder the spirituall paynes wherewith the Church is wont to threaten, he should appeare before him personally at Rome. This remedie the auncient Popes haue vsed in tymes before: for according to traditions written, Adrian first of that name, constrayned with no other armes then these, Desiderius king of Lombardes (going with a strong armie to trouble the Citie of Rome) to retire from Ternie (where he was arriued) to Pauia: but the reuerence and feare which for the holinesse of their life, was nourished in the harts of men, being now fayled, it was a thing hard to hope, that of manners and examples so contrary, would come like effectes: the same enabling the French king (scorning at his comandement) to answer the messenger, that the Pope refusing at his returne from Naples to tarie him in Rome, whither he went deuoutly to kisse his feete, he could not but maruell, by what reason he could require him now to go thither: notwithstanding he sayd, that to obey him, he would looke to open his way, and prayed him least he tooke those paines in vaine, to attend him there till he came.

In this time, at Thury the king contracted with the Ambassadors of Florence new capitulations, not without the great contradiction of such as afore times had made resistance: who now had so much the more occasion to impugne it, by how much the Florentines (after they had recovered the other borowghes and strong places of the hills of Pysa) their campe being afore Pont de Sac, and the souldiers that were within rendring it with condition to haue their liues saued:

they did (contrary to their faith and promise giuen) put to the sword almost all the Gascoyns French men which were found with the Pyssans, and vsed many cruelties against the bodies dead: this accident albeit hapned against the wills of the Florentine Commissioners, who with great difficulty saued a great part of them, but altogether by the stirring vp of certaine souldiers, who being prisoners to the French, were very rigorously dealt withall: yet in the Court of the king, all being taken by their aduersaries as a signe manifest of mindes maliciois to the name of all the Frenchmen, many impediments were objected to the solicitation and practise of the accord, which notwithstanding had his passage and full conclusion, hauing more power then all other respects, nor the memorie of promises and othes solemnly made, but the vrgent necessitie and want of money, and other commodities to succour the affaires of the kingdome of Naples: This was the accord: That without any delay, all the townes and Castles which were in the kings possession, should be restored to the Florentines; vpon condition that the state of Florence should be bound to deliuer (within two yeares next comming at the pleasure of his Maiestie receiuing sufficient recompence for them) Pietrasanta and Serezania to the Genoways, in case their estate should fall to the iurisdiction and obedience of the king: That vnder this hope, the Florentines should make present payment of the thirty thousand duckats remaining of the capitulation made at Florence, receiuing a pawne of iewels for their suretie and restitution, if for any occasion their places were not rendred: That after the redeliuerie of their places, they should lend to the king vpon bonds of the Generals of the Realme of France (so are called the foure officers royall which receiue the reuenues of the crowne) three score and tenthousand duckats, and to send part of them in his Maiesties name to the bands which were in the Realme of Naples, & an other part to be ministred to the Collonoy, in case they were not recociled & reaccorded with Ferdinand, whereof his Maiestie albeit he had some apparace, was not yet in such certaintie as to beleue it: That if they had no wars in Tuskane, they should send to Naples to the ayde of the French armie there, 250 men at armes: And in case their warres were but for the quarrell of Montpulcian, yet they should be bound to send thither to accompanie the bands of Vitelli, and not to entertaine them in that seruice longer then the moneth of October: That they should remit and pardõ the Pyssans for all their offences committed, giuing them a forme certaine for the restitution of their goods which had bene taken from them, together with conuenient and liberall meanes to exercise their traffikes and marchandise: That for the surety and obseruation of these things, they should deliuer as ostages at the election of the king, sixe of the principall Citizens of Florence, & they to remaine a certaine time in his Court: This accord concluded, and the thirty thousand duckats (which were immediatly sent to make a leaue of Swyzers) giuen vnder gage of the kings iewels, the commissions and commandements of the king were immediatly dispatched to the Captaines of the places, to make present redeliuerie to the Florentines without any difficultie or standing.

But within Nonaro albeit the vertue of the souldiers was great, & most great (for the memorie of the rebellion) the obstinacie of the townesmen to defend the towne, yet things diuolued daily to more hard & difficult termes, the store of victuals so fast diminishing, that they began euẽ now to be pinched with the want of necessaries, & (according to the nature of extremities) their hopes to be relieued were no lesse desperate then their desires great, and their present lackes grievous: Notwithstanding the Duke of Orleans, somewhat to ease and fauour the hardnesse of their condition, had ryd out of the towne all mouthes and members vnprofitable: yet it was no remedie sufficient to so great a calamitie, for that many souldiers of the French and Swyzers not able to beare the fretting anguish of hunger, & lesse enured to the other discommodities of a close siege, began to languish in diseases and sicknesse: By reason whereof the Duke, being also troubled with a feuer quartaine, made many solicitations to the king by messengers and letters not to deferre their succours: which could not be aduanced with such readinesse as might be able to minister to their generall necessities, for that there was not assembled such sufficient strength as imported the estate of their daunger: The French armie for their parts, shewing more forwardnesse of action then able to do good, made many attempts to reuietual the towne by night, vsing to that purpose the seruice both of horsemen & footmen: but being alwayes discouered by the enemy, there succeeded no other fruits of their enterprises then great harmes to them selues, and no lesse disapointments to their friends, being made more wretched by their ill fortune: But to stop altogether the passage of victuals into the town, the Marquis of Mantua, assayled the Monasterio of S. Francis, standing standing neare to the walls of Nonaro, and taking it, he manned it forthwith with a garrison of two hundred men at armes, & three thousand footemen of the Almaines: By this meanes the armie confederate was discharged of a great care, the way being now made sure by the which reliefe was brought into the towne, the way also of the gate that leades to the mount Biandrane was stopped, for that in it was most facilitie to enter Nonaro: The day after he tooke also the Bastill made by the French vpon the point of the suburbes of S. Nazare, and the night following were surprised the whole suburbes together with the other platformes neare to the gate, wherein he bestowed a garrad and fortified the suburbes, the Count Petillane (whom the Venetians had taken into their pay with title of gouernour) being hurt there with a small shot neare the girdle place and in great daunger of death: For the successe of these places, the Duke of Orleans distrusting to be able to defend any more the other suburbes which he had at his entrey into Nonaro, he let fire on them the night following, and drew all his strength to the defence and gard of the Citie only: And touching the extremitie of famine, he yet nourished him selfe with hopes of succours, the rather for that the Swyzers beginning now to arriue at the campe, the kings armie passing the riuer of Stesia was marched out of Vercell a myle to lodge in the field, and hauing bestowed a garde in Bolgare, expected the residue of the Swyzers: who being once assembled, the armie was resolved to minister succours to Nonaro: an action notwithstanding full of many difficulties, for that the Italian bandes were lodged in places of aduantage well furnished and fortified, and the way from Vercell to Nonaro, full of lakes and waters, and very vncasie for horsemen almost impassible, for the broad and deepe ditches thorow the whole countrey: Besides, betweene Bolgare holden by the French, and the canpes of the Italians, was Camarian, which the Italians garded. In respect of these difficulties, there appeared not in the minde of the king nor of the others, a readinesse answering the expectation of those that attended in distresse: and yet it was supposed, that if the Swyzers had sooner arriued, they had aduentured the fortune of battell, the euent whereof could not but be doubtfull to either of the armies: and therefore, they both hauing regard to the daunger present, there wanted no secret trauell to sollicite an accord betweene the king and the Duke of Myllan, albeit it was with small hope for the indifferent distrust that was betweene those two Princes, and for that both the one and other, for their greater reputation, made shewes that they had no deuotion to peace. But fortune layed open an other meane more expedient for so great a conclusion: for about the same times, the Lady Marquise of Monferat being dead, and being in debate, who ought to take the gouernement of a litle sonne whom she had left, to which Regentship aspired with one desire, the Marquis of Saluce, and Constantin brother to the said Lady deceased, one of the auncient Lordes of Macedonia, which Mahomet Ottoman had occupied many yeares before: the French king fauouring much the tranquillitie of that estate, sent Argenton to Cesar Cernaui, to ordaine and establish a Protectorship according to the consent of the subiectes: and being gone thither also as a mourner for the death of the Lady one of the principall officers of the Marquis of Mantua, they two meeting vpon the way, fell into discourse and deuises to haue a peace, alledging many benefites that would redound to both parties: This voluntarie reasoning betweene them two succeeded to so good fruite, that the Lord of Argenton tooke occasion to write to the Venetian Commissioners, reiterating the reasons and matters which had bene begun to be debated euer since they were at Taro, and they fauouring the motion with very forward affections, communicated immediatly with the Captaines of the Duke of Myllan, & so with one agreement, sent to require the French king (now come to Vercell) that he would assigne some of his counsell to meete in some place conuenient, to common with such as they should appoint in deputation for their part: whereunto the king consenting with a readinesse equal to his desire, there assembled the day following betweene Bolgare and Camarian for the Venetians the Marquis of Mantua, and Bernard Contarin gouernour of their Estradiots: for the Duke of Myllan was sent Frauncis Barnardin Viscounte: & for the French king the Cardinall of S. Mallo, the Prince of Orange (to who being newly come to the campe, the king had giuen the principall charge ouer the whole army) the Marehall of Gie, Monsieur de Pienes, and Monsieur d'Argenton: who making many meetings and certaine particulars of them making iourneyes from the one armie to the other, the differences and chiefe controuersies fell at last vpon the citie of Nonaro: for that the French king making no difficultie in the effect of the restitution, but in the manner, the lesse to offend his honour, laboured that it might be referred (in the name of the king of Romaines direct Lord of the Duchie of Myllan), into the hands of one of the Almans Captaines which was in the campe of the Italians: On the contrary, the confederats required that it might be left frankly. These and other doubtess hapning, not being able to be resolved with that speed which they that were within Novaro required, being now false vpon such extremities, that what by famine, and other raging diseases rising by it, there were dead of the Dukes companie about two thousand bodies: a truce was made for eight dayes, with sufferance to the sayd Duke and the Marquis of Saluce, to go with a small companie to Verceill, but vnder promise and faith to returne to Novaro with the same companie, if the peace proceeded not; and for the suretie of the Dukes person (for that he was to passe thorow the campe of the enemye) the Marquis of Mantua went to a tower neare to Bolgare in the keeping of the Count de Foix: the souldiers that were to remaine in Novaro, would not haue suffered him to depart, if he had not giuen them his faith, that within three dayes he would returne, or else by his meane they should haue libertie to go out, the Marehall of Gie being there for his conduit, leauing also one of his nephewes for ostage: for that not onely the victuals were consumed which ordinarily serued for the sustenance of man, but also the vncleane and filthy scrappes, from which they could not abstaine in so great an extremitie. Immediately after the Duke was come to the kings presence, the truce was estoones proroged for a certaine few dayes, with condition that all his companies should go out of Novaro: that the towne should be left in the power of the people, and they to make an othe not to giue it to either partie without common consent: and that thirtie footemen, who should be victualled daily by the campe of the Italians, should remaine in the Castell for the Duke of Orleans. Thus all the souldiers issued out of Novaro, whom the Marquis of Mantua & Galeas de S. Senerin protected and conducted till they were in place of suretie. But so much were they weakened & consumed with hunger, that they were no sooner arriued at Verceill, then many of them dyed, and the residue remained altogether vnprofitable for the seruice of that warre.

About this time, the Bailiffe of Dyon arriued at the campe with the residue of the Swyzers, of whom albeir his commission was to leaue but ten thousand, yet he could not chuse but at the reappoynt of the kings money, there descended by troupes a far greater number, rising in the whole to an armie of twentie thousand: The one halfe was admitted to ioyne to the campe neare Verceill, & the residue remained ten myles off, because in pollicie it was not thought sure that so great a proportion of men of one nation should be at one time in one campe: if their comming had bin somewhat sooner, the practises of peace had bene easily broken, seeing without them there were in the campe eight thousand French footemen, two thousand of those Swyzers which had bene at Naples, and eightene hundred launces.

But things being now so far aduanced, and Novaro already abandoned, the interviewes did not discontinue, although the Duke of Orleans vsed all his labour to the contrary, hauing many of the greatest of the Court of his opinion: Therefore the Deputies were euery day at the campe of the Italians to sollicite with the Duke of Myllan, who was newly returned thither, to the end to debate him selfe in a matter of so great consequence, doing all things (notwithstanding) in the presence of the confederate Ambassadors. At length the Deputies returned to the king, bringing the last conclusion of all things that they could for the accord. First that betweene the French king and the Duke of Myllan, there should be a peace and friendship perpetuall (the Duke nothing derogating notwithstanding his other confederations:) That the king should consent that the towne of Novaro should be rendred to the Duke by the people, together with the Castell left to his Maiestie by the gard of thirtie footemen: That the towne of Spesia and all other places occupied by either part, should be rendred: That it should be lawfull to the king to arme at Genes (his freehold and chiefe) so many vessels as he would, seruing his turne of all the commodities of that Citie, so that it were not in fauour of the enemies to the state of the same: That for assurance of this article, the Genoways should giue him certaine ostages: That the Duke of Myllan should cause to be rendred to the king, the vessels lost at Rapale, and the twelue galleys restrained at Genes, and to arme for him presently at his proper charges two grosse carrakes of Genes, which with foure others of his owne he determined to send to the succours of Naples: That the Duke should also deliuer to the king the yeare after, three others in the same maner: That the Duke should giue free & friendly passage to the companies that the king should send by land to the same succours, vnder this couenant, that there should not passe by his estate more then two hundred launces at a time: That if the king returned estoones to the same enterprife; the Duke should follow him with certaine bands of men: That the Venetians should haue power to enter this contract within two moneths: and if they did enter, then to retire their armie by sea from the kingdome of Naples, and to be bound to giue no succours to Ferdmand: but if they did not obserue this, and the king should leuy warre against them, the Duke should be bound to ayde him, reaping to his vse all that should be conquered of the Venetian estates: That the Duke should pay fiftie thousand duckats in the next march to the Duke of Orleans for the charges of the warre of Nonaro: and acquite the king of foure scor thousand duckats parcell of the money he had lent his Maiestie when he marched first into Italie, the residue to be rendred by his Maiestie at a longer terme: That John Lackes Trimalce should be absolued of the confiske and condemnation wherein he had bene conuicted by the Duke, and enioy restitution of all his goods: That the bastard of Bourbon taken in the journey of Furnoue, & the Lord of Myolans taken at Rapale, together with all other prisoners should be redeliuered: That the Duke should withdraw from Pysa, Fracasse; who he had sent thither a litle before, together with all his bands and the companies of the Genoways: That he should giue no impediment to the Florentines to recouer that which appertained to their iurisdiction: That within one moneth he should put by way of confidēce the Castell of Genes into the hands of the Duke of Ferrara, who called to that end by both the parties, was now come to the campe of the Italians, and that the sayd Duke of Ferrara should keepe it two yeares at their common charges, and to be bound by oath to redeliuer it within the sayd time to the hands of the French king, in case the Duke of Myllan should not hold his promises: who immediately vpon the conclusion of the peace, should giue ostages to the king for assurance to assigne the Castell at the time agreed vpon. These conditions brought to the king by his Deputies that had debated them, were propunded in his publike and priuate councell, wherein being found no lesse variation of mindes, then contrarietie of reasons, euery one disputing particularly, Mōsieur Trymonille reasoned in this sort. If in the councell present we had not to debate but of meanes to encrease the glorie to the crowne of Fraunce by actions of vallour and vertue, I should not perhaps be so forward to encourage your Maiesties person to new daungers, although the example of your selfe giues you councell to the contrary, seeing being caried with no other affection then a desire and ambition of glorie, you determined the yeare past, against the counsels and humble petitions of the face and body of your Realme, to descend into Italie to conquere the kingdome of Naples: where your enterprife drawing a success happy and with encrease of your name and honour, it is a thing manifest that now we haue not onely to deliberate, whether the occasion to winne new honours and glorie is to be reiected, but also if we may estoones lose againe that reputation which you haue got with so great aduentures, charges, and daungers, and conuerting the honours already wonne into imputations and infamies perpetuall, whether you ought to be the personage so impugnant and contrary to your proper resolutions, as to reprehend and condemne the counsels established by your selfe: for your Maiestie might without any losse to your reputation haue remained in Fraunce, and that which now the world will wrap in opinions of dishonorable feares and cowardize, could not as then be referred to any other then to negligēce, or to an age occupied in pleasures: your Maiestie asloone as you had bene arriued in Ast, might estoones haue returned into Fraunce, with the same speed, and lesse shame, making as though the matters of Nonaro concerned you nothing at all: But now by the presence of your armie so long incamping here, you haue published your intention, and that you were touched with desire to deliuer the towne from siege, for which regard also hauing assembled out of Fraunce so great a proportion of nobilitie and a leaue of Swyzers at a charge intollerable: who will doubt, that if you depart and not satisfie these expectations, but leaue the towne to her perils, that your glorie, with the reputation of your whole Realme, will not take a contrary conuersion of iust reproch and infamie perpetuall. But (if in the harts of great kings may be motions more violent then desires of renowne and glory) there be yet reasons more mighty, or at least more iust and necessary: seeing our retrait into Fraunce, consenting to the losse of Nonaro, neither is, nor will be thought any other thing then the losse of the whole kingdome of Naples, and the vnworthy slaughter of so many Captaines & Nobles of Fraunce left there for the defence, of the same, vpon your hopes, ioyned with your faith and promises, to send them speedy succours: wherein, how miserable will be their expectations, but more wretched and desperate their estates, and conditions, when they shall vnderstand that your Maiestie incamping vpon the frontiers of nor they haue gotten ; nor leaue in suspition, that want of valour makes them vnworthy of that, which their fortune offereth with so great fauour and further reputation . The Prince of Orange, hauing a contrary affection, spake against this opinion in this sort.

If your affaires (right Christian king) were not so much pressed with time ; but that they would giue you leasure to accompanie your forces with industrie and discreffion : or if they stood not vpon degrees and conditions so immoderate, as you are constrained (if you will continue the warre) to proceede with importunities contrary to all the preceptes and directions of warre : I could be one of those would giue counsell to reiect the peace : for that by many reasons we are encouraged not to accept it, as also it cannot be denied, but that it would be a thing honorable to continue the warre, and no lesse conuenient for the affaires of Naples : But the termes whereunto are brought the towne and Castell of Nomaro, not prouided of victuals for one day, compell vs (if we will succour it) to set speedily vpon our enemies, and with a resolution suddaine to take away respite which makes them strong and able, and increaseth in our armie incommodities hurtfull and daungerous: and if (in suffering it to be lost) we meane to transport the warre into an other part of the state of Myllan, the season of the winter now at hand very vnfit to make warre in places so low and full of waters, and the qualitie of our armie for the nature and great multitudes of Swyzzers, who being not speedily employed may be more prejudiciall to vs then to our enemies ; and lastly our generall want of money making our abode here impossible for any long time, enforce vs (not accepting the accord) to seeke the meane to put suddainly an end to the warre : A thing which can not be done other wayes ; then directly to go and charge the enemies, which as well for their conditions, as the disauantages of the countrey, is so daungerous, that in reasonable conference of things, the action can not but hold of rashnesse and indiscreffion : for that their campe is so strong by nature and art, according to the time they haue had to rampier and fortifie it, the places round about where their garisons are so conuenient for their defence ; and so well manned : the countrey, for the quantitie of ditches and impediment of waters, so vnapt to the seruice of horsemen ; that to go seeke them directly, and not to accost them with commodities and aduantages, and (as the saying is) to winne vpon them by litle and litle : is no other thing then to tempt fortune, and aduenture vpon perils most certaine and desperate : for with what discourse, with what reason of warre, or with what example of notable Captaines, may we with such rashnesse and importunie inuade so great an armie, and that in trenches so strong and well furnished with artillerie ? No, it is better (if you will proceede otherwayes then at aduenture) to seeke to driue them from their trenches by winning some place which they commaund, or at least in restraining their victuals : wherein I can see no other thing to assure our hopes, then by proceeding deliberately and with the length of time, which we haue no meane to attend, (our affaires bearing nothing more prejudicially then to temporise and expect.) Besides, our horsemen containe neither those numbers, nor that valour, which happily many do weene, for that many are made weake by diseases, many returned into Fraunce with leaue and without leaue, and many of those that remayne, ouertrauelled with this long warre, haue more desire to go home then to fight : And touching the Swyzzers, who for their vertue are the principall forces of our armie, yet their great number may happily be more hurtfull, then would be vnprofitable a lesser proportion : for such hath bene alwayes the experience of the customes and nature of that nation, that to manage them being so strong and many together, can not almost be without certaintie of some daungerous tumult, (specially things (as is necessary) proceeding with sufferance and length of time.) During the which, by reason of their payments wherein they are insatiable, and other accidents which follow of course, may happen a thousand occasions to turne and chaunge them, & so we should remaine vncertaine whether their ayde would serue vs as a medicine or a poyson: and in such an vncertainty we can not establish any thing in our counsels, & much lesse resolue our mindes to any enterprise of valour or importance. No man doubteth but the victory is more honorable and sure for the defence of the kingdome of Naples, then the agreement to peace; but in all actions of men, and specially in warres, we must accommodate our counsels to necessity, and not for the desire to obtaine that part which is hard and impossible, to put the whole in manifest perill, seeing it is an office as equall and iust in a Captaine to shew wisdom in his actions, as courage. The enterprise of Nomaro (Sir) was not your principall intention, neither doth it touch you but indirectly, for that you pretend no right to the

The Duchie of Myllan: and much lesse are you come out of Naples to stay to make warre in Piemont: but to returne into Fraunce, to giue order to leaue treasure and men, to the end with more might to succours to minister ayde to your companies at Naples: who in the meane while, what with the rescue of your nauie departed from Nyce, & what with men and moneyes of the Florentines, will haue so good meane to defend their condition, that they may without daunger attend the great prouisions which you are to areare at your returne into Fraunce. I am none of those that will assure that the Duke of Myllan will iustly observe these capitulations, yet receiuing hostages of him and the Genoways, and the Castell also committed according to the forme of the contract, you are not without pawne and suretie. It is also reasonable in him to demaund peace, because lying nearest the daunger of your forces, his feares are no lesse iust, then his perils likely. Besides, leagues, which haue many competitors, of their proper nature haue not that stabilitie and concord, but vpon occasions they come to disagree and fall off one from another, in which case, euery little hole that they shall make, yea euen the smallest crannell or creuise that shall appeare, will make to vs the victorie no lesse easie then well assured: So that seeing your affaires stand in these degrees, and that God hath made it impossible to mortall Princes to rule the time, my aduise is, that your Maiestie strue not against the streame of the time, but to frame your inclinations to the peace; not that it is of it selfe profitable or commendable, but because it is an office in Princes wise and stayed condition, in causes difficult & daungerous, to allow for easie & commendable, that that is neces-sarie and conuenient, or at least wise such as are least intangled with daungers, & nothing at all derogate reputation & honour. The Duke of Orleans rebuked sharply the speeches of the Prince of Orange, either of them taking such libertie of passion, that falling from wordes to reproches and iniuries, the Duke gaue him the lye in the whole presence of the councell: but the inclination of most part of the councell, and consequently of the multitude of the armie, was to embrace the peace, bearing so much power in them all, & no lesse in the person of the king, a sweet desire to returne into Fraunce, that they were not able to discerne the daunger of the kingdome of Naples, & much lesse to see how slaundersous it was to suffer to be lost afore their eyes the Citie of Nomaro, and lastly to depart out of Italie with conditions so vnequall, considering the incertaintie of the obseruation: which disposition was so vehemently fauoured by the Prince of Orange, that many doubted lest to gratifie the king of Romains, to whom he was most affectioned, he had no lesse regard to the profit of the Duke of Myllan, then to the commodities of the French king, with whom truly his authoritie was great, partly for the excellencie of his wit, and partly for credit of his valour, but most of all, for that it is a custome and propertie with Princes, to esteeme most wise, such as are most conformed to their inclinations.
 At last the peace was made, which was no sooner sworne by the Duke of Myllan, then the king, reiecting all other thoughts then such as made for his returne into Fraunce, went forthwith to Thuryn: his hast was the more importunate to depart from Vercell, for that those bands of the Swyzzers that were in the campe, to assure their payes of three whole moneths (according to the custome of Lomys the xi. as they alledged) began to speake of staying the king or the Chiefeines of his Court for the suretie of their pay: notwithstanding they could not claime so much by promise, nor yet had serued so long time from which daunger albeit the person of the king was deli-uered by his suddaine departure, yet they hauing made prisoners the Bayliffe of Dyon and others that leauied them, he was in the end constrained to assure all their demaundes, as well with promises as with hostages: fro Thuryn the king desiring to make a perfect establishment of the peace, sent to the Duke of Myllan the Marshall of Gie, the President of Gannay, and Argenton, to induce him to speake with his Maiestie: The Duke seemed to be of the same desire, but it was not without some doubt of treason: In so much that either for that suspition, or obiecting perhaps some expresse difficulties, as not to giue occasion of ielousie to the confederates, or for that his ambition would not suffer him to come in a behauiour inferiour to the French king: he proposed to haue the meeting vpon the middest of a riuer, where a bridge being made either with barks or other matter, there should be betweene them a barre of wood: A manner of communing together vsed heretofore by the kings of England & Fraunce, and other great Princes of the West.
 This the king refused, as a thing vnworthy his greatnesse, and therefore without any enteruiewe, he receiued his hostages, and dispatched Peron de la Basche to Genes to receiue the two carrake that were promised him, and to rigge foure others at his owne charges for the succours of the Cite.

Ships of Naples, which he knew had not received the rescues sent from Nice, for that they suffered so many impediments as they could not be profitable to the service of Naples. In which respect, his people there besieged, had made composition to render up the castles if they were not succored within thirty daies. The King made his plot to arme the said vessels with three thousand Swissers, and to adioyne them to the sayd navy parte from Nice now retired to Liurne, and to certaine other vessels expected from Prouence. All which (without the great ships of the Genoways) had not bene sufficient for that succours, the haue of Naples being now full of a huge army by sea, both for the vessels of the provisions of Ferdinand, and also for twenty galleies and foure ships sent thither by the Venetians. The King after he had dispatched Monsier Argenton to Venice, to sollicite the Senate to enter into the peace and participat with the accord, tooke his way into France with all his Court, and that with such equall speed and desire to be there, that there was nothing could stay him any few daies in Italy, no not till the Genoways had deliuered him their hostages promised vpon the contract at Vercell, which certainly they had accomplished, if his hasty departure had not preuented their true intention and meaning. Thus then vpon the end of October 1495. his maiesty returned on the other side the mounts, resembling rather a personage vanquished, then a Prince victor (notwithstanding the conquest and victories he had obtayned:) he left as his Lieutenant in Asi (a city which it should seeme he bought of the duke of Orleans) Iohn Jacques Trinuice with five hundred french launces, who not many daies after of their proper authority followed the King, by whom was left no other succours for the kingdome of Naples, then the nauies preparing at Genes and Prouence, and the assignation of the aides and moneys promised by the Florentines.

After the discourse of other things, me thinkes it can not be out of purpose (specially it being a destiny fatall, that the calamities of Italy should take their beginning of the passage of the french men, or at least were imputed to them) to leaue to memory and tradition in what sort began the disease, which the french men call the euill of Naples, and the Italians name the botch, or more commonly the disease of France. It happened as an infection to the french men whilest they were at Naples, and by them in their returne from that warre, was dispersed and spred through all Italy. This disease either altogether new, or at least vnknowen in that age in our hemisphere otherwayes then in the most extreame and furthest parts, was for certaine yeares so horrible, that it well deserueth mention and monument, as a calamity grievous and lamentable: for it appeared alwaies either in vile botches or buttons, which oftentimes proued vlcers incurable; or else they tormented the whole body with paine and aches in the ioynts and sinewes: and the Physicians hauing no experience in maladies of that nature, and therefore ignorant in the remedies proper and naturall, applied oftentimes cures directly resisting and contrary, which inflamed the infection to greater rage, euen to the killing of many bodies of all ages and sexes. Many became deformed with them, and subiect almost to perpetuall torments, yea some such as seemed to be deliuered of them, returned euen soones in short time to the same misery: But after the course of many yeares (either the influence aboue being appeased which bred them so horrible and raging, or by long experience their proper remedies and cures being found out) the disease began to be lesse malitious, changing it selfe into diuerse kindes of infirmity, differing from the first calamity, whereof truly the regions and people of our times might iustly complaine, if it hapned to them without their proper disorder, seeing it is well approued by all those that haue diligently studied and obserued the properties of that euill, that either neuer or very rarely it happeneth to any otherwayes, then by contagious whoredome or immoderate incontinency. The french thinke it reasonable to acquite them of the ignominy, for that it is knowen since, that such a disease was transported out of Spaine to Naples, and yet not proper or naturall of that nation, but brought thither from the Iles, which in those seasons began to be made familiar to our regions, by the nauigation of Christopher Columbus a Genoway: in which isles by the fauor of nature, are remedies ready to the cure of that ill by drinking onely of the iuice of a wood (most singular for many other worthy properties) which growing plentifully in those places, is a remedy no lesse easie, then absolute and assured to the inhabitants there.

THE ARGUMENT.

LODOWIKE SFORCE keepeth not the treaty of peace: The Venetians take the towne of Pisa into their protection: The french King determineth to returne into Italy: The King of Romaines besiegeth Lynorne: The Pope makes warre upon the Vrsins: The french King dieth at Ambosse: Frear Ieronimo Saonarola is hanged at Florence.

BY the dishonourable returne of the french King ouer the Mountes, proceeding notwithstanding more of indiscretion and disorders, then by puffaninity or weakenesse of his army: wise men grew into hopes and iudgements, that Italy, after so many scourges and grievous stormes of infelicities, would now at last resume her liberty, or at least, be redeliuered of the insolent iurisdiction of the french: wherein by so much more were worthy and notable the vertues and actions of the Senate of Venice and Duke of Millan, by how much the taking armes with a wise and resolute councell, were the onely lets, that so goodly a part of the world fell not into the seruitude of strangers. But as nothing can satisfie the couetousnesse of man: so if they had not bin caried with ambitious respects touching their interests and desires particular, nor (to their proper injury and common harmes) had so corrupted the vniuersall benefite and common weale of that region: no man might haue doubted that Italy, (readdressed by their armies and councells, and disloones repossessed of her ancient dignities and prerogatiues) had not bene for long time assailed against the importunities, furies, and violent inuasions of the proud nations beyond the Mounts: but ambition, which would not suffer either of them to be contented with his limits, was the cause not onely to returne vpon Italy new inuasions and troubles, but also that they could not enioy the frute of the victory, which their fortune brought into their hands, against those miserable remainders of the french in the kingdome of Naples: a victory which the negligence and vniwise councells of the king made of easie action to them, for that the succors which he had leauied at his departure out of Italy, were either vtterly vaine, or at least of so litle fruit, that they brought no comfort to his people, his prouisions of nauigation, and the aids promised by the Florentines, seruing also to like effect.

“ This is a rule in the nature of man, that to him that is iniured and can not haue iustice, nothing “ is more sweet then the passion of reuenge: euen so by how much the remembrance of the offence “ is greene and fresh, by so much stronger is the desire of reuenge in the mind griued; and so much “ lesse the trust or confidence in the party that hath offended: Lodowike Sforce consented not to the peace with the King, with a sound faith and meaning, for that remembring the iniuries he had done him, he thought it stoode not with his surety, disloones to commit him selfe to the fidelity of the King: but the desire to recouer Nonaro, and deliuer his owne estate from the incommodities of the warre, induced him to promise that which he had no desire to keepe, following the Kings humor with wordes, and keeping his intentions dissembled: and it may be supposed, that in the peace made with this semblance, did participate the consent of the Senate of Venice, willing to disburden their state without their infamy, of the very huge and great expences occupied ypon the warre of Nonaro: But Lodowike, to whom in actions of shift and cunning, nothing was more familiar then moderation of wit, because he would not in vnadvised sort breake the articles of the capitulation, but shadow his doings with some colour, accomplished that which he could not deny to be in his power: he deliuered hostages: he set at liberty the prisoners, paying their ransoms of his proper treasures: he restored the vessels taken at Rapale: he withdrew from Pisa

Freccasse,

Fracasse whom he could not dissuade to be in his pay. Lastly, he put the castell of Genes into the hands of the Duke of Ferrara, who went thither in person to receiue it: But on the other side, he left within Pisa Luke Malvezzo with many bandes of souldiers, as though he were in the wages and payes of the Genoways: he suffered that two carrakes which were armed at Genes, went to Naples for the seruice of Ferdinand, vsing this excuse, that for that he had entertayned them afore the conclusion of the peace, they of Genes would not consent that they should be denied to him: he laboured secretly that the Genoways should not deliuer in their ostages to the King: And that which was of greater consequence for the losse of the castels of Naples, after the King had armed and manned the foure shippes, and that he had furnished him of the two for the which he was bound: he wrought so with the Genoways, that making semblaunces of feare, they gaue impediments that the Kings souldiers should not be armed, if first they receiued not of him sufficient caution, that he should not employ them against them selues, nor attempt with that force to chaunge the gouernment of Genes. For these cauillations, the King complayned by men expresse to Lodowike, who (according to his custome in euasions) answered him with exceptions, sometimes that he had promised to furnish him with the shippes, but without consent that they should be manned with french souldiers: And sometimes he alleadged that the iurisdiction which he had of Genes was not absolute, but limited and restrayned to such conditions, as he had no power of compulsion, and much lesse was his authority to enforce their willes to his desires, specially in things which they pretended to be dangerous for their estate, or to derogate the liberties of their city: wherein the better to iustifie his excuses, he wrought so, that the Pope commanded the Genoways and him vpon paine of the Church censures, that they should not suffer to be drawne from Genes by the french King, any vesselles of no sort or nature: In so much as the succours expected with so great desire by the french, which were wretched in the kingdome of Naples, sorted to no comfort or reliefe to them. No more did the aides and moneys promised by the Florentines: seeing after the accord made at Thurin, Guinde Anthoine Vespucci one of their Embassadours assistant at the conclusion, departing immediatly with all the necessary dispatches, and passing without suspicion through the Duchy of Millan, for that the common weale of Florence was not declared enemy to either part: he was retained in Alexandria by the Dukes commission: and all his papers and dispatches taken from him, he was led forthwith to Millan, where the capitulations and promises of the Florentins being bewraied, the Venetians and the Duke tooke counsell, not to suffer the Pisans to perish: who as soone as the french king was gone out of Italy, had by new Embassadors recommended their affaires to Venice and Millan. Their resolution to rescue the Pisans, was not without the consent of the Pope and the Embassadours of the other confederats, vnder pretence to hinder the money and aides which the Florentins (reentring into Pisa and their other places) were to send to the realme of Naples: and also for that being conioyned with the french King, and by the recovering of that city, made more mighty, they might in many sorts endamage the common safety of Italy: but the principal humor that fed that motion, was their ambition and great desire to make them selues Lords ouer Pisa: a sweet pray to entice ambitious mindes; and as it had bene afore time vehemently aspired by Lodowike, so the Venetians began now in like sort to looke into it with couetous eies; as people who seeing the auncient vnity of other Potentats broken, and one part of those weakened which had wont to oppose against them, embraced already with thoughts and hopes the Monarchy of all Italy: whereunto they esteemed the impery of Pisa a very conuenient instrument, to beginne with the commodity of his haven (which they thought could not be long kept by Florence not holding Pisa) to stretch out their limits euen to the inferiour sea: hauing withall by the oportunity of that city, an entry of great importance into Tuscane. The Duke of Millan shewed most readinesse to minister to their succors, who entertaining at the same instant the Florentins with diuerse practises, had ordained that Fracasse, vnder colour of his priuate business (for he had possessions in that countrey) should go to Pisa, & the Genoways to refurbish them with new supplies of footemen: The Venetians also forgot not to nourish them with promises and comforts of speedy succours, and accordingly dispatched one of their Secretaries to Genes, to make a leauy off footemen, and perswade the Genoways not to abandon the Pisans: yet they were long in sending their strength thither, perhaps by this opinion, that so long as the citadell was holden by the french King, and so long as he were in Italy, it was not conuenient to lay any great foundation of those things. On the other side, the Florentines, aduertised of the new coucnants made with the King by the Embassadours at Thurin, had increased their army, to be the more able to constraîne the Pysans to receiue them, as soone as they saw the dispatches of the King. And albeit as you haue heard, they were restrained together with their Embassadours by the Duke of Millan, yet they forbore not to take the borough of Palaye, and so planted their campe afore Vicopisan: the besieging of which place was of no effect, partly for that the Captaines (eyther by ill counsell, or for that they iudged their strength not sufficient to bring their Campe on that side towards Pysa, the Pysans hauing erected a bastillion on a mount neare the towne) encamped on that side vnderneath towards Bientina: a place of little commodity to hurt Vico; and keeping it, the way of Pysa and Casina lay open to those that were besieged: partly for that Paule Vitelli hauing receiued three thousand duckats, went thither to defend it, entring with his companies and the bandes of his bretheren, vnder a fained colour to haue letters of the King, and commandement from the generall of Langwedock, brother to the Cardinall of Saint Mallo (remaining sicke at Pietra Santa) to protect Pysa and the appurtenance, vntill other order were taken. Certainly it is a thing right wonderfull in reason, and no lesse rare in experience and example, that the Pysans were at one time defended by the souldiers of the french King, and aided by the succours of the Duke of Millan; and nourished also with hopes by the state of Venice, notwithstanding that Senate and the Duke of Millan were in open warre with the french King. But such is the rage of ambition, and so sweet the insinuation of rule and impery, that in whom they haue kindled their infection, they cease not to inflame more and more their desires, without respect to fidelity, conscience, difficulty, or common obseruancy, holding all things lawfull that make for their purpose, and nothing vnseemly that may serue to satisfie their insatiable aspiring thoughts. With the rescue that came with the bands of Vitelli, Vicopisan defended it selfe easily, and gaue no little damage to the campe of the Florentines, the same being pitched in a place so open & discouered, that it receiued many harmes by the artilleries, which the Pisans had caried within Vico: in so much that hauing endured the harmes by many daies, the Captaines found it necessary to their safety, to leaue the siege to their reproach and shame. After this, the Kings dispatches being at last come (which written into copies, were secretly sent out by many waies) the towne, castell, and port of Liberue were immediately rendred to the Florentines, by Salliane Lieutenant to Monsieur Beaumais, to whom the King had giuen them in charge: when M. D'Isle Deputy Commissioner, to receiue of the Florentines the ratification of the accord made at Thurin, and to see the restitution executed, began to treat with Entragues Captaine of the Citadel of Pysa, and of the castels of Pietra Santa and Mutton, to resolute with him of the day and manner to resigne them vp: but Entragues inducèd either by the selfe same inclination common with the other french men that were then in Pisa, or by some secret commissions from M. de Ligni, vnder whose name, and as depending vpon him, he was preferred to that charge, or perhaps drawne by the loue which he bare to a litle Graciana, daughter of one of the citizens of Pisa, (for it is not credible that only the desire of money led him, since he might receiue a greater quantity of the Florentines) he began to oppose many difficulties: sometimes giuing to the Kings letters pattents an interpretation contrary to the true sence: and sometimes he alleaged, that at the beginning he had commaundement not to render them but by secret aduertisements from Monsieur de Ligni: vpon which impediments, after they had in vaine disputed certaine daies, it was necessary for the Florentines to make a new instance to the King, remaining yet at Vercell, to remedy that disorder expressed with so great an offence to his maiesty, & hurt to his speciall profit. The king became much moued with the disobedience of Entragues, & commanded M. de Ligni (not without indignation) to constraîne him to obey, determining to send thither a man of authority with new letters pattents and threats from the Duke of Orleaes, whose seruant he was: But the resolute obstinacy of M. de Ligni, and the fauours which he had in Court, being of more power then the slender counsell of the king, the dispatch was delaied certaine daies, and in the end sent not by a man of authority, but by M. Launcepugno a simple gentleman: with whom went Camilla Vitelli to lead his companies to the realme of Naples, and withal to conduct thither one part of the money to be defrayed by the Florentines, to whose army, as soone as the Kings letters pattents were arriued, were ioyned the men of war of both the Vitellis. This dispatch wrought no more effect then the first, notwithstanding the Captaine had receiued two thousand duckats of the Florentines, to entertaine (vntill the Kings aunswere came) the bands of footemen which were in garrison within the Citadell: And to Camilla were payed three thousand duckats, because because otherwayes he would haue hindeted that the Kings letters should not haue bene presented: for the Captaine of the Citadell (to whom as was supposed de Ligni, had sent by an other way, Commissions quite contrary) after hee had many dayes abused their expectation, and iudging that the Florentines (for that there were within the towne besides the inhabitants, a thousand footemen forreyners) could not force the suburbes of S. Marke ioyned to the gate of Florence, leaning to the Citadell, where the Pyfans had made a great bastillion, and that so he might come to the end of his intention without manifest objecting against the Kings will: he sent to the other Florentine Commissioners, to present their army afore the sayd gate, (which they could not doe vnlesse they wonne the suburbes) for that if the Pyfans would not receiue them in by accord, he would force them to abandon it, the same gate being so subiect to the artillery of the Citadell, that it was not able to maintaine defence against the will of such as had it in gard. The Florentines inclining readily to this deuise, went thither with a great preparation, a courage resolute, and an inflamed disposition of all the campe then lodging at Saint Remy, a place neare to the suburbes: and with such valour they assailed the bastillion on three sides (in the forme, seate, and rampiers whereof, they had bene fully instructed by Paule Vitelli) that they brake and put to flight such as stood in defence, and pursuing the chase, they enter Pellmelle the suburbes by a draw bridge which ioyned to the bastillion, killing and making prisoners the most of them. In this fury there was no doubt, (without the ayde of the Citadell) but at the same instant they might haue made perfect the conquest of Pyfa by that gate, many of their men at armes being entred, for that the Pyfans put to flight, made no resistance: But the Captaine of the Citadell seeing things succede otherwayes then he looked for, began to discharge the artillery vpon the Florentines: with which accident vnlooked for, the Commissioners and leaders maruelling not a little, many of their souldiers slaine and hurt by the artillery, and Paule Vitelli wounded in one of his legges, they sounded the retraite, holding it impossible to take Pyfa at that time for the furious resistance of the Citadell: yea within few daies after, they were constrained for the harmes they receiued by the artillery, to abandon the suburbes which they had brought into their power, and so retired with great discouragement and no lesse discontented to Cassina, till the King had reformed so manifest a disobedience of his subiects.

In this meane while also, the Florentines were not without their perplexities, for new and dangerous practises stirred vp principally by the Potentates of the league: who to giue the more impediments to the conquest of Pyfa, and by some new necessities at home, to enforce them to leaue the alliance of the french King, incensed Peter de Medicis to make triall, with the aide of Virginio Vrsin, (fled from the french campe the day of the battell of Taro,) to returne to Florence: a matter of right easie perswasion both to the one and other: for that to Virginio it sortd to good purpose (what so euer came to the enterprise) to reassemble at the charges of others, his auncient bandes and partakers, and readresse him selfe estioones in the reputation of armes: And Peter according to the custom of men banished, had no want of diuerse hopes for the multitude of friends which he had in the city, by whom he had intelligence that the gouernment popular was displeasing to many of the nobles, and no lesse intollerable to many of his faction and followers, which by reason of the auncient greatnesse of his house, was almost vniuersall through the whole dominion of Florence: It was beleued that this plot tooke his first deuise and beginning at Milan, for that Virginio was no sooner escaped out of the hands of the french, then he made his first office to goe visite the Duke: but afterwards the resolution succeeded at Rome, where did negociat many daies with the Pope, the Embassadour of Venice, and the Cardinall Ascanius, who proceeded by Commission from Lodowike his brother. These were the grounds and hopes of this enterprise: that besides the bandes which Virginio should leaue of his old souldiers, and with ten thousand duckars gathered by Peter de Medicis of his owne, and by the liberalities of his friends, Iohn Bentiuole (being then in the pay of the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan) should at the same instant make war against them vpon the frontier of Bologna: and also that Katherine Sforce, whose sonne took pay of the Duke of Milan, should vex them by the cities of Imola and Furlly, confining vpon the landes of the Florentines. Lastly they made promise to them selues (not in vaine) to haue at their deuotion the Siemoys, no lesse inflamed with an old hatred against the Florentines, then desirous to embrace occasions to preferue Montepulcian, a towne which they distrusted not to be able to defend of them selues, for that hauing attempted not many moneths before with their owne.

strength, and the bandes of the Lord of Plombyn, and Iohn Sauelle (whom the Duke Ernest joined in common with them) to make themselves Lordes of the countrey of the marriſh of Chianes, which marriſh had bene long time the limite or marke ſtone of that ſide betweene the Florentines and them, and to that end they had begunne to make neare to the bridge of Valiane, a baſtillion to beate a tower erected by the Florentines upon the point towards Montpulcian: things fell out contrary to their hopes and expectation: for that the Florentines, moued with the daunger of the loſſe of this bridge, which not onely took from them all meanes to moleſt Montpulcian, but alſo gaue entrie to the enemies into the territories of Cortona and Arezzo and other peeces, which on the other ſide of Chianes appertained to their iuriſdiction, ſent thither a ſtrong ſuccour, which forced the baſtillion begunne by the Siennoyſ: and for their full ſurety of that peece, they planted neare the bridge (but on the other ſide Chianes) a baſtillion conuenient to beſtow many ſouldiers in: by whoſe helpe and commodity they made roades euen to the gates of Montpulcian, vexing with like actions all the townes of the Siennoyſ on that ſide. To which ſucceſſe was ioyned this fortune, that a little after the paſſage of the french King, they had broken neare to Montpulcian, the bands of the Siennoyſ, and made priſoner Iohn Sauelle their Captaine. But Virginio and Peter de Medicis hoped to obtaine place of retraite with other commodities of the people of Peruſia, not onely for that the family of the Bailions, (who with armes and aides of their followers, were almoſt become Maſters of that city) were vnited to Virginio in a common fidelity to the name and faction of the Guelfſſ, and had withall familiar and ſtraight friendſhips with Lawrence and Peter de Medicis whileſt he ruled in Florence, by whoſe fauours and other miniſtrations they had ſpeciall countenance againſt all action of their enemies: but alſo being the ſubiects of the Church (but more in demonſtrations then in effects) it was beleeued that in things concerning principally their eſtates, they would yeeld to the will of the Pope, hauing community therein the conſent of the Venetiſans and Duke of Millan. Virginio then and Peter de Medicis departed from Rome with theſe hopes, and occupying amongſt them ſelues theſe perſwaſions, that the Florentines trauelled with ciuill diuiſions at home, and vexed by their neighbours abroad vnder the name of their confederates, could hardly make reſiſtance: and remaining certaine daies betweene Terni and Todi and theſe confines, where Virginio ſtudying by all meanes to plucke downe the Gebelins faction, leauied men and money of the Guelfſſes. At laſt they ſetled their campe in fauour of the Peruſins, before Gualde, a towne poſſeſſed by the communalty of Fuligni, but ſold before by the Pope for fixe thouſand ducats to the Peruſins, who were no leſſe inflamed with a deſire to haue it, then incenſed with the contention of the parties, by reaſon of whoſe dealings all the townes about inclined then to emotion and inſurrection: for not many daies before, the family of the Oddies, baniſhed from Perouſa and chieftaines of the faction contrary to the Bailions, hauing aides of them of Fuligni, Arezzo, and other peeces there adioyning, which embraced the part of the Gebelins, were entred Corriciana, (a ſtrong peece within ſiue miles of Perouſa) with three hundreth horſe, and ſiue hundreth footmen: for which accident, all the countrey being riſen (for Spolette, Camerin, and other places of the Guelfſſes, were fauourable to the Bailions) they of Oddies within few daies after entred by night within Perouſa, and that with ſuch aſtoniſhment to the Bailions, that hauing loſt hope and ability of defence, they began to put them ſelues to flight: but the Oddies, by a ſmall and vnlooked for aduenture, loſt that victory, which the power of their enemies could not deſtroy them of: for that being come without impediment to one of the entries of the principall place, and one of them who for that purpoſe caried a hatchet, offering to cut in peeces the chaine drawne ouer the way according to the cuſtome of cities in faction: and being ſo troubleſomely enuironed with the preſſe of his companies, that hee had no ſpace to liſt vp his arme to hew the chaine, cried with a loud voice, giue backe, giue backe, to the end that hauing more roome, his liberty might be more furthering to the action he went about. This voice being wrong vnderſtood, and repeated from hand to hand by ſuch as followed him, and ſo deliuered to others in a ſence ſounding to retire and flie, it was the cauſe that all the companies without other encounter or let, ſell ſodainely to flie, not one knowing by whom they were chaſed, nor for what occaſion they fled. This diſorder reſtored the aduerſaries to ſuch preſent courage, that re-aſſembling their ſtrength, they charged them in the chaſe, and made great ſlaughter, taking priſoner Troylo Sauelle, who for the ſame affection to the faction, had bene ſent to the ſuccours of the Oddies, by Cardinall Sauella: and applying their forces to the occaſion that was offered, they followed.

followed the chase enen to Corciana; which they recovered in this action and with the same fury: and lastly not contented with the death of such as they had slaine in the chase, they hanged many at Perusia, following the cruelty which for the most part other factions are wont to vse: of which tumults, many murders happening in the places bordering, for that in seasons doubtfull, the parties are carefull; and doe customably draw into insurrection, either for desire to cut off their enemies, or for feare to be preuented by them. The Perusins inflamed against the Faligians, had sent the campe to Gualda, and hauing given the assault to it in vaine, with no lesse distrust to cary it by their owne strength, they accepted the aides of Virginio who offered him selfe to them, to the end that at the brute of booty and spoile, the souldiers might runne with more readinesse to the warre; and albeit they were pressed by him, and by Peter de Medicis to minister openly to their enterprise, or at least to giue some peece of artillery or place of retraite for their people at Chastillon du lac confining vpon the territory of Cortone, with commodity of victuals for the army: yet they consented to neuer one of the demands, notwithstanding the Cardinall Ascanius made in the name of the Duke of Mullan great instance; and the Pope commaunding no lesse by writtes vehement and full of threats. All this was, for that since the taking of Corciana, the Florentines lending them money, and giuing yearely pension to Guido and Radolpho chiefe of the Baillois, and lastly, hauing taken into their pay Iohn Paule sonne to Radolpho, they were of their side and conioyned with them. Besides these, they were estraunged from the amity of the Pope, for that they feared he stood fauourable and inclined to the cause of their aduersaries, or at least, by the occasion of their diuisions, they suspected that he aspired to put absolutely that city vnder the obedience of the Church. In this time, Paule Vrsin, who with three score men at armes of the old company of Virginio, had remained many daies at Montpulcian, and afterwards was gone to the borough of Pisna, entertained (by the direction of Peter de Medicis) a practise in the city of Cortone, with intention to execute it at such time as the bandes of Virginio should approach, whose numbers not vertue aunswered not the first plots: but during that respite of time, the practise being discouered, which was builded vpon the foundation and meant of one of the exiles of base condition: one part of their generall groundes and demises began to faile, and withall many great impediments to appeare: for the Florentines, in whom was alwaies nourished a carefull pollicy to provide for dangers, leauing in the countrey of Pysa three hundred men at armes, and two thousand footmen, had sent to encampe neare Cortone, two hundred men at armes, and two thousand footmen vnder the leading of Count Rinucca de Marciane, whom they had made Mercenary in their pay. And to the end the bands of the Siennays should haue no oportunitie to ioine with Virginio, according to the practise betweene them, they sent to Poggi imperiall vpon the borders of the countrey of Sienna vnder the gouernment of Guidobalde of Montfetre Duke of Vrbino, (whom they had entertained into their pay a little before) three hundred men at armes, and fifteen hundred footmen, besides many banished from Sienna (with whom they adioined) to keepe the city in greater feare: But after Virginio had giuen many assaults to Gualda, where Charles his bastard sonne receiued a wound with a small shot, and hauing embraced the moneys sent secretly to him, as was suppoled by the Faligians, he raised his campe without mention or respect to the interestes of the Perusins, and marched to the tabernacles, and so to Panicale, in the countrey of Peroufa, making new instance that they would be declared against the Florentines: a thing which they did not onely deny to him, but also for the discontentment they had of his actions at Gualda, they compelled him almost with threatnings to depart out of their territories: In so much that Peter and he going first with foure hundred horse to Orsina, a towne neare to Cortone, hoping that in that city (which to auoyde the harmes of the souldiers had refused to receiue the men at armes of the Florentines) they should finde some tumult. After they saw all things in quiet and stability, they passed ouer Chianes with three hundred men at armes, and three thousand footmen, but the most part in confusion and ill order, because they had bene driuen backe, hauing but a very small proportion of money: They retired vpon the countrey of Sienna neare to Montpulcian betweene Chianciana, Torre, and Asma longue, where they remained many daies without other action then certaine incursions and pillages; hauing the bandes of the Florentines, (which passed Chianes at the bridge of Valiance) encamped directly opposite vpon the hill Sansauin, and other places thereabouts. Neither of the side of Bologna (as they hoped) was any insurrection, for that Bentiuole, not determining for the interestes and regards of an other, to enter warre with a common weale mighty and his neighbor, refused the quarrell and the defense, notwithstanding the perswasions of the confederates, to whom he made many excuses, and used no lesse delays, neither was he curious to consent, that many demonstrations should be made by Lu- lian de Medicis, who being come from Bologna, labored to sture vp the friends wh^{ch} they were accustomed to haue in the Mountaines of that countrey. Amongest the confederates there was not one consent of will and inclination, for that it was very acceptable to the Duke of Millan, that the Florentines should be vexed with those trauels; thereby to be lesse able for the matters of Py- sa; but it nothing pleased him, that Peter de Medicis (so greatly iniured by him) should returne to Florence; notwithstanding (to declare that hereafter he would wholly depend vpon his autho- rity) he had sent to Millan in solemne order his brother the Cardinall. And touching the Veneti- ans, they liked not to haue the burden of that warre imposed vpon them, and much lesse to em- brace alone the quarrell: besides, the Duke and they were busie to leauy prouisions to expulse the french out of the kingdome of Naples. In which respects, sayling in Peter and Virgino not onely the hopes which they expected, but also the moneys greatly diminishing to entertaine their bandes of footmen and horsemen, the necessities of their estates, and consideration of their pro- per safeties, caused them to withdraw to Bagno Rapulano in the countrey of Chiusa, a city sub- iect to the Siemoy: where not many dayes after (Virgino being drawne by his destiny) arriued

Camilla Vitelli and M. de Gemel, sent by the french King to entertaine him into his pay, and leade him into the kingdome of Naples, where the King desired to serue his purpose of him, hearing of the defection of the Colonnys. This offer (albeit many of his friends impugned it, aduising him ra- ther to follow the seruice of the confederates, who made great solicitation to him, or else to be- come for the Aragons) was embraced and accepted by him, either for that he hoped by that meane to be more able to recouet the landes and countrey of Alba and F-alle coffe, or else, re- membering eftsoones how things happened in the losse of the kingdome, and seeing the authority of the Colonnys his ancient aduersaries was so great with Ferdinand, that there was no confidence of reconciliation, and much lesse to be readressed into his former greatnesse: or lastly, for that he was moued, (as him selfe did assure) with a discontentment which he had of the Princes confede- rate, sayling to accomplish those promises which they made to him to minister fauors to Peter de Medicis: Virgino then entred pay with the french King, receiuing contract as well for him, as for others of the house of the Vrsins for sixe hundred men at armes: notwithstanding vnder this ob- ligation (such be the fruites of those that once haue made their faith suspected) to send his sonne

Charles into Fraunce for the Kings surety: And being possessed of the kings money, he prepared him selfe to goe with the Vitellies to the kingdome of Naples, where both before the losse of the castels and after, was continuall insurrection in many places with diuerse accidents and fortunes.

For, after Ferdinand had in the beginning made head in the plaine of Sarmy, the french men that were retired from Piedgrothe, were incamped at Nocere within foure miles of the enemy, where their forces being equall, it appeared their dispositions did not differ, for that they consumed the time vnprofitably in skirmishing without any action worthy of memory: sauing that seuen hun- dred of the army of Ferdinand, as well footemen as horsemen, being led by a double intelligence to enter the borough of Gisone, neare the towne of S. Seuerin, remained almost all vpon the place either slaine or made prisoners. But the bandes of the Pope being come to the succours of Fer- dinand, and by that meane the french made more inferiour, they retired from Nocere, which by that occasion, together with the castell, was taken by Ferdinand with a great slaughter of such as had followed the french quarrell. In this time Monsier Montpensier had forseene to furnish of horses, and other things necessary for the warre, such as were come with him from the new cas- tell: with whom, after he had remounted them in good order, he went to ioyne with the others, and after came to Ariana, a towne abounding with victuals: on the other side, Ferdinand seeing him selfe lesse strong then the enemy, stayed at Monfuskule to temporise, without assaying of for- tune vntill the confederates had refurnished him with a greater succour: M. Montpensier tooke the towne, and afterwards the castell of S. Seuerin, and with that fortune had done farre greater things if the want present of money, and the difficulties to get some, had not bene impediments to his oportunity and vertue: for hauing no reliefe sent out of Fraunce, nor meane to leauy any in the kingdome of Naples, he could not pay the souldiers, by which reason the army inclining to discontentment, and the Switzers drawing into murmure, he had no possibilty to do things whole whose effects might answer the forces he had: In such like actions were consumed by the one and other army, about three moneths: in which season, Dom Federike hauing with him Cesar of Aragon, made warre in Ponilla: he was ayded by those of the countrey, against whom made head the barons and peoples that embraced the french part: on the other side, Gracian de Guerres made valiant defence in Abruzzo against Ferdinand; and the Prefect of Rome, who had the kings pay for two hundred men at armes, vexed with his estates the landes of Montefaso, and the countrey thereabouts, where was somewhat declined the prosperity of the french, by the long sicknesse of M. d' Aubigny, the same breaking the course of his victory, although almost all Calabria and the principality remained at the deuotion of the french King: But Consaluo, who with a strength of the Spanish bandes, with such of the countrey as bare friendship to the Aragons (now well increased by the conquest of Naples,) had taken there certaine places, and made strong in that prouince the name of Ferdinand, where the french found the same difficulties which were in the army for want of money: Notwithstanding the city of Cosenza being drawne into rebellion against them, they recouered it and sackt it. But in these great necessities and dangers, appeared no succour at all out of the realme of Fraunce: for that the King staying at Lyons, amused the time about iustes, torneys, and other pleasures of Court, leauing there all his thoughts of the war: And albeic he assured his counsell alwayes, that he would estsoones consider of the affaires of Italy, yet the effects and actions that proceeded from him, discredited the promises he had made to haue remembrance of them: And yet Argenton brought him this answer from the Senate of Venice, Cominyu that they pretended to haue no disfriendship with him, for that they entred not into armes vntill he had gotten Nocere, and yet for no other cause then for the defence of the Duke of Millan their confederate: and therefore they thought it a thing superfluous, to ratifie estsoones the auncient friendship with a new peace: Besides they offered him, that by the mediation of persons indifferent, they would induce Ferdinand, to giue him presently some summe of money, with constitution of a tribute of fifty thousand duckats by yeare, and to leaue in his handes for his security, Tarenta vntill a certaine time. The King, as though he had had a prepared and puissant succour, refused to open his eares to these offers, notwithstanding, (besides these perplexities of Italy) he was not without vexations vpon the frontiers of Fraunce: seeing Ferdinand King of the Spanish (come in person to Parpignian) had made incursions into Languedock, where they did no small harmes, adding to their present fury, other demonstrations of far greater emotions. Besides it was not long since the Dauphin of Fraunce, the onely sonne of the King, died; all which things (if he had bene capable to make wise election of peace or warre) ought to haue brought him with more facility to condescend to some accord.

Offers made vnto the King by the Venetians for Ferdinand.

The death of the Dauphin.

About the end of this yeare, were determined the controuersies happening by reason of the Citadell of Pyas: for the french King vnderstanding by good information the obstinacy of the capitaine, sent thither at last Monsieur Gemel, with threatnings and commaundements rigorous, not onely addrest to him, but generally to all the french appertaining to the charge and seruice of the sayd Citadell: And a little after, he dispatched thither expressly M. Bonne cosin to the Capitaine, to the end that being informed by a person whom he might trust, both of the kings message, and also the meane to satisfie with present obedience his former faults and contumacy: and of the other part, the daunger wherein he stood continuing in disobedience: he might with more readinesse proceede to the execution of his Maiesties commandement and iust will. All these could not remoue the Capitaine from his first resolution, who abiding in his transgression, made no reckening of the message of Gemel, staying there a few dayes according to his Commission to goe with Camilla Visello to finde Virginio. And much lesse was the comming of Bonne (who was hindered many dayes, for that by direction of the Duke of Millan he was retained at Serezana) to any purpose to turne the Capitaine from his obstinacy. But hauing wrought Rome to his consent and opinion, he made a contract with the Pyasans (Luke Maluozze commaunding in the name of the Duke) by vertue whereof he deliuered to the Pyasans the first day of the yeare 1496, their Citadell, receiuing of them twenty thousand duckats, whereof twelve thousand to remaine to him selfe, and eight thousand to be deuided in shares amongest the particular souldiers. This money was not leauied of the stores or wealth of the Pyasans, in whom was no meane to entertaine their proper condition, and much lesse to refurnish expences extraordinary; onely not to lose the opportunity of the Citadell, they prayd the aides of their friends, hauing foure thousand of the Venetians,

four thousand of the Genoways and Luckoyes, and four thousand of the Duke of Millan: who vſing at the ſame time his ordinary ſhiftes and practiſes (whereunto was giuen little faith) he ſollicited faintly to enter with the Florentines into firme intelligence and amity, & was already agreed of conditions with their Embaſſadours.

It can not in any conſtruction carry likelihood of truth, that Monſier de Ligni, the Captaine, or any other would haue vſed ſo great tranſgreſſion without the Kings will and liking, ſeeing chiefly the matter was ſo much to his diſaduauntage: for that albeit the Captaine had capitulated, that the city of Pyla ſhould continue in the obedience of the crowne of Fraunce, yet it remained manifeſtly at the deuotion of the confederates: and for that the reſtitution tooke not effect, the french men that were left in the realme of Naples were naked of the ſuccours of men and money, promiſed in the contract of Thurin: The Florentines obſeruing diligently the action of all things, (albeit in the beginning they made great doubt) were poſſeſt at laſt with this opinion, that all was done contrary to the will of the King: a thing which might ſeeme incredible to all others that knew not what was his nature, nor what were the conditions of his wit and cuſtomes, nor how little authority he bare amongſt his people; and laſtly, how eaſily men are emboldened againſt a Prince that is falſe into indignity and contempt.

Reasons why the Pyſans offer themſelues to the Duke of Millan.

After the Pyſans were entred by heapes into the Citadell, they razed it flat with the earth: and knowing their owne ſtrength not ſufficient to beare out the defence and protection of their cauſe, they ſent at the ſame inſtant Embaſſadours to the Pope, to the King of Romaines, to the Venetians, to the Duke of Millan, to the Genoways, to the Siennoyes, and to the Lucquoys, praying ſuccours of euery one by particular ſute and diſcourſe, but with greater inſtance of the Venetians, and Duke of Millan, towards whom they nourished a francke inclination to tranſfere the iuriſdiction of their city: wherein they had this cogitation and ſeeming, that they were conſtrained not ſo much to looke to the preſeruation of their liberty, as to eſchew the neceſſity to returne eſtsoon into the power of the Florentines. Their hopes alſo were more partiall in him, then in any of the reſidue, for that beſides he was the firſt ſturrer of them to rebellion by reaſon of neighbourhoode, yet reaping from the other confederates no other thing then generall hopes, they had alwayes receiued from him preſent and ready ſuccours: But the Duke (notwithſtanding his deſire and ambition were importunate) ſtoode doubtfull whether he ſhould accept it, for feare leaſt the other confederates would grow diuided by it, in whoſe counſels was now begunne to treat of the affaires of Pyla, as of a common cauſe. By reaſon whereof, ſometimes he would deſire the Pyſans to deferre, and ſome times aduiſed them that it might be done in publicke action, and in the name of the Sainct Seuerins, and he to diſcloſe that all was done to his profite, when he ſhould ſee his time: But in the end (deſire of dominion is troubleſome till the appetite be ſatiſfied) when he ſaw the french King was gone out of Italy, and finding withall that his neceſſities and occasions with the confederates were not now ſo great, he determined to embrace it.

But this inclination of the Pyſans began to grow cold, for the great hopes they had to be ſuccoured by the Senate of Venice: and withall, they had this counsell of others, that more eaſily might they defend their eſtate with the aide of many, then to ſtand vpon the ſuccors of one alone, finding by this meane a more greater hope to maintaine their liberty with full protection: according to theſe conſiderations, after they had obtained the Citadell, they laboured to bring to their defence and ſtrength, the fauours and ſuccours of euery one, for the furtherance of which intention, the diſpoſition of the eſtates of Italy ſerued to good purpoſe: for the Genoways, for the malice they bare to Florence, and the Siennoyes and Lucquoys for hatred and feare, were alwayes to miniſter ayde to them in ſome ſort, wherein to proceed with more reſolution & order, they ſollicited to make a contract with obligations reſolute for that effect: To the Venetians and Duke of Millan, entertayning one deſire to be their ſoueraigne Lords, it could not but be intollerable that they returned to the rule of the Florentines: and with the Pope and the Embaſſadours of the Spaniſh, much helped them, their common deſire to plucke downe the Florentines, as being too much inclined to the doings of Fraunce: So that hauing bene graciously heard in euery place, and obtrayned of the elect Emperour the priuiledge of confirmation of their liberty: they brought from Venice and Millan the ſame promiſes, to preſerue them in their liberty which they had made afore with one common conſent, to helpe to deliuer them from the french. And the Pope in the name and conſent of all the Potentates of the league, encouraged them by a ſpeciall ſignature, with promise that they should be mightily defended of every one: But in these great promises and hopes, the most apparant succours came from the Venetians and Duke of Millan, the Duke augmenting the number of men that were there first, and the Senat refurnishing them with a proportion sufficient: an action wherein if they had both continued, the Pisans had not bene constrained to sticke more to the one then to the other of them, and by that meane also, the common benefite had bene more easily preserved: But as in all things not followed with the same industry wherein they are begunne, the end is lesse then the expectation: so it happened to the Duke of Millan, who (fearing alwayes great expences, and being inclined of nature to proceed in all actions with apparances and shifts) made his accompt that the iurisdiction of Pisa could not but fall into his handes, and therefore began with small proportions to furnish things which the Pisans demanded of him: In which distrust and incertainty of dealing, they tooke occasion to transfer all their inclinations to the Venetians, in whom they found a plentiful reliefe in all their necessities without any sparing: from whence proceeded, that a few moneths after the french had redeliuered the Citadell, the Senate of Venice required by the generall and importunat suites of the Pisans, determined to take the city into their protection, the Duke of Millan rather perswading them to it, then making any shew of misliking. This was done without the priuity of the other confederates, not once communicating with them either generally or a part, notwithstanding in the beginning they had giuen them comfort to send bandes of men to their succours: but now they alledged that they were no more bound to their promises, for that without their consent, they had particularly couenanted with the Venetians.

Lodowike inclined to shifts

The Venetians in mind to take upon them the defence of Pisa. Pisa denied succours by the confederates.

It is most certaine, that neither the desire to preserve the liberty of their neighbours (which in their owne countrey they loue much) nor any regard to the common benefite and safety (as they did alwayes publish with honourable wordes) but the onely desire to get the iurisdiction of Pisa, were the causes that the Venetians made this resolution: By the meane whereof they doubted not in short time to reap a sweete fruite of their ambitious desire, euen with the will of the Pisans themselves, in whom was a willing election to liue vnder the rule of Venice, the better to be alwayes assured, not to be repassed eitsoones into the seruitude of the Florentines. And yet notwithstanding this inclination to protect the Pisans, it was often times and with long discourse debated in the Senate, the generall disposition being almost hindered, for the authority of some of the most auncient and esteemed Senators, who impugning it with mighty reasons, assured the residue, that to appropriate the gouernment and defence of Pisa, was a matter full of difficulties, for that by land it was a state farre from their confines, and by sea much farther removed from all their good opportunities, hauing no meane to goe thither, but by the dwellings and hauens of others, fetching a compasse about both the seas that enuiron Italy, for which reasons they could not defend it from the continuall vexations of the Florentines; but with intollerable expences. They could not deny, but such an enlargement would be very honourable for the state of Venice: but they withheld there might be made aduised considerations of the difficulties to keepe it, and much more conference of the conditions of the time present, together with that which might happen by such a deliberation: for that all Italy being suspicious of their greatnesse, such an increase of Lordship could not but be extreemly iealous and displeasing to all, wherein would be bred easily more great and dangerous accidents then happily were looked into of many: such were greatly deceived in whose perswasions was this surety, that the other Potentats would suffer without gainsaying, that to their Lordship and impery so redoubted through all Italy, should be ioyned so great opportunities by the demeane of Pisa: wherein if they were not (as they haue bene) so mighty to withstand it of their proper strength, they were not (seeing the way was taught to them on the other side the mounts to passe into Italy) without great occasion to oppose against them forraigne force, to the which (no doubt) they would haue ready recourse, as well for hate as for feare (this being a vice common to all men, to seeke rather to serue straungers, then to giue place to their owne.) And touching the Duke of Millan, how can it be beleeued, that he accustomed to be carried sometimes by ambition and hope, sometimes by suspition and feare, and now being stirred no lesse with disdain then iealousie, to be transferred to the Venetians, that pray which he had sought by so many meanes and studies for him selfe: will not rather be ready to bring new troubles vpon Italy, then endure that Pisa should be occupied by others then him selfe: And albeit with words and counsels he declared the contrary, yet let it be an opinion absolute, that those apparances were but disguised and farre from the intention and truth of his heart, contayning no other thing, then ambulches and counsels full of art tending to an ill end: in fellowship & company of whom it were a necessary wisdom to support that city, if not for other respect, at the least to let that the inhabitants should not transfer it to him; But to make it a cause proper or particular drawing after it so great enuy and no lesse charges, were a counsell neither wise nor well ruled: That they ought to consider how much contrary would be those thoughts, to the workes and actions wherein for so many moneths, they were so much trauelled and yet vexed continually: for that no other occasions did moue the Senate to take armes with so great expence and danger, then the desire to deliuer and reasssure as well them selues as the other regions of Italy from the rule of strangers: wherein hauing giuen a beginning with a successe so glorious, and yet the french King scarcely repassed the Mounts, and the most part of the kingdom of Naples following his faction with a strong army: what indiscretion, what infamy, what stained reputation would it be, (at a time needful to confirme the liberty and surety of Italy) to replant and sow againe seedes of new calamities: which might easies make speedy and easie the returne of the french, or else the descending of the king of Romans, to whom (pretending as euery one knoweth against their estate) could happen no greater occasion nor more strong desire then this: That the common weale of Venice was not brought to those tearmes, to embrace counsels dangerous, nor to go before occasions, and much lesse take them whilst they were greene: No, rather no estate in all Italy stood vpon better tearmes to expect the opportunity of times, and with lesse perill could tary till occasions were ripe: that deliberations headlong, rash, or doubtfull, became well those that suffered hard or sinister conditions, or such as being pushed forward with ambition and desire to make their name famous, feared to haue want of time: That such resolutions were altogether dangerous to a common weale, who rayled into so great power, dignity, and authority, stood redoubted and enuid of all the residue of principalities in Italy: and who in regard of other Kings and Princes almost immortall and perpetuall, retaining alwayes one self and settled name of a Senat of Venice, had neuer occasion to hasten their deliberations afore the time: that it appertained better to the wisdom and grauity of that Senate (considering according to the property of men truly wise, the dangers that lay hidde under those hopes and ambitions, & looking more into the ends then beginnings of things, to reject those counsels, and to abstaine as well in the occasion of Pisa, as others offering to altonish or kindle the spirits of others, vntill at the least, Italy were better assured of the suspitions and dangers of those on the other side the Mounts, forbearing in any wise to giue them new occasion of tearmes: for that experience had shewed in very few moneths, how Italy when she was not oppressed by strange nations, followed almost the authority of the Senat of Venice, but so long as the forraigne forces occupied place in this empire, in place to be followed and redoubted of the others, they with the others had reason to feare power of strangers. These and like reasons conformed to the desires of the greatest number, were surmounted and caried ouer with the perswasions of Augustus Barbarin Duke of the same city, whose rule was become so great and general, that exceeding the modesty of the Dukes past, he aspired rather to a power absolute, then authority limited or regulated: for that, besides that he had many yeares managed that dignity with happy successe, and besides his many excellent gifts and graces of the mind, he had so preuayled with singularity of cunning dealing, that many Senators (willingly opposed against such, as in a name to be wise for long experience, and for that they had obtrayned supreme dignities, were of greatest reputation in that common weale) linked to him, and followed commonly his opinions, rather in a manner of confederates and partakers, then with that forme of grauity and integrity, which duly is requisite in the office of Councillours. He desirous to leaue with the encrease of the state, a worthy memory of his name, not putting any end to his appetite after glory, and much lesse contented that during his rule, the Ile of Cipres (sayling the Kings of the house of Lusignan) should be annexed to the Empire of Venice: was importunar to embrace euery occasion to make great their estate: in which inclination, opposing him selfe against those who for the regard of Pisa, councelled the contrary,

he shewed with round discourse of words and reasons, how much it imported the Senate in villity and conueniency to haue Pisa, and how much it concerned them to repress by this meanes the arrogancy of the Florentines, who in the death of Phillip Maria Visconti had made them lose the occasio to be Lords of the Duchy of Millan, and of late in their action of loanes of money during the french wars, had done more harme then any one of the other Potentates: he declared that

kingdome are offered so goodly occasions, what infamy to lose them, and afterwards what repentance would follow for not embracing them: That the conditions of Italy were not such, that in the other Potentates was power of them selues to oppose against the enterprise, and much lesse was there doubt, that for this indignation or feare, they would haue recourse to the french King: for that neither the Duke of Millan hauing so highly offended him, durst estsoones trust him, neither such thoughtes moued the Pope: And the King of Naples, when hee had requeered his kingdome, would heare no more speaking of the french men. Besides, their entry into Pisa (albeit grieuous to others) was not an accident so furious, nor a perill so neare, as in regard of that, the other Potentates should runne rashly into those remedies which are vsed in the last dispaire, no more then the Physition makes hast to giue strong medicines in sleight diseases, esteeming that the patient hath time enough to take them: That if in this weakenesse and separation of the other Italians, they were fearefull to make reckening of so goodly occasion, it were an expectation vaine, to tary to be able to do it with more surety, the other Potentates being returned into their former strengths, and no lesse assured from the feare of them on the other side the Mountes: That for a remedy of too great a feare, they had to consider, that all worldly actions were ordayned to many perils: But wise men knew that there falles not alwayes in question all the ils that may happen: for that either by the benefite of fortune, or by aduenture, many daungers are dissolued, and many auoyded with industry and helpe of the time: And therefore it is no office in men deliberating vpon enterprises, to confound (as many affirme, considering little the property of names and substance of things) feare with discretion, and much lesse are to be reputed wise, those sorts of people, who making certaine all perils that are doubtfull, (and therefore haue feare of all) do rule their deliberation as if they should all happen, seeing in no manner can merite the name of wise or discrete, such men as feare more then they ought, things that are to fall: That such title and praise was farre more conuenient for men valiant and couragious, for that looking into the state and nature of daungers (and in that regard different from the rash sort, in whom is no impression of offence or iudgement of perils) they doe notwithstanding discouer how often men, sometime by aduenture, and sometimes by vertue, are deliuered from many difficulties: So that those that in deliberating call not into counsell as well hope, as feare, doe most commonly iudge for certaine, the events that are vncertaine, and reiect more easily then others, occasions profitable and honourable: In imitation of whom, and withall setting afore our eyes, the weakenesse and separation of the other Potentates, the great power and fortune of the common weale of Venice, the magnanimity and glorious examples of our elders, we may embrace with a francke resolution, the protection of the Pisians, by whose meane, we may in short time see our selues absolute Lords of that city, a ladder most conuenient to rayse vs to the Monarchy of all Italy. Thus the Senate receiued the Pisians into protection by decree publike, and speciall promise to defend their liberty: which deliberation was not in the beginning considered by the Duke of Millan as was conuenient: for by this meanes being excluded to entertaine any bands there, he held it very acceptable to be deliuered of such expences: he esteemed it also not out of the way of his profite, that Pisa at one time should be the occasion of great charges both to the Venetians and the Florentines. Lastly he perswaded him selfe that the Pisians, for the greatnesse and neighbourhood of his estate, and for the memory of things done by him for their deliuey, would be so dedicated to him, that they would alwayes preferre him before all others.

He tooke delight to feed the humour of these deuises and deceitfull hopes, with a perswasion wherewith (litle remembring the ordinary inconstancy of humaine things) he nourished him selfe, to haue as it were vnder his feete, fortune, whose sonne he would not sticke with publicke vaunting to say he was: so much was he puffed vp with vaine glory, by the prosperous succeeding of his affaires, and no lesse ouerruled with singular weening, for that by his meanes and his conncelles, the french King first passed into Italy, appropriating to him selfe the chace giuen to Peter de Medici by the Florentines with losse of his estate, the rebellion of the Pisians, and the flying of the Aragonians from the realme of Naples: and afterwards with a counsell chaunged, he was the cause by his deuises and authority, of the confederation of so many Potentates against the french King, of the returne of Ferdinand into the kingdome of Naples, of the departing of the french out of Italy with conditions vnworthy such a greatnesse. And lastly, in the action of the Captaine, who had in charge the Citadell of Pisa, wherein his industry or his authority had more power then the will and commaundments of his King: with which rules measuring things to come, and indig-the wisdom and pollicy of all others to be farre inferiour to the excellency of his spirite, he har-red him selfe to be alwaies able to addresse and gouerne the affaires of Italy as he would, and with his industry to turne and winde the mindes of euery one. This fond perswasion he could not dissemble neither in him selfe, nor in his peoples, and no more in words and gestures, then in demonstrations and actions, making it a thing acceptable to him, that euery one beleueed and spake so by him: in so much that Millan day and night was replenished with voices vaine and glorious, celebrating with verses latine and vulgar, and with publicke orations full of flattery, the wonder-full wisdom of Lodowike Sforce, of the which they made to depend the peace and warre of Italy: they magnified his name euen to the third heauen, and the surname of More, (imposed vpon him from his youth, for that he was of complexion browne, and for the opinion of his crafts which now were manifest) hee was contented to retaine willingly so long as he remayned Duke of Millan: Then no lesse was the authority of this More in the other castelles of the Florentines, then it had bene in the Citadell of Pisa, so that in Italy, it seemed that as well enemies as friends, were ruled by the measure of his will, so cloaking his subtelties with apparaunces of friendship, that his intentions were not discerned, till his purposes were executed: For albeit the King of the french, hearing the grievous complaints made to him by the Embassadours of Florence, was not a little discontented, and to the end at least wise that their owne places might be rendred, had dispatched Robert de Veste his Chamberlaine with new commissions, and letters speciall from Monsieur de Ligny: yet his authority bearing no more power with others, then with him selfe, the audacity of Monseigneur de Ligny was so great (assuring many that he proceeded not but by the Kings will) that his Maiesties commaundments bare small reputation, by meane of his new commissions ioyned to the froward will of the castell keepers: In so much that the bastard of Vienna Lieutenant to Ligny in Serezana, after he had drawne his companies thither with the commissioners of the Florentines, to receiue possession of them, he gaue them to the Genoways, for the price of fue and twenty thousand duckats. The Captaine of Serezanella did the like for a summe of money, of which the author and onely meane was the More, who hauing opposed against the Florentines (but vnder the name of the Genoways) Frecasse with a hundreth horse and foure hundreth footemen, gaue hinderance that the Florentines, who by meane of their bands sent to receiue Serezana, had recouered certaine peeces in the countrey Lunigane, should not recouer all their places they had lost there. And a little after, Entragues late Captaine of the Citadell of Pisa, vnder whose gard also remained yet the castels of Pietra Santa, and Mutron, together with that of Li-brafrate, which not many moneths after he gaue to the Pisans, sold the residue to the Lucquoys for six and twenty thousand duckats, as precisely was directed to him by the Duke of Millan who first wished they might fall to the Genoways, but afterwards chaunging aduise, he thought it better to gratifie them of Lucquo, to the end they might haue occasion to minister ready aides to the Pisans, and to reduce them more to his deuotion by this benefite. All these things were caried into Fraunce, for the which albeit the King shewed him selfe much discontented with Ligny, and pronounced Entragues banished out of all his realmes, yet at the returne of Bonne (who not participating with the money of the Pisans, had treated at Genes the sale of Serezana) his iustifications were accepted, and graciously receiued an Embassadour of the Pisans, sent with him to per-swade the King that the Pisans would remaine faithfull subiects to the crowne of Fraunce, and to protest their fidelity by oath, albeit a little after, his commissions not being liked, he had francke leau to depart: to Monseigneur de Ligny was imposed no other paine, then (to shew that he had no more the Kings fauor) the grace to lie in his Maiesties chamber as he was wont, was taken fro him, to the which he was immediatly restored: and Entragues remayned onely in contumacy, but no long time: to which things gaue good aide (besides the Kings nature with other meanes and fauours) a true perswasion that was made, that such were the necessities of the Florentines, that they could not endure separation from him: for that the ambition of the Venetians and Duke of Millan being manifest, it was a certaine probability in discourse and reason, that if they were not repossessed of Pisa, they would neuer accord to be confederate with them for the defence of Italy, whereunto they sought to enduce them by threatnings and meanes rigorous, and did not for the present, assay any other thing against them, but relied sufficed; (with the bandes they had put into Pisa) to support that city, and not suffer her wholly to lose her iurisdiction (the daunger

of the kingdome of Naples drawing them from all other care) for Virgimo, who had gathered at Casino de Rapotano and in the countrey of Perusin, many companies of souldiers, marched with the Orsini towards Abruzze, holding also the same way with their bands, Camilla and Paule Vitelli, by whom the borough of Montion (refusing to giue them victuals) was put to the sacke: which so amazed the other places of the Church by the which they should passe, that notwithstanding the expresse defences of the Pope, they were receiued in all townes and relieved with victuals. By the reapport of those marchings, but much more for the brute of an assured succour comming by sea out of Fraunce, by which the French affaires seemed to stand vpon good termes in the kingdome of Naples: Ferdinand no lesse destitute of money, then enuironed on all sides with aspectes of daungers and difficulties of warre, and not able without great succours, to sustaine so great a burthen, was constrained to study for new remedies to his present defence. It is so, that in the beginning the other Potentates had not comprehended him in their league: and albeit since he had recouered Naples; the king of Spaine made instance to haue him admitted to the confederation, yet the Venetians would neuer agree to that point, perswading them selues that his necessities would be a ready meane to aduance the expectatiō of their plot, that one part of that Realme might fall into their obedience: So that Ferdinand left to the miseries of many aduersities, and made naked of all hopes (for he expected no new succours from Spaine, and the other confederates would not intangle them selues with so great expences.) was constrained to couenant with the Senate of Venice, (promising with all obseruances to the Pope and the king of Spaine:) That the Venetians should send to his succours into the Realme of Naples, the Marquis of Mantua their Captaine with seuen hundred men at armes, fīue hundred light horsemen, and three thousand footemen, maintaining still their armie by sea which was there already: with this condition notwithstanding, to reuoke those aydes at all times when they should haue neede to imploy them in their proper affaires: That they should lend to him fīftee thousand duckats to serue his necessities present: And for the securitie of these expences, Ferdinand to assigne vnto them Oprante, Brundusa, and Trane, with consent that they might still retaine Monopoli and Puligniana, which then were in their hands, vnder this couenant to render them, when their expences should be restored and satisfied: provided alwayes, that neither by reason of the warre, nor for the garding or fortifications which they should make, they should not redemaund of him aboue two hundred thousand duckats. Those portes being in the sea superiour, and therefore of great oportunitie to Venice, augmented much their greatnesse: which (no man now opposing against them, and since they embraced the protection of Pysa, not hearing more of the counsels of such, as wished that to windes so fauourable, they had giuen lesse sayles) began to be stretched through all the partes of Italie: for besides the things of the kingdome of Naples and Tuskane, they had of new takē to their pay, Astor Lord of Faenza, &c. accepted the protectiō of his estates: a man very conuenient to keepe in feare the Florentines, the Citie of Bologna, with all the residue of Romagnia.

Couenants betweene Ferdinand king of Naples and the Venetians.

To these particular aydes of the Venetians, were added other succours of the confederats; the Pope, the Duke of Myllan, and they, sending to Ferdinand a ioynt supply of bands of men at armes intertained at their common pay: and albeit the Duke of Myllan, in whom remained as yet many semblances to keepe the accord at Vercell, (notwithstanding the most part of those things were directed by his counsels) would not either in the leauies of men or money, or other demonstrations, that his name were vsed: yet he agreed secretly to contribute euery moneth ten thousand duckats for the succours of the kingdome of Naples.

The marching of the Orsini and the Vitellies assured greatly the affaires of Abruzze (which were in no small confusion) against the French men: seeing Terame and the Citie of Chiera were drawne into rebellion, with great doubt that Aquilea the principall towne of that region, would do the like: which they at their comming hauing reconfirmed in the deuotion of the French, and recouered Terame by composition, and sacked Iulianoue, almost all Abruzze was with one fortune esloones so reestablished, that the affaires of Ferdinand began to shew manifest declination through the whole kingdome: for that almost all Calabria was in the power of M. d' Aubigny, notwithstanding his long sicknesse, for the which he stayed in Terace, gaue oportunitie to Consalno to keepe the war kindled in that prouinee, with the Spanish bands, &c. strength of some Lordes of the countrey: Besides, Caietta with many places assisting followed the obedience of the French: The Prefect of Rome, with his companie and the forces of his estate, after he had recovered the peeces of Montcasin, invaded the land of Lauro on that side: and Monsieur Montpensier, albeit by the want of money he was much restrained to vse his forces, yet he compelled Ferdinand to inclose him selfe in strong places; being vexed with the same necessitie of money, and many other wants, but wholly reapposed vpon the hope of the succours of Venice, which for that the contract betweene the was made not long before, could not be aduanced with readinesse and expedition equall with the expectation of his affaires. Montpensier laboured to betray Beneuent by intelligence, but Ferdinand either hauing doubt or some aduertisement of the practise, preuented the execution by his suddaine entring the towne with his bands. The French notwithstanding came neare to Beneuent, and lodging vpon the bridge of Fynoch, they tooke Sinnezana, Apice, and many other townes bordering: but these places bearing no fauour to their armie for victuals, they discamped, hauing also regard to the time drawing on to gather the tribute of the cattell of Powylla, one of the greatest reuenues of the kingdome, for that it was wont to amount euery yeare to foure score thousand duckats, which were all gathered almost in the space of a moneth. Monsieur Montpensier to depriue them of this commoditie, and no lesse for the extreme necessities of his people, turned his way to Powylla, whereof one part was holden by him, and the other at the deuotion of Ferdinand, marching after him by the same way, with intention rather to hinder by art and diligence the actions of the enemy vntill his succours were arriued, then to fight with them in plaine battell.

at Caietta.

About this time arriued at Caietta, an armie by sea of the French, of fifteene great vessels, & seuen other of lesser burden, in which were imbarcked at Sanone eight hundred Launceknights, leauied in the countreys of the Duke of Gueldres, and those Swyzers and Gascoines appointed before by the king to be sent with those great shippes which were to be armed at Genes. To this naue the armie of Ferdinand which were aboute Caietta to stoppe the passage of victuals (being indeede for want of money ill appointed) gaue such place, that they entred the haue without impediment, set their footemen on land, and with the same fortune tooke Itry with other places assisting: and after they had made a great pray through the countrey, they hoped to haue Sesse by the meane of Dom Baptista Caracciol; by whom they had promise to be put secretly within it: but Dom Federyke (who with his bands that followed him being withdrawne to the borders of Tarenta, was afterwards sent by Ferdinand to the gouernement of Naples) being aduertised of the conspiracie, marched thither with speede equall to the daunger, and made prisoner the Bishop with certaine others consenting to the treason.

In Powylla, where was the force and strength of the warre, the affaires succeeded with diuersitie of fortunes to both the one and the other armie, which were dispersed into the townes, aswell for the sharpnesse of the season, as straitnesse of the place not sufficing to receiue one of the armies wholly: their exercises were to make incursions and roades on horsebacke to pill and pray the cattell, vsing rather industrie and agilitie, then vertue or force of armes. Ferdinand was lodged in Fogge with one part of his people, and had bestowed the residue, partly in Troye, and partly in Nocere: where vnderstanding that betweene S. Seuera (within which towne was lodged Virginio Vrsin with three hundred men at armes come to be vnited with the armie of Montpensier) & the towne of Porcina (where was Marian Saueila with a hundred men at armes) was brought almost an infinite quantitie of Muttons and other natures of cattell: he marcheth thither with six hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horsemen, and fifteene hundred footemen: and comming by the breake of the day afore S. Seuera, he planted him selfe there with his men at armes to giue resistance to Virginio if he made any eruption, and making his light horsemen to scoure abroad, they ouerspread forthwith the whole countrey, and led away almost three score thousand head of cattell: whereto Marian Saueila offering to make resistance, and issuing forth of Porcina, they constrained him to retire with the losse of thirty men at armes. This losse and shame procured M. Montpensier, (reassembling all his forces) to march towardes Fogge, for the recouerie of the pray and honour lost: where being fauoured with a succour aboute his hopes or expectation, he encountered betweene Nocere and Troye, eight hundred Launceknights newly arriued by sea, and entred into the pay of Ferdinand: these Launceknights departing from Troye where they were incamped, went to Fogge to ioyne with Ferdinand: a journey more vpon their owne brayne

and rathnesse, then by the kings commaundement, and altogether against the counsell of Fabrice Colonne, incamped likewise at Troye. And albeit they saw by the extremitie of their perill and place, that their fortune had left them no possibilitie of safetie, either by flying or fighting, yet they were obstinate and refused the libertie of the law of armes to be made prisoners, but were killed every creature of them, exchanging their liues with a great death and slaughter of the enemy. After this, Montpensier presented him selfe before Fogge in aray of battell: but Ferdinand not suffering others to go out then light horsemen, the French men went to incampe in the wood of Nicoronata, where after they had remained two dayes with no small difficulties for victuals, and hauing recouered the most part of the cattell, they appeared elswoones afore Fogge, and abiding there a whole night, they returned the day following, to S. Senera, but not with all the pray they had recouered, for that in their retraite, the light horsemen of Ferdinand tooke a great part from them, in so much, as the cattell being harried by the one and the other, neither part drew any great profit of the reuenues of that tribute. Not many dayes after the French men made wearie with want of victuals, went to Campobasso which was holden by them, and tooke by force Cogloneffa or Grigonssa a towne salt by, where the Swyzers against the will of the Captaines, vsed such execution and crueltie, that albeit it brought great astonishment vpon the countrey, yet it estranged from them the affections of many: and Ferdinand laying to defend his estate as well as he could, whilest he yet expected the Marquis of Mantua, he reordained his bands, by the meane of sixteene thousand duckats which the Pope had sent him, and with such other proportions as he could leauy of him selfe.

About this time, did ioyn with Montpensier the Swyzers, and other footebands which were come by sea to Casetta, as also on the other part, the Marquis of Mantua, now entred into the kingdome of Naples by the way of S. Germyn, taking in his marching, partly by force, partly by composition, many places, albeit of small importance: about the beginning of Iune, he vnited his forces with the king at Nocere, whither Caesar of Aragon led the bands that had lyen vpon the borders of Tarenta: and so by reason of the places, the forces of both the factions being almost made neighbours, the French more strong in footemen, and the Italians more mightie in horsemen, the event of things seemed very doubtfull, being not possible to discerne to whether of the parties the victorie should incline.

In this meane while, the French king made care for prouisions to rescue his people, and vnderstanding of the losse of the Castels of Naples, and that his bands were not succoured by the Florentines neither with men nor money, for that they had not restitution of their fortresses: seemed to draw to him a new spirite, and awaking out of that slumber of negligence with the which he seemed to haue returned out of France, he began elswoones to turne his thoughts to the actions of Italie: wherein to be more at libertie from all things that might retaine him, and (shewing to acknowledge the benefites receiued in his daungers) that he might with more confidence haue recourse againe to the aydes celestiall, he takes a journey in post to Tours, and after to Paris, to satisfie to the vowes he made to S. Martin, and S. Denis the day of the battell of Furmonai: and returning from those places, with the same diligence to Lyons, he kindled more and more in those desires and thoughts, whereunto of his owne nature he was most inclined: for he interpreted it as an action much to his reputation and glorie, to haue made a conquest of such a kingdome, being the first of all the French kings, in whose person haue bene renewed in Italie these many worlds, the memorie of the armes and victories of the French: he made perswasion to him selfe that the difficulties which he encountered in his returne from Naples, proceeded more by his proper disorders, then by the powers or vertue of the Italians, whose name (concerning the action of warre) caried no reputation with the French. To his inclinations to descend elswoones into Italie, were not a litle furthering the inticements of the Ambassadors of Florence, of the Cardinall of S. P. ad vincula, and of Trinulce, who was come to the Court for the same occasion, with whom were assistant in that instance Vitellezzo & Charles Vrsin, together with the Count Montoisie, sent to his Maestie in that negociation by the Barons of Naples holding part with the French: as also there came to him at last by sea, the Seneshall of Beaucaire, by who were declared many hopes of the victory, in case his Maestie did not deferre to send a sufficient succour: as of the contrary to delay a relieffe so necessary, were to abandon the kingdome & be guilty of the death of so many noble Captaines & souldiers: To these were ioyned the fauorable perswasions of many the great Lords of Fraunce, euen such as afore had giuen counsell against the enterprise of Italie: they aduised the king to giue a new life to that expedition, to auoyd the dishonour that would fall vpon the crown of Fraunce, to lose by cowardize that which they had conquered with so great felicity & fortune, but much more to preuent the spoyle of so great a part of the Nobilitie, as lay open to destruction in the Realme Naples: Neither were these counsels hindred by the emotions which the king of the Spanish made on the frontier of Parpignian, seeing the preparations being greater in brute thō in effect, and the forces of that king more mightie to defend his proper Realmes, then meete for the inuasion of an other, it was iudged sufficient to send to Narbone and other townes vpon the frontiers of Spaine, bands of men at armes with conuenient companies of Swyzzers: So that in the presence of the counsell of the king, wherein were assembled all the Lords & persons notable then at the Court: it was determined that Triuulce should returne to Ast with as much diligence as he could vnder the title of the kings Lieutenant, leading with him eight hundredth launces, two thousand Swyzzers, & two thousand Gascoyns: That after him the Duke of Orleans should passe the Mounts with other bands: and lastly should march the kings person with all other prouisions: and passing with a power royall, there was no doubt but the states of the Duke of Sauoy, of the Marquis of Moniferat and Saluce, (very fit instruments to make warre vpon the Duchy of Myllan) would be for him: Like as also it was beleued, that except the Canton of Berne, who had promised the Duke of Myllan not to moue against him, all the other Swyzzers would resort to the kings pay with no lesse readinesse then full numbers. These resolutions were made with consents so much the more generall, by how much was great the desire of his Maiestie, who afore they entred into counsell, had much coniuured the Duke of Bourbon to set forth with vehement & liuely speeches, how reasonable and necessary it were to make a strong warre: and of him selfe in open counsell, with the same affection he refuted the Admirall, who (not so much in impugning directly, as propounding many difficulties) assayed to qualifie indirectly the wills of the counsell, hauing but a few fauourers of his opinion: the king aduancing his particular desire about all counsell, assured them publikely that it was not in his power to make other resolution, for that such was the will of God that he should in person march eftsoones into Italie: it was agreed in the same counsell, that a nauie of thirtie shippes, (whereof was one most huge carracke called the Norman, and an other grosse carracke of the region of the Roads) should passe along the coast of the Ocean into the hauens of Pronence, where should be armed thirtie galleys and gallions with a mighty succour of men, money, munition and victuals for the seruice of Naples, which was supposed to stand vpon such conditions of necessities and wantes, that afore this nauie could be digested into order and point, it was determined to send forthwith certaine vessels charged with victuals and souldiers: it was ordained also in this counsell, that Rigault the kings Steward should go to Myllan, for that the Duke, (notwithstanding he had not redeliuered the two carrackes, nor suffered to rigge a nauie for the king at Genes, but onely restored the vessels taken at Rapale, and not the twelue galleys restrained in the port of Genes) laboured to excuse him selfe vpon the disobedience of the Genoways, and had alwayes with sundry practises interteined some of his people about the king, to whom he had newly sent Anthoine Maria Paluosisin, both to assure his Maiestie that he was disposed to obserue the accord past, and to demaund prolongation of terme to pay to the Duke of Orleans the fiftie thousand duckats promised in the same accord: of which deceits and subtilties, albeit he reaped but a very litle fruit, the king being well informed of his intention, as well by the examples of his actions past, as for that by his letters and instructions which were surprisid, it came to light that he stirred vp with continuall solicitation the king of Romaines and king of Spaine to make war in Fraunce: yet hoping that feare perhaps would induce him to things whereunto his will was estranged, Rigault was charged, that (without speaking of the disobedience past) he should signifie to him that it was in his power to deface the memorie of offences; in beginning to obserue, as to restore the galleys, to redeliuer the carrackes, and by giuing sufferance to arme a nauie at Genes: And that he should adde to these aduertisements, that the king was determined to returne into Italie in person, which should be to his great harmes, if whilst he was offered the meane, he would not reenter into that amitie, whereof his Maiestie was perswaded, that he had vndiscreetely made account, rather by vaine suspitions, then for any other occasions. This brute of these great prouisions being come into Italie, much troubled the mindes of the confederates: but about all Lodomyke Sforce standing in the mouth of the daunger, and to be the first opposed opposed to the furie of the enemie, suffered no lesse perplexities than the consideration of his perill required, specially vnderstanding that since the departure of Rigault, the king had dismissed and given leave to all his agents with hard wordes and bitter demonstrations: by reason whereof, looking deeply into the greatnesse of his daunger, as vpon whose estate would fall the substance of the warre: he had easily accorded to the kings demaundes, had it not bene for the suspicion and conscience of the offences he had made to him, the same causing on all sides such a distrust, that it seemed more hard to finde a meane to assure both the one and the other, then not to accord to the articles: for taking from the suretie of the one, that which was consented to assure the other, the one would not referre to the faith of the other, that which the other refused to referre to his owne: So that necessitie compelling Lodowike to take the counsell that was most grievous, he thought (at least to make slow his daungers) to intertaine Rigault with the same cunninges which he had vsed to that present, assuring him with great firmenesse, that he would bring the Genoways to obey whensoever the king would giue into the Citie of Anignon sufficient securitie for the restitution of the shippes, and that both parties would promise (giuing mutually othes for all obseruations) not to enterprise any thing preiudicially one to the other: which practise continuing many dayes, had lastly for many cauillations and difficulties obiected, the same effect which others had had before. But Lodowike to whom it belonged not to wast time vnprofitably, dispatched during these reasonings, Ambassadors to the king of Romains, to induce him to passe into Italie with the ayde of him & the Venetians, to whom also he sent messengers, to require that Senate (to the end to prouide for the common perill) to contribute to that charge, and to send into Alexandria a sufficient proportion of force to make head against the French. To this they offered a ready action: but they shewed not such facilitie to assist the passago of the king of Romains, bearing litle friendship to their common weale for those peeces which they possessed in the firme land appertaining to the Empire and house of Austrich: neither were they content, that at a common expence, should passe into Italie an armie, which should wholly depend vpon Lodowike. Notwithstanding Lodowike continuing still to sollicite and make instance, for that besides the other reasons that moued him, the onely forces of the Venetians in the state of Mylan were suspected to him: the Senat also fearing lest he, in whom they knew was no litle feare, would suddenly draw to reconcilment with the French king, gaue in the end their consents, and for the same occasion, sent Ambassadors to the king of Romains: Besides these coniectures the Venetians and the Duke feared, lest the Florentines, as soone as the king were passed the Mounts, would make alteration or insurrection in the riuer of Genes: To meete with which accident, they sent to Iohn Beniuole (intertained in the pay of the cofederates with three hundred me at armes) to make war vpon the Florentines in the frontier of the countrey of Bologna, promising that at the same time they should be vexed by the Siennys: wherein as to giue him more courage to this actiō, they offered to be bound, that if he tooke the town of Pistoia, to keepe it for him: so albeit he fed them with hopes, yet his minde was farre remoued from that seruice, and fearing not a litle the comming of the French, he sent secretly to the king, to excuse him selfe for matters past vpon the necessitie of the place wherein Bologna was seared, and to offer a good will to depend vpon his Maiestie hereafter, and for his sake, to abstaine from vexing the Florentines.

But touching the prouisions for Naples, the will of the king (albeit very vehement and forward) was not sufficient to put in executiō the resolutions of the counsell, notwithstanding as well for his honour, as for the daungers of the kingdome, there needed a most readie expedition: for the Cardinall of S. Mallo, in whose directiō, besides the managing of the treasure, rested the substance of the whole gouernement, albeit he impugned not these doings apparantly, yet he made so slow all expeditions with delaying the necessary payments, that not one prouision was aduanced in due time: it was thought that he did thus, either for that he iudged it was a better meane to perpetuate his greatnesse (not making any expence which appertained not to the present profit or pleasures of the king) not to haue occasion to propound euery day the difficulties of the affaires & necessities of money: or else for that (as many doubted) being corrupted with presents and promises, he had secret intelligence with the Pope, or with the Duke of Mylan: To which dilatorie and ialous dealings, the expresse commaundements of the king full of disdain redoubled with wordes reprochfull, could giue no remedie: for that according to the experience he had of his nature, he satisfied him alwayes with promises contrary to the effects: In so much as the execution of things determined, hauing bene begun to be lingred by his meane: there hapned an accident by the which they became more subiect to delayes, and almost desperate altogether: for the king in the end of May, and when was generall expectation of his speedie passage into France, determined to go to Paris, alledging these reasons, that following the custome of the auncient kings of France, it was necessary afore he parted out of France, to take leaue of S. Denis with all the ceremonies vsuall, and likewise of S. Martin in passing by Tours; and that being determined to march into Italie with a great prouision of money, it was needfull (to auoyd the necessities wherein he had falne the yeare before) that he induced the other Cities of France to contribution by the example of Paris, by whom he should not obtaine that he desired, vnlesse he went thither in person: That being in those quarters, he should make to march in greater diligence the men at armes that came from Normandie and Picardie: he assured them that afore he departed from Lyons, he would dispatch the Duke of Orleans, & would make his returne thither again within one moneth: But it was supposed that the most true and principall cause of his going, was for that he was amorous of one of the Ladies of the Queenes chamber, being gone a litle before to Tours with her Court: wherein he was so resolute, that neither the counsels of his peoples, nor the importunate humilities followed with teares of the Italians, could withdraw him from a voyage of such deuotion: They shewed him, how hurtfull it would be to wast time proper for the warre, specially in so great necessitie of his seruice in the kingdome of Naples: to what slaunder he should be subiect in the mouthes of all Italie, to draw backe when he ought most to go forward: That the reputation of enterprises chaunged for euery litle accident and light brute: That it was hard to recouer it, after it began once to decline, yea though he should make greater offers, then afore were either promised or needfull: That of all worldly things, nothing was more voluble then renowme, which falling once into a cloud of shadow, shines neuer after with a cleare light. These perswasions much lesse that they could draw his wauering minde from wandring, seeing with an obstinacie vnruled he vtterly deiected them, esteeming it perhaps a breach in his Religion, to go out of France afore he had gone on pilgrimage to the Sainct he so deuoutly worshipped: In so much that after he had yet taried a moneth longer at Lyons, he tooke his way to go to Tours, not hauing otherwayes dispatched the Duke of Orleans then onely by sending Trunche into Ast with a verie slender companie, not so much prouided for the warres, as instructed to confirme in his friendship and deuotion, Phillip new succeeded to the Duchie of Sauoye, by the death of the Duke his Nephew: And touching the prouision for Naples, all that was done afore his departure, was the dispatch of six ships loaden with victuals to Caietta, carying many hopes that the mayne armie by sea should follow with speede: And to set order with the Marchants (but very late) to aduaunce fortie thousand duckats to Montpensier, to whom the Swyzers and the Launceknights had protested, that if they were not payed before the end of Iune, they would passe to the campe of the enemies. The Duke of Orleans, the Cardinall of S. Mallo, and all the counsell, remained at Lyons, with commission to hasten the prouisiōs, wherein if the Cardinall proceeded slowly in the presence of the king, it was nothing to the lingring he vsed in his absence.

But the affaires of Naples could not attend such slow remedies, the daungers being drawne into those termes (both for the assembly of armed bands on euery side, and many difficulties disclosed by both the parties) that if the delayes were long, the warre would determine by necessity: for Ferdinand after he had ioyned to his peculiar force, the bands of the Venetians, tooke the towne of Castelfranke, where arriued at his campe accompanied with two hundreth men at armes Iohn Sforce Lord of Pesere, and Iohn Gonsague brother to the Marquis of Mantua, Captaines of the confederates: In so much as the proportion of his campe amounted to twelue hundreth men at armes, fifteene hundreth light horsemen, and foure thousand footemen. At the same time the French men were incamped at Circelle ten myles from Benenent, towards whom Ferdinand marched, and approaching them within foure myles, he pitched his campe before Frangette de Montfort, a place of so good prouision, that it was not taken at the first assault: The French raised their campe from Circelle to rescue it, but they came not in time, for that the Launceknights which were within yielded them selues for feare of the second assault, and left the place to discretion: which occasion knowne to the French, had bene the cause of their felicitie, if either by indiscretion or ill fortune, they had not suffered it to be lost: for (as was confessed generally) they had at ease that day broken the whole armie of the enemy, so vniuersally confused in the sacke of Frangette.

Perse that they gaue no regard to the directions of the Captaines, who seeing no other distance between the French & them then a valley, laboured with all diligence to reassemble them: Montpensier saw well enough into the occasion, and Virginio was not ignorant in the oportunitie offered, the one commaunding, and the other perswading the victory to be certaine, desired with teares in their eyes, to march ouer the valley, whilest in the campe of the Italians all things were in tumult, some of the souldiers busie in the pillage, & some labouring to packe away the things they had pilld, no one within rule or commaundement of his Captaine: Monsieur de Perse one of the Chieftaines of the armie next to Monsieur Montpensier, ouerruled either with the naturall lightnesse of a young man, or else enuying the glorie of the Duke Montpensier, perswaded vehemently against the passage ouer the valley, alledging that they should rise euen vnder the feete of the enemye, which waighed with the strong situation of their campe, he made an argument to the souldiers of no small danger, and therefore wishing openly that they should not fight, he was the onely hinderer of so good a counsell, and ioyned to their misfortune a perpetuall dishonour: the rather for that the Swyzers and Launceknights receiuing courage by him, drew into mutinie and demaunded money. For this cause Montpensier compelled to retire, returned to Circelle, where, as they were they day after in the action of the assault, Camillo Vitells, whilest about the walls he did the office of an excellent Captaine, was stricken in the head with a quarrell, whereof he dyed: for which accident the French men leaying the inuasion of the place, brake vp from thence, and marched towardes Argana, disposed to assay the hazard of battell if occasion were offered: To which resolution was flat contrary the counsell of the armie of the Aragons, with whom specially the Commissioners of the Venetians consented in opinion, for that seeing into the condition of the enemies, they iudged that to their present want of victuals was ioyned a generall lacke of money, and waighing withall that the succours out of Fraunce were intrangled with delayes and respites, they hoped that their misaduentures and necessities would rise dayly growing and increasing, standing subiect to as great displeasures in other parts of the kingdome: for that in Abruzzo, Annyball naturall sonne to the Lord of Camerin, being voluntarily gone to the succours of Ferdinand with foure hundred horsemen leauyed at his proper charges, had newly broken the armie of the Marquis of Bitonte: besides there was expectation of the comming of the Duke of Urbino with three hundred men at armes lately entred into the pay of the confederates, whose fortune and greater conditions hauing determined to follow, he had abandoned the alliance of the Florentines (to whom he was yet bound for more then a yeare). vnder this excuse, that being feodarie of the Church, he was bound in reason and equitie of office to obey the commandements of the Pope: And Graciano d'Aguerre, who had taken the field to encounter him, was charged in the plaine of Sermone by the Count of Celano and the Count of Popoli, with three hundred horses and three thousand footemen, whom he put to flight. But with the losse of the occasion of the victorie about Frangette, the fortune also of the French began manifestly to decline, concurring in them at one time these natures of difficulties, extreme want of money, scarcitie of victuals, hate of the people, disagreement of the Captaines, disobedience of souldiers, and the stealing away of many from the campe, partly by necessitie, and partly by will: They had no meane to draw out of the kingdome any great proportion of money, neither had they receiued from Fraunce any summe notable, since the fortie thousand ducats leauyed for their reliefe, were too late sent from Florence: in so much as no lesse for that cause, then for the neighbourhood of many townes supported by the armie of the enemye, they could not raise prouisions necessary for their food and sustenance: and in their armie was nothing but disorder: as well for that the courages of the souldiers were abated, as for that the Swyzers and Launceknights drawing into tumult, demaunded importunately their payes. And touching the discord of the Captaines, that which most hurt all their deliberations, was the continuall contradiction of Perse against Montpensier: to be short, such were their necessities and disorders, that the Prince of Bisignian was compelled to depart with his people to go to the gard of his owne estate, for feare of the bands of Consaluo, by whose examples, the particular souldiers of the countrey abandoned the campe by troupes, wherein they had reason, for besides they neuer receiued pay, yet the French and Swyzers vsed them very ill, as well in the diuision of booties, as in distribution of victuals. These difficulties, but chiefly the extreme want of victuals, constrained the French armie by little and little to retire and wander from one place to another, which diminished greatly their reputation with the people : And albeit the enemies followed them as it were in a continuall chase, yet they had no hope to be able to fight, as was specially desired by Montpensier & Verginio : for that not to be enforced to battell, they incamped alwayes in places of strength, & where no impediment could be giuen to their commodities. At last, the French being incamped vnder Moncaluole and Casalarbore neare to Arriana, Ferdinand overtaking them within the shoote of a crosbow (but alwayes keeping him in strong places) brought them into great necessitie of victuals, taking from them in like sort the vse of fresh water : in so much as by the aspect and consideration of these perils, they thought it best to draw towards Powylla, where they hoped to find commoditie of victuals, and fearing by reason of the nearnesse of the enemies, the difficulties that ordinarily follow armies that retire, they raysed their campe in the beginning of the night, not making any brute to bewray their going, and marched five and twentie myles afore they rested. Ferdinand followed them in the morning, but dispayring to make that speede to ouertake them, which they did to go from him, hauing so much lesse time, as they had more, he incamped before Gesualdo, a towne which heretofore had sustained a siege of foureteene moneths, and now taken by him in one day, greatly to the disappointing of the French: for that determining to put them selues within Venoufa, a towne strong by situation, and most plentifull with victuals, the opinion they had that Ferdinand could not so easily take Gesualdo, was the cause that they amused them selues about the sacke of Attella which they had taken, and for the time they lost there, afore their departure, they found the armie of Ferdinand at their backes, who as soone as he had taken Gesualdo, dispatched way : And albeit they repulsed diuerse scoutes and foreriders, yet seeing the mayne armie marched after with such speede, as they had no meane nor ablenesse to recouer Venoufa which was eight myles distant, they remained in the towne of Attella, with intention to expect if succours would come from some part, hoping that for the nearnesse of Venoufa & many other peeces thereabout holding yet for them, to receiue fauours with many commodities of victuals and reliefe. Ferdinand with a speede according to his fortune, incamped before Attella, labouring onely (for the hope he had to obtaine the victorie without perill & blood) to cut them from victuals : for the better aduancement whereof, he cast many trenches about Attella, and lost no oportunitie to make him selfe Maister of the places adioyning, forgetting no diligence, trauell, or action of a Captaine pollicite and valiant : and as in warres, there is no further assurance of the souldier Mercenarie, then he findes suretie of his pay, and lesse confidence in his faith and seruice, by how much he is so straunge of his owne nation, that he feareth not the discipline of his patron : So the difficulties of the French, made euery day all things more easie to Ferdinand, for that the Launceknights in the French campe, hauing receiued but two moneths pay since they departed from their houses, and seeing by so many disappointments of dayes and termes past, all further expectatiō was vaine, they drew into counsell, & went wholly to the campe of Ferdinand : In so much that hauing meane so much the more to grieue the enemy, & to enlarge his army with more scope, he suffered a more hard passage of victuals which came from Venoufa & other places about to Attella, wherein was not refreshing to suffice to feede the French numbers a very few dayes : for besides, that come bare a very scant proportion, yet the Aragons pluckt down a mill standing vpon the riuier which runneth neare to the wals, wherby they wated meane to turne their litle store of come into meale: neither were their discomforts present, comforted by hoping in any good to come, seeing that from no part appeared so much as one signe of succours: extremities so much the more intollerable to the French, by how much their felicities in the conquest had sayled with so full gales, that they neuer looked backe to those reuolutions which naturally do follow all humane actions : not that fortune doth so prouide (a reason which many vaine men occupy) but that so it is set downe in the eternall counsell of God, who by the same power doth dispose and gouerne all things on the earth, by the which he created them of nothing. But the cause of their full ruine, was the misaduētures that fell in Calabria: for by occasion of the sicknesse of M. d. Aubigny, in which infirmitie many of his people went to the armie of Montpensier, Consaluo seruing his turne of his sicknesse, tooke many peeces in that prouince, incamping at last with his Spanish bands and strength of popular souldiers of the countrey, at Castrouillares where hauing aduertisement that the Count Melete, & Albert de S. Senerin, with many other Barons were at Laine with bands of souldiers almost equall to his, & that increasing their nūbers daily, they made their plot to assaile him, when their whole strength was assembled: he determined to preuent preuent them, hoping to surprize them vnprouided, by the confidence they had in the situation of their place, the castell of Lame standing vpon the riuer Sabry, which diuideth Calabria fro the principall: and the borough is on the other side the riuer, wherein being intrenched, they were garded by the castell against all inuasions by the high way. Lastly, betweene Lame and Castronillare, was Murana, with certaine other peeces of the Prince of Bisignian which held for them: but Consaluo with a counsell all contrary, departed a little before night from Castronillare, accompanied with all his bands, and leauing the high way, he tooke the large way, notwithstanding it was both more long and hard, for that he was to march by certaine mountayns: and being arrived neare the riuer, he commaunded the footemen to take the way to the bridge, which is betweene the castell of Lame and the borough, which bridge was but negligently garded for the opinion of the surety of the place: and him selfe with his horsemen passing the riuer at a foord two miles higher, was at the borough before day, where finding the enemies without warch and gard, he brake them in a moment sleeping in the security of the place: he made prisoners xj Barons, and almost all the souldiers, for that flying to the castell, they fell amongst the footemen, which now were posselt of the passage of the bridge. By this honorable victory being the first which Consaluo had got in the kingdome of Naples, his strength was so increased, that hauing also with the like vertue and fortune, recouered certaine other places in Calabria, he determined with fixe thousand men to go and ioyne with the campe of Ferdinand, which was before Attella: and in that campe was arriued a little before, an hundreth men at armes of the Duke of Candia, Captaine of the confederates, but him selfe with the residue of his bands remained in the towne of Rome.

By the comming of Consaluo, (caused by the surprize of those which were for the french in Calabria) they that were besieged were brought into hard straights, their towne being enuironed on three sides, the Arragons occupying one, the Venetians an other, and the Spaniards the third: In so much that there was almost left no entrey for victuals, specially the Venetian stradiots running ouer the whole countrey, and taking many french men which brought reliefe from Venoufa: they also that were within, had no meane to go on forraging but at houres extraordinary, and that with a strong gard: and Paule Vitells making a sally at midday, with a hundreth men at armes, was drawne by the Marquesse of Mantua into an ambush, where he lost part of his company.

And being thus deprived of all commodities without, they were at last reduced to that extremity, that they could not with gard and strength, serue their vse of the riuer to water their horses: and within the towne their necessities were no lesse of fresh water, for the refreshing of their persons: So that being ouerweared with so many aduersities, and no lesse abandoned of all hopes, their perils more generall and present, then their succours likely or assured: after they had endured the siege two and thirty dayes, and being now left to the last remedy in warre, they demaunded a safe conduct, which was granted, vnder the protection whereof, they sent to capitulate with Ferdinand, Monseieur de Perse, Bartholomew d'Albiano, and one of the Swizzer Captaines: amongst whom were agreed these couenants following: That there should be no enterprize attempted by either part one vpon an other for xxx. daies: That during that time, not one of the besieged, (to whom should be ministred day by day by the Arragons necessary victuals) should depart out of Attella: That it should be suffered to Montpensier, to aduertise his King of the accord: That if he were not rescued in the sayd tearme of thirty dayes, he should leaue Attella, and all that he had in his power in the kingdome of Naples, together with all the artilleries that were there: That the souldiers should be in safety for their persons and iewels, and with them it should be lawfull to euery one to go into France, either by land or sea: and to the Vrsins & other Italian Captains, to returne with their bands whither they would out of the kingdome: That to the Barons & others, which had followed the factio of the french (in case they would return to Ferdinand within xv. daies) all punishments should be remitted, & restitution of al the goods they possessed when the warre began. The tearme of this abstinence expired, M. Montpensier, with all the french, and many Swizzers, together with the Vrsins, were conducted to the sea castel of Stabby, where they bega to dispute, if Montpensier as lieutenant general vnder his king, & by that means about al others, were bound (as Ferdinand said) to make to be rendred all that was possessed in the kingdome of Naples in the name of the french king: for that M. Montpensier pretended, that he was bound to no more, then was in his owne power to render, & that his authority stretched not to command other captains & castel keepers which were in Calabria, Abruzze, Caietta, & many other towns & peeces which the King had giuen them in charge, and not to him: The argument being trauesed by many reasons on both sides for certaine dayes, they were at last conducted to Bari, Ferdinand making semblance that hee would let them go: and there (vnder colour that the vessels wherein they should be embarked, were not yet ready) they were so long retayned, that being dispersed betweene Baia and Pozzola, they fell into such diseases by the ill aire and many other incommodities, that both Monsieur Monipensier died, and of the residue of his company which were more then fife thousand bodies, there scarce returned into Fraunce safe and sound, fife hundred. Virginio and Paule Vrsin (at the request of the Pope, who was now determined to take from that family their estates) were sent prisoners to the egge castell, and their companies conducted by John Jordan sonneto Virginio, and Bartholomew d'Aluiano, were by the appointment of the Pope, stripped in Abruzz by the Duke of Vrbis: John Jordan also and Aluiano, leauing their people in the way, and returning to Naples by the commaundement of Ferdinand, were made prisoners: but Aluiano, either by his industry, or by the secret sufferance of Ferdinand (who loued him much) had meane to escape.

Monsieur d'Aubigny consents to depart the kingdome
of Naples.

After Ferdinand had taken Attella, he made diuision of his army into many parts, for the more easie recouering of the residue of the kingdome: he sent before Caietta, Federike of Aragon, and Prosper Colonne: and to Abruzz, where the towne of Aquila was already reuolted to his deuotion, he dispatched Fabrice Colonne: and him selfe taking by force the rocke of Saint Senerin, and cut off the heads of the castell keeper and his sonne, the more to terrifie others, went to encampe before Salerna, where the Prince of Bisignian had parley with him, and compounded for him selfe, for the Prince of Salerne, for the Count of Capaccie, and for certaine other Barons, with condition that they should remaine possessed of their estates, but that Ferdinand for his surety should keepe in his handes the fortresses for a certaine time. After which accord they went to Naples: In Abruzz was not made any great resistance, for that Graciano, who was there with eight hundred horsemen, hauing no more meane of defence, and lesse expectation of succours in a fortune so declining, retired to Caietta: Into Calabria, of which the greatest quantity held yet for the french, returned Consaluo, against whom, albeit Monsieur d'Aubigny made some resistance, yet being in the end driuen to take Groppoly, after he had lost Manfredonia and Cosensa, which had bene sacked before by the french: and lastly, seeing all hopes became desperate, and no apparaunce of succours from France, he consented to deliuer vp all Calabria, vpon sufferance to returne by land into Fraunce.

It is certaine that many of these reuolts and changes, happened by the negligence and indiscretion of the french: for albeit Manfredonia, for the situation of the place was strong, for the fauors of the people there, free from suspition, and for the fertility of the countrey, full of plentifull means and prouision of victuals: and that the King had left for the gard of it Gabriell Montsalcon, esteemed a Captaine valiant: yet after it had endured a very short and easie siege, they were constrained to render it for famine: Like as also (in misfortunes examples doe much) other peeces of good ability to defend them selues, became recreant, and yeelded, either for feare, (which is proper to cowards) or for impatience of the incommodities, which such must suffer as are besieged: some Castell keepers finding their rocks well prouided for, sold the victuals at their first entry, and so as soone as the enemy appeared, made their willing necessities and wants a slanderous detection of their infidelity and cowardise. By these disorders, ioyned to the negligence of the King, the french lost in the kingdome of Naples that reputation, which the vertue of that man had wonne vnto them, who holding many yeares after the victory of Ferdinand, the castell of the Egge, which John of Aniow had left in his charge, could neuer be brought to render it, but by compulsion of victuals altogether consumed.

Thus no more remayning for the recouery of the whole realme, then Tarenta and Caietta, with other peeces holden by Charles de Sangwyn: and Mont Saint Ange kept by Dom Iulian di Lorraine, who with great merite and praise, made his vertue knowne in all the places thereabouts: it happened that Ferdinand, rayfed into great glory, and no lesse hopes to be equall in greameffe with his predeceffours, went to Sommo, a towne seated at the foote of the hill Vesune to see the Queene his wife, where he became very sicke, either for his trauels past, or by new excessive disorders: and feeling by his disposition no hope of recouery, he caused him selfe to be caried to Naples, where he died not many dayes after, somewhat before the end of the yeare after the death of his father king: Alphonso: he left behind him; not onely in his kingdome but also thorough all Italy, a singular opinion of his valour, not so much for his victorie obtayned, which in times and conditions so deuided merited much; as by the life and readinesse of his spirit; wherein he was found resolute in both fortunes, with many other royall vertues, wherein he became a worthy example to many: he dyed without issue and therefore his Vncle Dom Federike succeeded him, being the fift king seene to succede in that kingdome in three yeares time.

As soone as Federike was aduertised of the death of his Nephew; he leauied his siege from before Caietta, and went to Naples, where was the old Queene his mother in law, who put into his hands New castle, albeit many were of opinion that she would retain it for her brother Ferdinand king of the Spanisli. In this accident were most singular towards Federike, not onely the wils of the peoples, but also the inclinations of the Princes of Salerno, and of Bisignan, together with the faith of the Count Capaccio, all which were the first that pronounced his name within Naples; & going to meete him saluted him as king at his disceending from the ship: They were farre better content with him; then with the last king; no lesse for the mildnesse and moderation of his mind (which they honored with great reuerence and humilitie) then for the suretie of their owne estates, hauing no small suspicion that Ferdinand as soone as he had addresse his affaires, had intentions to call to answere all those that in any sort had bene fauourers of the french.

Federike made king of Naples

But these alterations and disorders hapning with so great dishonor and damage to the french faction, had no power to giue a new life to the king; and much lesse hasten his prouisions; who standing intangled with the delights & pleasures of the court, made it foure monethes afore he returned to Lyons. And albeit in this amorous negligence, he oftentimes recommended to such as he had left there, the solicitation and dispatch of all prouisions as well for sea as land, and the Duke of Orleans was prepared to depart: yet by the duncient cunninges of the Cardinall of S. Mallo, the men at armes which were slenderly payed; marched as slowly towards Italy, and the nauie by sea which was to be assembled at Marseilles; aduanced so slackly, that the confederates had leasure enough, to send first to Ville Franche a large hauen neare to Nice, and afterwards euen to the roades of Marseilles, an armie by sea leauied at their common charges at Genes, to giue impediments to the vessels of France that were to go to the realme of Naples: and to these great & generall delayes proceeding principally from the Cardinall of S. Mallo, wise men doubted, that there was ioyned some other cause more secret, intertayned in the kings mind with a singular art & diligence of such as with many reasons laboured to turne him from the enterprises of Italy, for that they thought, that for his proper regard and interest, he ought to be ielous ouer the greatnes of the Duke of Orleans, on whom (if the victorie succeeded) the Duchy of Myllan shold fall. Besides, they occupied with him this discourse of perswasions; that it was farre from pollicie and his proper suretie to go out of France, afore he had made some contract with the king of Spaine, who expressing a desire to be reconciled, had sent Embassadors to his Maiestie to induce a truce; & insinuate an agreement. Many counselled him to tarie till the Queene was brought to bed, for that it agreed not with his wisdom, & was contrary to the loue he ought to beare to his peoples, to obiect his person to so many perils, afore he had a sonne & heire to receiue so great a succession: A reason which made the deliuerie of the Queene more painefull, and her fruit more wretched & vnfürfortunate, seeing that not many dayes after, the masculine issue which God had giuen him, died. So that partly by particular negligence in the king, but more by the errors and vices of his simple counsell, and partly by the difficulties which others suggested, the prouisions waied so long in delayes, that the ruine of his people, & whole losse of the kingdome, made lamentable vnto them the operations of their owne indiscretion: yea the like had hapned to his friends and confederates in Italy, if of themselues they had not constantly defended their proper estates.

Negligence in the french king.

It hath beene set downe before, how for feare of the french prouisions, and more for the contentment of Lodomyke Sforce, then any thing agreeable to the Venetsians, there was a plot laid to make passe into Italy Maximilian Caesar, with whom whilest that feare indured, it was agreed that the Venetsians should giue him for three whole moneths twenty thousand duckats for euery moneth, to the end he should bring with him a certaine proportion of horsemen & footmen, vpon the which passing of accord, Lodomyke accompanied with the Embassadors of the confederats, went to Manza (a place on the other side the Mounts vpon the confyns of Almasne) to communicate with his Maiestie: where after they had vsed great conference; Lodomyke came backe againe the same day to Bormy, a towne of the Duchie of Myllan on this side the Mounts, whither came Maximilian the day following vnder colour of going on hunting: and after in that enteriue of two dayes, they had set downe the time and maner of his marching into Italy. Maximilian returned into Germany to solícite the execution of things that were contracted. But the brufe of the prouisions of France inferiour to all expectation, growing now so cold, that for that regard it seemed not necessarie that the king of Romaines should march: yet Lodowyke determining to serue his ambition of that which afore he had procured for his proper suretie, continued still to solícite him to descend into Italy, wherein to remoue all impediments that might hinder his desire, albeit the Venetians would not be concurrant in the promise of thirtie thousand duckats which he demaunded ouer and aboute the lx. thousand that were accorded to him: yet he forbore not to bind himselfe alone to that demaund: Insomuch that in the end Maximilian marched and passed into Italy, a litle afore the death of Ferdinand: of the which when he was aduertised, being neare to Millan, he entred into thoughts and deuised so to handle things, as by his meane the kingdome of Naples might comie to Iohn the onely sonne of the king of Spaine; and his sonne in law. But that being farre from the purpose of Lodowyke and his secret ambition, he told him that in that action he should discontent & trouble all Italy; and be the cause to dissolue the vnitie of the confederats, and consequently to make easie the enterprises of the king of France, occupying such other cunning perswasions, that his subtleties so vanquished all the intentions of Cesar, as he did not onely giue ouer and denounce his first cogitation; but also fauoured and ratified by letters the succession of Federike: he descended into Italy with a very small companie of men, but the brute ranne, that there marched after euen to the proportion and quantitie which he had promised. And being come to Vigenena, where he sojourned, Lodowyke & the Cardinall of Santa Croce (sent vnto him as Legat by the Pope) together with the Embassadours of the confederats, assembled with him in counsell to resolute what were best to be done: therein this was thought the first and most necessarie action, that he should march into Piemont to take the towne of Ast, & separat from the french king the Duke of Sauoy, & Marquis of Montferat, as members depending of the Empire: to them he addressed aduertisements to come to speake with him in a towne in Piemont: but his forces being inferiour to his title & dignitie, and by that occasion the effects not answering the authority of the name imperiall, they shewed contempt, not one of them consenting to go to him: like as also for the enterprise of Ast, there was no apparance that it should happily succeed: he made like instance to come to speake with him, to the Duke of Ferrara, who vnder name of Feodary of the empire, possessed the towne of Modena & Reggio: And albeit he offered him for his surety, the faith of Lodowyke, his son in law, yet he refused to go to him, alleaging that the action were not couenient for his honor, for that he held as yet in deputatiõ, the castle of Genes. Finally Lodowyke (led still with humors of his ancient couetousnes, and no lesse discontented that Pysa so ambitiously desired of him, should fall with the danger of all Italy into the power of the Venetians, sought wonderfully to hinder such a matter) & coulselled the Emperour to go to Pysa, perswading him with discourses full of deceits, that the Florentines being not mighty enough to resist him & the strength of the confederats, would depart by necessity from the alliance of the french king, and could not refuse to refer the accord & arbitration of all their controuersies to the person of Maximilian, to the end, that if not by reconcilement, at least by way of iustice, might be determined the differences between them & the Pysans. In which regard as Pysa should be put into the hands of Cesar, & all the appurtenances appertaining to it: So he hoped by his authoritie to make the Pysans consent, & that the Venetians (being concurrant in this action the wils of all the other confederats) would not oppose themselves against a conclusion so conducible to the common benefit, and no lesse iust and honest of it selfe: for Pysa being anciently a towne of the Empire, the reknowledging of the rights of such as aspired to it, apperteyned to no other then to Cesar: & so being committed of trust into the hands of Cesar, Lodowyke hoped that he should easily come by it, either by money, (which makes way into great kingdomes) or for the grace and authoritie which he had with him, the same seruing as an instrument to aduance his ambition. This deuise was propounded in the counsell vnder colour, that seeing for the present, the feare of the french warres ceased, the comming of Cesar might be used to induce the Florentins to knit with the other confederats against the french king, a deuise not displeasing to Maximilian, who was not a litle discontented that his descending into Italy bred no effect, hoping withall, that where by reason of his infinite plots and inuentions and

and no lesse for his disorders and vnbridled prodigalities, he had alwaies want of money, Pysa would be an instrument conuenient, to gather some great quantitie either of the Florentines, or others. The deuise also was approued by all the confederats as a thing very profitable for the suretie of Italy: The Embassador of Venice not impugning it, for that that Senate, perceiuing well enough to what ends tended the thoughts of Lodowyke, doubted not to beguile him easily, and hoped that by meane of the presence of Cæsar might be gotten the hauen of Lyuorne, which being vnited once to Pysa, the Florentines had no further hope to recouer that citie.

It hath bene declared how the confederats afore made many meanes and requests to the Florentines to enter vnitie and league with them, and at the times when most they feared the descending of the frenchmen, they gaue them hopes so to worke and trauell in things, that Pysa should effsoones retorne vnder their iurisdiction: but the couetousnesse of the Venetians and Lodowyke being suspected to the Florentines, who would not lightly deuide themselves from the amitie of the french king, bare no readie deuotion to those suggestions: wherein as one thing that kept them backe, was a hope to recouer by the comming of the french king, Pietra sancta, & Serezana, places which they could not expect by any working of the confederats: so that which turned the and drew them quite away, was an ouerweening no lesse vnprofitable to the condition of their affaires, then contrary to the course of the time: they measuring rather their owne merits, and that which they endured for the king, then his nature, or his customes, promised to themselves by the meane of his victory, not only the city of Pysa, but almost all the residue of Tuskane. In which perswasion they were nourished by the opinion and words of Ieronimo Sauonarole, who in his sermons pronounced many felicities & augmentation of imperie appointed to that common weale after so many trauels & afflictions, publishing in like stile most grieuous calamities & euils to happen to the court of Rome, and all the other Potentates of Italy: wherein albeit this fond Preacher was not without his aduersaries scorning at this particular doctrine, yet what for his own authoritie, & the simple inclinations of many, there was no litle faith giuen to his holy aduertisements, no lesse by most part of the popular multitude, then by many of the principall citizens, wherof, some of innocent deuotion, some by ambition, and some for feare, reapposed such religion in his vaine forewarnings, that the whole estate of Florence caried such generall disposition to continue in the french amitie, that the confederats thought it not vnreasonable to labor to reduce them by force, to that whereunto their wils were so strange & contrary. They supposed the enterprise to inuade them could not containe many difficulties, for that they were hated of all their neighbours, & had no expectation or hope of succors from the french king, who abandoning the safetie of his owne people in Naples, could not in any reason be thought carefull to minister to the wants of others. Besides, their great expenses for these three yeares, with so generall diminution of their reuenues, had so drayned them, that it was not credible that they were able to sustaine long trauels: seeing withall they had for this yeare past continually followed the warres against Pysa, wherein the accidents haue bene diuerse and notable, more for the resolution of courage shewed in many valiant actes, and factions of warre by either part, and by the desperate obstinacie wherewith such things were done, then for any huge proportion or greatnesse of armies, and much lesse for the qualitie of places for the which they fought, being but villages and boroughes not famous, and therefore of themselves of no great consequence: for (to vse more large discourse) a little after the citadell was giuen to the Pysans, and afore the succors of Venice arriued there, the bands of Florence hauing taken the borough of Buty, & from thence encamped at Calcy, and before they tooke it, beginning (for their better suretie of victuals) to build a bastillion vpon the Mount of Dolorosa: the bands of footmen that were there for the gard of the place, were broken by their own negligence, by the enignes of the Pysans: and a little after, as Francisco Secco was encamped with a great troupe of horsemen in the borough of Buty to see to the safe conuoy of victuals to Hercules Beniuole, incamped with the footbands of the Florentines about the litle castle of the hill Verrucola: he was so charged at ynwares by the footmē that came out of Pysa, that by th'incoueniency of the place to apply the seruice of his horsemen, he lost a great part of the: for which succesles the affaires of Pysa sening to rise increasing in fortune, & that with hope of greater prosperity for that the succors of the Venetians began to arriue: Hercules Beniuole lodging in the borough of Bientina, hearing that John Paul Monfijn Captaine of the Venetians, was with the first part of their companies come to Vicopisan 2. miles frō Bientina, fayned to haue feare, insomuch that presently he raised his companies and went into the field, and immediatly as soone as the Venetian bandes were discouered, he esloones retyred into Bientina. But after he saw his enimie full of boldnesse and securitie, he trayned him one day with great pollicie into an ambush, where he put him to the worst, with the losse of the most part of his companies, giuing him the chase euen to the yuals of Vicopisan. In which encounter the victorie was not in all points happie, for that Francisco Secco come to the campe that morning to ioyne with Hercules, in the retyre was slaine with a shot of harquebuze: After these followed the other bandes of the Venetians, amongst whom were eight hundreth stradiots led by Iustinian Morosin: by whose comming the Pyfans being now farre superior, Hercules Bentiuole to whom the partes of the countrey were well knowne, neither willing to put himselfe in daunger, nor altogether disposed to abandon the field, encamped in a very strong place, betweene the borough of Pontadere, and the riuer of Ere: with the oportunitie of this place, he restrayned much the importunitie of the enemies, who in all that time tooke no other place or peece then the borough of Buty which yeelded to their discreffion: And as they sent out their stradiots to make pillage of the countrey, there were three hundred of them running vp euen to Valdere, charged and broken by certaine bands which Hercules sent after them. The Florentines were in the same seasons vexed by the Sienna, who by the occasion of the harmes they suffered in the countrey of Pyfa, and at the incensing of the confederats, sent to incampe afore the bastillion of the bridge of Valiane, the Lord of Plumbin & John Sauelle: but hearing that Riuuccio de Marciano arriued with succors, they retyred in great hast from before the bastillion, leauing behind them one part of their artillerie: by reason whereof the Florentines seeing themselves assured on that side, caused Riuuccio to turne his force to the quarter of Pyfa: In so much that their strength being almost equall, the warre was now brought to the boroughs about the hils: But for that they were at the deuotion of the Pyfans, things fell out more to the disaduantage of the Florentines: for that the Pyfans entring by intelligeñce into the borough of Pont de sac, stripped a whole company of men at armes, and tooke prisoner Lodowike Marciana, yet they abandoned forthwith the said borough for feare of the Florentine bands which were not farre off: But the better to command and gouerne the hilles, which were of great importance to them, as well for the victuals brought from thence to Pyfa, as for that they gaue impediments to the Florentines in the traffike of the hauen of Lyuorne: they fortified the most part of those boroughs, amongst the which Sotiana was made noble by one accident by chance: for the campe of the Florentines being marched thither with intention to take it the same day, and for that cause, hauing spoyled all the passages of the riuer of Cascina, and put their men at armes in battell vpon the banke, to cut off the succors of the enimie: it hapned that Peter Capponi a chiefe commaunder amongst the Florentines, as he was about to plant the artilleries, was stricken in the head by a bullet out of the towne, whereof he dyed presently: An end vnworthy of his vertue, as well for the ignobilitie of the place, as for the litle importance of such an enterpryse: By the chance of this accident, they raysed the campe without attempting any further action: Besides, the Florentines euen in those times were compelled to send bands of men into Lunigiana to the succors of the castle of Verroncòle which the Marquis of Malestina held besieged, by the aide of the Genoways; from whence he easily gaue them the chase: So that the strength of the Pyfans was mighty for certaine monethes, for that besides the townesmen and popular souldiers leuied of the countrey became bodie's warlike by long experience, the Venetians and Duke of Myllan had there many bandes of horsemen & footmen, the Venetian numbers being greatest: But for that afterwards the Dukes copanies began to diminish because they were not paid as appertained, the Venetians vsing that defect to their aduantage, sent thither a new supply of a 100. men at armes, and 6. gallics laden with prouision of victuals, wherein they spared no necessary expences for the suertie of that citie, the same hapning in good season to winne, and draw to them the affections of the Pyfans, who euery day more and more estranged their mindes from the deuotion of the Duke of Myllan, as neither contented with his nigardise in the expence and prouision of things necessary, nor with his incertainties and variations, expressing rather a mind neuter, then affection resolute, for that sometimes he would be forward in the succor of their affaires, and esloones carelesse & cold, leauing all to aduventure: in so much as beginning almost to doubt of his will, they imposed vpon him by imputation that John Bentiuole did not aduance to endamage the Florentines according to the commission he had of the confederats, the rather for that they knew he had payled him in a great part of his payments, either through his quietnesse, or else, that the displeasures of the Florentines were acceptable to him, but not their whole ruine and oppression. By meane of which operations, he had laied of himselfe (touching the state of Pysa) foundations contrary to his chiefe ends and intentions, for the advancement whereof he onely induced the councill of the confederates to determine that Maximilian Caesar should go to Pysa.

But now returning from whence we came: after it was resolved that Caesar should march to Pysa, he dispatched two Embassadors to Florence to aduertise them, that by reason of an enterprise which he intended with a mightie army against the Infidels, he iudged it first an action chiefe and necessary to passe into Italy, the better to pacifie and assure the controuersies there, for which cause he exhorted the Florentines that they would communicate together with the other confederates in the comon defence of Italy, or at least if they had an other inclination, that they would make manifest their will and intention: That for the same occasion, and for that it appertained to the authoritie imperiall, he would know the controuersies that were betweene them and the Pisans, requiring them, till he had taken knowledge of the reasons of both the one and other, that they would surcease the warre, which he assured would not be refused by the Pisans, to whom he had imparted the like significations: lastly, he gaue them great suretie with sweete and familiar words, that he would be ready to administer iustice indifferently. To which message (receiuing the offers of the Emperour with reuerence and recommendation, and expressing no lesse shewes of singular confidence in his iustice and pietie) was answered by the Florentines, that they would giue him particularly to vnderstand of their intention by speciall Embassadors to be addressed to his Maiestie with speede.

But in the meane while the Venetians, not to leaue to Maximilian or the Duke of Myllan, any meane to be Maisters ouer Pisa, sent thither with consent of the Pisans a new supply of a hundred and fiftie men at armes, some stradiots, and a thousand footmen vnder the leading of Amiball Bentiuole, signifying to the Duke that they had sent those succors thither, for that their common weale, which loued to chearish free cities, was vniuersally inclined to aide the Pisans to recover their countrey, as indeed by the succour of those bandes, they went thorow with the recovery of almost all the boroughes of the hills. In regard of which benefits, and for the franke readinesse of the Venetians to gratifie their demaunds which were in great number, sometimes wanting men, sometimes lacking money, and most commonly suffering necessities of victuals and munitions, the will of the Pisans was become so conformable to the desires of the Venetians, that all that office of deuotion & confidence which they were wont to owe to the Duke of Myllan, being now transported into them, they greatly desired that that Senat would continue their protectors, defenders, and patrons: And yet they solicited still the comming of Caesar, for hoping that what with the strength they had already within Pisa, and the bands which his Maiestie would lead with him, they should with more facilitie get Liuorne. On the other side, the Florentines, who besides other encombrances, were at that time pressed with a great scarcitie of victuals, were occupied with no small feares, being left alone to resist the power of so many Princes: for that in Italy, there would not rise one in their aide & fauor, & from their Embassadors in France, they were certified by letters, that they could hope for no reskue in the king, to whom they had recommended their dangers with many futes & humilities, though not to haue of him a full succour, yet to be releued with some quantitie and proportion of money. But their petitions were in vaine, and all their requests embraced with the same coldnesse of care wherewith he comforted the perplexities of his peculiar peoples in the kingdome of Naples. Peter de Medicis alone did not molest them, because it was an article in the councill of the confederates, not to vse in this action, either his name, or his fauor, knowing by experience, that the Florentines for that feare, did the more increase their vnyty for the preservation of their libertie: and Lodowike Sforce, vnder colour to be ielous of their safetie, but more discontented with the greatnes of the Venetians, ceased not to apply all his discourse of wit and perswasion, to induce them to referre all things to the arbitration of Caesar, wherein he alleaged many great and sensible dangers, and insinuated with arguments & reasons, that this was the onely meane to drawe the Venetians from Pisa, and so consequently to accomplish their full reintegration: A thing verie necessary for the vniuersall stabilitie of Italy, and no lesse (for that occasion) desired by the king of Spaine, and all the other confederats: But the Florentines not suffering themselues to be carried with faire & deceitfull apparances, and much lesse amased with the contemplation of so many dangers and difficulties, determined to make no declaration with Cesar, neither to referre their rights to his arbitrement, if first they were not restored to the possession of Pisa, for that they were not assured either of his will or of his authoritie, being manifest that hauing not of himselfe any forces, or monney, he proceeded as it best seemed to the Duke of Millan. Neither did they discern in the Venetians, any disposition or neede to leaue Pisa: Therefore they prepared with a franke and liberall resolution of courage, to fortifie and refurbish Livorno as well as they could, and to draw all their strength into the countrey of Pisa: And yet, for that they would not appeare estranged from the league, laboring withall to appease Cesar, they sent Embassadors who found him at Genes, where he was then arriued: Their commission was (for answer of the things propounded by his Embassadors at Florence) to aduertise him and perswade him, that it was not necessary to proceede to any declaration, because, for the reuerence they bare to his name he might promise to himselfe of the common weale of Florence, euen as much as he would desire. And to beseech him to thinke, that for his most holy resolution to reduce Italy to peace, there was nothing more conuenient then immediatly to restore Pisa to the Florentines, for that it was the roote and riuer from whence sprong all their deliberations so discontenting to his Maiestie and the confederates; and Pisa also being in that regard, the cause that made some to aspire to the Empire of Italy, who to that end laboured to keepe it in continuall trauels of warre, by which words (notwithstanding it was not otherwayes expressed) was signified and ment the ambition of the Venetians: That also it was not agreeable to his iustice, that such as had bene dispoyled by force, should be constrained contrarie to the disposition of the lawes imperiall, to referre their rights to compromise, if first they were not restored to their possession: concluding that the common weale of Florence obteyning this beginning of him, and by that meane, remaining no cause to desire any thing but peace with euery one, they would make all such declarations as he should thinke conuenient, and reappoyning wholly in his iustice, would with ready humilitie recommend vnto him the knowledge of their rights.

This answer satisfied not Cesar, who desired aboue all things that they might enter into the league vnder faith and promise to be restored to the possession of Pisa within a tearme conuenient: notwithstanding after many discourses and debating of reasons, they could draw no other answer from him, then (vppon the platforme of Genes as he entred the sea) he told them they should vnderstand further of his will by the Popes Legat which was at Genes, by whom, being sent backe againe to the Duke, who from Zippone (whither he had accompanied Cesar) was returned to Millan, they went into the same citie, where, as they were demanding audience, they receiued Commissions from Florence, (alreadie vnderstanding the frute of their legation) commaunding them without seeking other answer, to returne home: So that being come to the houre appointed for their audience, they turned their demaund to haue answer, into a signification of their office, that returning to Florence, they were bold to lengthen their way, to come to do him reuerence afore they parted out of his countrey, as well appertained to the friendship which their common weale had mutually with him. The Duke thinking they would demaund answer according to their direction from the Legat, had assembled all the Embassadors of the confederats, and the whole maiestie of his owne counsell, to make shew (according to his manner) of his eloquence, and his arte, and to take pleasure in the calamities of others: but being not a little confused with the nature of their proposition altogether disappointing his expectation and looking, he asked them suddenly what answer they had of Cesar: to which demaund they answered, that according to the lawes of their common weale, they might not communicate nor treat of their commission, with any other Prince, then with him to whom they were assigned Embassadors: he replied somewhat troubled: If we giue you answer, for the which we knowe that Cesar hath referred you to vs, would you not heare it? It is not forbidden to heare (say they) and much lesse can we let an other to speake: He answered, we are content to giue you the answer, but that cannot well be done, if you pronounce not that which you haue said to him: The Embassadors estoones answered, that besides they had no power for the selfe same reasons allcaged before, yet it would be superfluous, for that it was necessary that Cesar had imparted their proposition with those, to whom he had giuen the immediat charge to make the answer in his name. For these resolute dealings of the Embassadors, he could not, neither in words, nor in gestures dissemble his indignation, and with moodes full of variation and discontentment he dismissed the Embassadors with all the residue residue which he had assembled, receiuing in himselfe one part of the mockerie, which he ment to haue giuen to an other.

In the meane while, Caesar departed from the haueu of Genes with fixe gallies which the Venetians had in the sea of Pisa, and with many other vessels of the Genoways very well furnished with artillerie, but not with fighting men; for that there was no other men of warre, then a thousand launceknights: with whom he sayled to the haueu of Spetia, and from thence went by land to Pisa. Caesar is come to Pisa. and there hauing ioyned to his armie fise hundreth horsemen, and a thousand other lanceknights which had marched by land, he determined to incampe before Lyuorne, hauing for his backe the companies of the Duke of Myllan, and one part of the Venetian bands: his intention was to charge it both by sea and land, sending the other Venetian companies to Pont de suoy, to the end the Florentine Campe which was not strong, should not be able to molest the Pisans, nor giue succours to Lyuorne. But there was no enterprise which lesse astonished the Florentines, then that of Lyuorne, sufficiently furnished with men and artillerie, with daily expectation of succours from Prouence; for that a litle before, to augment their forces with the reputation wherein were at that time in Italy, the armies of the french, they had with the consent of the french king, intertained to their pay, Monfier d'Albigois one of his captaines with a hundreth launces, and a thousand footmen, as well Smyzers as Gaskoins, which were to come by sea to Lyuorne vpon certaine ships, which by their directions were loden with graine, to releue the generall want of victuals raigning in all the lands of their obedience. This deliberation, made with other thoughts, and for other ends, then for their defence against Caesar, albeit it was full of difficulties, for that both Monfier d'Albigois with his company already conducted to the ships, refused to take the sea, only fixe hundreth footemen being imbarked: yet it found such plentifull fauours of fortune, that there could not be desired a prouision, neither more great nor more conuenient: seeing that the same day that a Commissioner of Pysa, (sent before by Caesar with a great strength of horsemen and footmen to make bridges and planks for the army which was to follow) arriued before Lyuorne, the naue of Prouence conteyning fise ships and certaine gallions, together with a great carracke of Normandie which the king appointed to reuietual Caietta, were discouered aboue Lyuorne with so fauourable gales & tydes, that without any resistance of the flecte of Caesar (for they were constrained by the time to spread abroad about Melorie, a rocke very famous, for that in a sea battell made there in times past betwene the Genoways and the Pysans, the Pysans were ouerthrowne) they entred the port without other losse, then of one gallion loden with corne, which was taken, as being strayed from the other naue.

This succour gaue no lesse life and courage to those that were within Lyuorne, then much assured the minds of the Florentines, who interpreted this suddaine comming of the ships to a signe, that though earthly and worldly forces would faile them, yet God beholding their calamities, would not abandon them, according to the assurance which oftentimes Sauonarola had preached to the people, euen when euery one was most astonished. But notwithstanding these discouragements of victuals and succours, the King of Romains ceased not to march with his campe to Lyuorne, Caesar marcheth to Lyuorne. whither hauing sent by land fise hundreth men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and foure thousand footmen, he passed vpon gallies euen to the mouth of the poole which is betwene Pysa and Lyuorne: and hauing appointed the one part of the place to be inuaded by the Count Caietta whom the Duke of Myllan had sent with him, he presented himselfe afore the other wherein albeit the first day he had no small a do to settle his campe there for the perillous impediments which the artilleries of Lyuorne gaue to him: yet after he had approched his armie before day on that side to the fountaine, and hauing a chiefe desire to be first maister of the haueu, he began to batter with the cannon, Magnane, which was well fortified by them within; who seeing the campe drawne on that side, had on the other side ruined Polazzotte and the tower standing on that side to the sea, as a thing not onely not gardable, but also conuenient to make them loose the new tower. He caused at the same time to come neare the haueu, his armie by sea, to beat the parts on the sea side: for the french ships, after they had landed their men, and ynladen one part of their corne as they were bound, returned into Prouence, and the Normans set sayle to Caietta, notwithstanding many importunities and requests to haue them tary, thinking to haue made them to the seruice of this defence. The battery that thundred against Magnane, nourishing an intention to assault the towne afterwards by sea, profited very litle: for that the defence was sufficient against all assaults, and had little regarde to the fury of the shot, the defendants also very often making sallies to entertaine skirmish with the enimie. But as the hopes of the Florentines began by the fauor of the winds, so it was a destinie that in the benefit of the windes should be wrought their whole perfection: for by a great storme rising vpon the sudden, the windes and all the ill disposed weathers agreeing, the nauie of Cesar was greatly crushed, and the great ship Grymawda Genoway which had caried his Maisties person, after she had long endured the conflict of the weather and waues, and wrought against the rage of the storme, she was drowned right against the newe tower of Lynorne with all the men and artillerie that she bare within board: the like hapned at the point towards S. Iacques, to two gallies of the Venetians, and all the other vessels so disperfed and shaken by this calamitie, that they became vnprofitable for the present enterprise, specially the defendants following the fauour of this accident, issued out and recouered the gallion, which before had falne into the power of the enemies. The consideration of the losses and miseries hapned by this shipwracke, procured Cesar to returne to Pisa, where after many counsels, euery one distrusting the possibilitie of the enterprise of Lynorne, it was agreed to leauy the campe from thence, and transferre the warre to another part: And therefore Cesar went to Vicopsan, and caused to be built a bridge vpon Arne, betwene Casene and Vico, and an other vpon Cilecchio: but whilest he occupied men with expectation that he would passe ouer, he departed vpon the suddaine, and returned by land the right way to Myllan, hauing brought forth no other action in Tuskane, sauing that foure hundred of his horsemen sackt Bolgheri, a towne almost vnknown in the shores of Pyfa: he excused his sudden departure vpon the difficulties that increased vpon him euery day, as well for that they supplied him not with money as often as he demaunded, as for that the Venetian Commissioners would not consent that the greatest part of their bandes should issue out of Pyfa for the suspition they had of him, besides that they had not fully satisfied him of their portion of the threescore thousand duckets, for which iniuries (extolling greatly the Duke of Myllan) he made many grieuous complaints against them: he passed by Pania, where was taken a newe counsell: And albeit he had published that he would esstoones returne into Almanie, yet he agreed to reappose in Italy all the winter with a thousand horsemen, and two thousand footemen, so that they would make pay to him for euery moneth, of xxij. thousand florins of Rhene: wherein whilest the action of this plot was solicited, with expectation of answere from Venice, he went from thence to Lomelline, at the time when there was looking to receiue him at Myllan, being a thing fatall and ordained to him (as was well approued by the experiences following) not to enter into that citie: from Lomellina, with a mind chaunged, he turned his way to Cusagne fixe miles from Myllan, from whence contrary to all opinions, and vnweeting to the Duke and his Embassadors which were there, he went to Coma: where vnderstanding as he sate at dinner, that the Popes Legat, to whom he had sent that he should not follow him, was arriued: he arose from the table, and embarked with so great hast, that there was scarce leasure to the Legat to deliuer to him a few words within the barke: to whom he answered in short, that he was constrained to go into Almanie, but that he would returne with speed. And albeit, after he was brought by the lake of Coma to Uellafie, he was aduertised that the Venetians would condescend to all things that were agreed vpon at Pania: yet he continued his voyage, and gaue them newe hopes to returne to Myllan: But a very few dayes after, according to the inconstancie and variation of his nature, he left one part of his horsemen and footbandes, and sayled directly into Almanie, hauing shewed (with a very litle honor to the name imperiall) his weaknesse in Italy, wherein long time before had not beene scene any Emperors armed. Lodowyke dispayring now by the going away of Cesar (without new remedies for new accidents) to be able any more to draw Pyfa to himselfe, & much lesse to keepe it out of the hands of the Venetians, withdrew from thence all his people, making it some consolation to his displeasures, that the Venetians onely should remaine intangled with the warre against the Florentines: wherein also he nourished this perswasion, that the long trauels and perplexities of both the one and other part, might with time raise vp some occasions fauourable to his desires. By the departure of the bandes of Lodowyke, the Florentines whose power was strongest in the countrey of Pyfa, recouered againe all the boroughes about the hilles: by reason whereof the Venetians, constrained to leauy new prouisions to hinder their further proceedings, adioyned so many bandes more to the companies they entertayned already within Pisa, that in all, their armie contained foure hundred men at armes, seuen hundred light horsemen, and more then two thousand footmen. In this meane while in the kingdome of Naples, there was almost an end put to all the residue of the warre against the french: for that the towne of Tarente, pressed with famine, was rendred with her castles to the Venetians, who had besieged it by sea, and who, after they had kept it certaine dayes, growing into suspition that they would appropriate it to themselves, rendred it at last to Federyke, by the the great instance of the Pope and the King of Spaine: And as it was vnderstood at Caietta, that the great ship Normain, hauing fought aboute the port Hercules with certaine Genoway ships which she encountred, & sayling afterwards in her course, was ouerbeaten with the rage of stormes, and drowned: So the french men that defended Caietta, whither the new king was eftsoones marched with his campe, albeit the brute went that there were victuals and munitions enough to beare out the siege certaine monethes: yet entring into the examples and actions of their king, in whom they iudged would be as slowe disposition to minister to their succours, as he was carelesse of so great a part of his nobilitie, and to reskew so many places holding for him: they accorded with Federyke, by the sollicitation of Mansr d'Aubigny (who for some difficulties hapning in the assignement of the fortresses in Calabria, was not yet departed from Naples) to leaue the towne and castle, and returne by sea into France with safety and protection of their liues and goods. By reason of this agreement, the french king seeing himselfe deliuered of so many cares and thoughts to minister succors to the kingdom of Naples, and on the other side, being indifferently grieued with the harmes & infamies of those warres, determined to set vpon Genes: wherein he hoped much in the faction of Baptistin Fregosa (aforetimes Duke of that citie) and in the traine and followers which the Cardinall of S. Peter ad vincla had in the towne of Sauone, and in those riuers: he applyed also to the fauor of his deuise, the occasion and consent of the time, for that in those seasons Iohn Lowys de fiesco, and the familie of the Adornes, were in discord, and all the Genowayes generally ill contented with the Duke of Myllan, both for that in the sale of Pietra Sancta, he had preferred the Lucquoys before them, and also, hauing promised to reduce it eftsoones to their hands, vsing in that action (the better to appease the indignation conceiued against him) the authoritie of the Venetians, he had nourished them many moneths with vaine hopes: But for feare of this determination of the king, Lodowyke (who for the occasion of Pysa was almost estranged from the Venetians) was compelled to knit of new with them, and to send to Genes the horsemen and footmen of the Almaines which Cesar had left in Italy, for whom (if this necessitie had not happened) there would haue bene neither employment nor prouision made.

Tarente and Caietta are rendred to Federyke new king of Naples.

The french king determineth to set vpon Genes.

Whilest these things were thus in deuise and sollicitation, the Pope (finding now a great oportunitie to occupy the estates of the Vrsins, for that the principals of that family were restrayned in Naples) pronounced rebels in the consistory, Virginio and the residue of that race, and confiscated their estates, for that contrary to his commaundement they had taken pay of the french. After which beginning he proceeded in further action to assaile their lands, hauing ordred that the Colonnays should do the like in all those places where they confyne with the Vrsins. This enterprise was much comforted by the Cardinall Askanius, no lesse for the auncient amitie he had with the Colonnays, then for a settled dissention and disagreement intertaind of long against the Vrsins. The Duke of Myllan also gaue readily his consent, but it displeased not a little the Venetians, in whom were secret desires to winne that familie, and draw them to their deuotion: and yet not being able with any iustifications to hinder the Pope from pursuing his rights, and withall holding it nothing profitable in that time to alienate him from them: they consented that the Duke of Vrbino, Mercenary in common to the Pope and to them, should march to ioine with the bands of the Church, ouer whom was Captaine generall the Duke of Candia, and in the office of Legat, the Cardinall La luna borne at Pauia; a Cardinall wholly depending vpon Askanius: to this army also, king Federyke of Naples sent Fabricius Colonne: This army now drawne into a campe, after it had compelled many peeces to be rendered, marched to incampe at Trinignan, which towne maintayning a valiant defence for certaine dayes, yeilded at last to discretion: But during the defence of that towne, Bartlemew d'Aluiano issuing out of Bracciane, put to flight within eight myles of Rome, foure hundredth horsemen that guided the attilleries to the campe Ecclesiasticke: And an other day running with the same fortune euen to the crosse of Monsmarie, he lacked not much of taking the Cardinall of Valence, who comming out of Rome to the chace, found his best safetie in the swiftnesse of his horse. After the rendring of Trinignan the campe drew to the Ile, where after they had battered one part of the rocke with the artillerie, they obtayned it by composition. At length all the warre was reduced to Bracciana, where the Vrsins had layed vp all the hope of their defence: for that the place which had bene made strong before, was of new reformed with munitions and rampiers, and the suburbs reenforced, hauing at the entry thereof erected a bastillion, and bestowed within it a sufficient strength of men vnder the gouernment of Aluiano, whose youth gaue him a body disposed, and his wit no lesse quicke and resolute, then his diligence incredible, increased in him (with exercise in armes,) those hopes and expectations to the which in times succeeding, his actions were nothing inferiour: The Pope ceased not to increase dayly his armie which he had of new refurnished with eight hundred launceknights of those that had bene employed in the warres of Naples. There were daily skirmishes and tryall of armes on both partes, and that with great contention, the campe without planting their artillerie in many seuerall places, and they within, not forgetting to repaire and fortifie with present diligence and assurance: And yet within few dayes, the defendants were constrained to abandon the suburbs, which being taken, the Ecclesiasticks gaue a furious assault to the towne, wherein albeit their fortune made them able to aduance their ensignes vpon the wallés, yet by the vertue of the defendants they were estoones forced to retyre, suffering a great losse, in which action was hurt Anthony Sauelle: The defendants expressed the like valour in an other assault, repulsing the enemy with a furie more resolute and a losse more generall, for that two hundred of them were eyther slaine or very fore wounded, wherein appeared with great merit the particular valour of Aluiano, to whom was iustly giuen the principall glory of that defence: for that within, he was of a liuely readinesse to all offices necessary, and without, with continuall eruptions and sallies, he kept the army of the enemy day and night in alarums. In this speciall action, he added much to his reputation, that by his disposing, certaine light horsemen issuing out of Cernette (which the Vrsins held) should make incursions euen to the campe, and he himselfe taking the occasion of this tumult, charged them out of the towne, and put to flight the footbands that garded the artilleries, of which, he carried into Bracciana certaine small peeces: and albeit at length, rather ouerlayd with numbers, then overcome in valour, he and his companies were ouerwearyed with the continuall trauels and perplexities of that warre, hauing neither the day nor the night fauourable to their quietnesse: yet they beganne estoones to readdressse themselves with hope of succors, for that Charles Vrsin, & Vitellozze, who was knit to the Vrsins by a bond of the faction of Guelffes, and being now (passed into Italy vpon the vessels of Prouence) come to Lynorne, with money of the french king to reerec their bands dispersed in the kingdome of Naples: they prepared to succour them in so great a daunger: for which cause Charles went to Soriana, to reassemble the old souldiers, friends and followers of the Vrsins: and Vitellozze in Citta de Castello made the like leaue of the souldiers and footmen of the countrey, adioyning with great diligence his whole strength to Charles at Soriana, hauing in his regiment two hundred men at armes, and xviij. hundred footmen of his owne, with proportion of great artillerie vpon wheeles after the manner of France. By reason whereof the Captaines ecclesiastick, foreseeing that if they marched forward, it could not but be daungerous to be inclosed in the midst of a circle, betweene the new succours, and the old enemies within Bracciana; and withall, holding dishonorable to the renowne of merit and valour, to leaue them in pray all the countrey thereabouts, wherein he had sackt and made hauocke of diuerse borowghes: they leauied their campe from before Bracciana, and retyring all their great artilleries within Anguillare, they marched directly to that quarter where the enemies were: and encountering them betweene Soriana and Bassan, they fought together with great furie for certaine houres: But in the end (the successe of wars depending chiefly vpon the innocencie of the quarrell) albeit at the entry into the encounter, the ecclesiasticks tooke prisoner Franciot Vrsin, yet their whole campe was put to flight, with the losse of their baggage and artilleries: They lost, what in the slaughter, and by taking prisoners, more then fise hundred men, amongst which prisoners were the Duke of Vrbis, Iohn Peter of Gonsague Count of Nugolare, with many other bodies of marke: the Duke of Candia, lightly hurt in the face, and with him the Popes Legat, and Fabrice Colonne found safetie by flying into Roncillon. Aboue all the residue, Vitellozze carried the honor and merit of this victorie, for that the bandes of footemen of Citta de Castello, who had bene afore trained and managed by him & his brethren, with the orders and disciplines of the french, were that day greatly ayded by his industry, and hauing armed them with

pykes longer by an arme length then those which were customably vsed, they had so much advantage when they came to the shooke with the footmen of the enemies; that wounding them with the oddes of length in their pykes, they put them easily to the chafe, so much the more to their greater honor, by how much in the contrary battell, there were eight hundred footemen of the Almaines, of which nation the infanterie of Italy, haue had a continuall feare euer since the discending of king Charles. After this victorie, the victors beganne to runne without resistance ouer all the countrey on this side Tyber; and afterward hauing passed part of their companies ouer the riuer beneath the hill Regione, they still inuaded those wayes where they supposed was any retrait for the enemye. In regard of which daungers, the Pope applying his wits to the necessities of his affaires, studying to make a new leauie of men of warre, called to his succours from the kingdome of Naples, Consaluo, and Prosper Colonne. And yet not many dayes after, what by the diligence of the Embassadors of Venice, to do pleasure to the Vrsins, & the solicitation of the king of Spaine, fearing least these beginnings would draw some ill consequence or innouation to the league, a peace was made, with a most readie inclination aswell of the Pope, who naturally hated expences, as of the Vrsins, who being no lesse poore in money, then naked in friends, knew that their necessitie in the end would compell them to yeeld to the power of the Pope: The articles of the Pope were these; That it should be suffered to the Vrsins to continue in the pay of the french till the end of the time for the which they were hyred by the king, with expresse mention that they should not be bound to take armes against the Church; That all the places which they had lost in this warre should be restored, paying to the Pope fiftie thousand duckats, of the which thirtie thousand to be paid assoone as John Iordan and Paule Vrsin should be set at liberty, (for Virgilio not many dayes before died within the castle of the egge, either of an ague, which was naturall, or by poyson which was violent, & therefore much suspected) and the other twenty thousand duckats within eight monethes: for assurance of which payment, Anguillare and Cernierre should be committed of trust into the keeping of the Cardinals Ascanius and S. Scheriu. That all the prisoners taken in the iorney at Soriana, should be redeliuered, except the Duke of Vrbino, for whose libertie, albeit the Embassadors of the confederats made great trauell, yet the Pope would sollicite nothing: for that he knew the Vrsins had no meane to raise the money they were to pay to him but by the ransome of the Duke, for whom a litle after, was agreement made for xl. thousand duckats, but with this adiection, that he should not be deliuered afore Paul Viselli (who remained prisoner to the Marquis of Montana at the rendring of Atella) had obtayned his libertie without paying any ransome.

*Capitulations
Vrsins.*

The Pope hauing thus to his litle honor dispatched his hand of the warre against the Vrsins, made distribution of money to the companies which Consaluo brought with him, whom ioyning to him his owne bandes, he sent to take Ostia as yet holden in the name of the Cardinall of S. P. ad uincula: wherein his successe communicating with his common fortune, was no lesse easie then speedy, for that assoone as he had braked his artilleries, the castle keeper rendred all to discreffion: After which victorie, Consaluo made his entry into Rome almost in manner triumphant, with a hundred men at armes, two hundred light horsemen, and fiftene hundred footmen, all souldiers of the Spanish, leading before him as prisoner the castle keeper, whom a litle after he set at libertie. There came to meete him many Prelats of the Popes houlhold, with Cardinals, followed with much people, and almost all the Court running with great desire to see a Captaine whose name bare so great fame and merit in Italy: By those Prelats he was led to the presence of the Pope sitting in the consistorie, who receiuing him with great honor, gaue him in testimonie of his valour, the rose which Popes are wont to bestow euery yeare. After this, Consaluo returned to reioyne eftsoones with king Federike, who had inuaded the estate of the Prefect of Rome, and resumed all those places, which taken from the Marquis of Piscaine in the conquest of the kingdome, were bestowed vpon him by the french king. And hauing taken Sore and Arce (but not the castles) he lay incamped before the rocke Guillaume, for that he had had by accord the estate of the Count d'Olyuer, before he sold his Duchy of Sora to the Prefect of Rome.

But as there is no earthly blisse so perfect, which hath not his alea with some bitterness or bale, nor no prosperitie so well assured, which draweth not with it his proper aduersitie: So notwithstanding these felicities heaped vpon Federike, yet he was not without his perplexities, not only by his friends, seeing Consaluo kept one part of Calabria in the name of the king of Spaine, but also of his enemies reconciled : for that the Prince of Bisignian, being one euening fore hurt by a certaine Greeke, as he went out of the new castle of Naples, the Prince of Salerno was in such feare that the blow was giuen by the kings commaundement in reuenge of the offences passed, that immediatly (not dissembling the cause of his suspition) he went from Naples to Salerno. And albeit the king sent to vse at his will, the Greeke deteyned in prison, to iustifie (as the truth was) that he had giuen the blow for an iniurie to him done by the Prince of Bisignian in the honor and person of his wife : yet (in auncient and great grudges it is hard to establish a faithfull reconciliation, for that it hath his proper impediments either by suspition, or desire of reuenge) the Prince of Salerno could neuer after dispose himselfe to trust him : which ielousie, giuing yet some hope to the french (keeping still the Mont S. Ange, and other strong places) of some new innouation or insurrection in the kingdome of Naples, procured them with more constancie to stand to their defences.

enterprises against Italy.

In these seasons, were tokens and demonstrations of farre greater daungers in Lombardie, by the emotions of the french, assured for the present by the threatnings of the Spanishe for that passing betweene them, rather light incursions and apparances of warre, then any thing of notable action, sauing that the french burned the towne of Sausser : they had begun a parley of accord, and for the more easie negotiation of it, had made a surceasing of armes for two moneths : By meane whereof the french king, hauing a more facilitie to harken after the affaires of Genes and Sanona, dispatched to Ast an armie of a thousand launces, three thousand Swyzers, and a like number of Gascoyns, aduertising Triunlso his Lieutenant in Italy, to apply aydes to Baptistin and the Cardinall of S. P. ad vnclā : his intention was to send after, the Duke of Orleans with a strong armie, to execute in his proper name the enterprise of the Duchie of Myllan. And to make more easie the action of Genes, he sent Othavian Fregose to require the Florentines to inuade at the same time Lunigiana and the riuier of the East, ordeining also that the southerne riuers should be troubled by Paule Baptista Fregose with seuen gallies. This enterprise was begun with such astonishment to the Duke of Myllan, not prepared sufficiently of himselfe, and lesse suretie of the aydes promised by the Venetians : that if it had proceeded with the same directions and counsels, it could not but haue brought forth some effect of importance, and more easily in the Duchy of Myllan, then in Genes : for at Genes Iohn Lowys de flesques, and the Adornes, who were entred into reconcilment by the meane of Lodowyke, had leauied many bandes of footmen, and rigged at the charges of the Venetians and Lodowyke an armie at sea, to the which were ioyned fixe gallies sent by Federyke : But the Pope intertayning the name of a confederate, more in counsels and demonstrations, then in workes and meanings, would not in those daungers contribute to any expenses, neither by sea nor land. The proceedings of this expedition were that Baptistin, and with him Triunlce, marched to Nony, of which towne Baptistin had bene despoiled afore by the Duke of Myllan, but not of the castle, which he had alwayes kept, and held yet. But by reason of their coming in such strong order, the Count Catazze, which was there in garrison with threescore men at armes, two hundred light horsemen, and five hundred footmen, distrusting much to be able to defend it, retyred to Saranall. The conquest of this towne augmented greatly the reputation of the banished : for besides that, the towne is capable of many people, it stops the passage from Myllan to Genes, and by reason of the oportunitie and seate of the place, it is very conuenient to endamage the countrey assilting. After this, Baptistin made himselfe Lord of certaine other peeces neere to Nony, and at the same time the Cardinall with two hundred launces, and three thousand footmen, hauing taken Ventimille, coasted ouer to Sanona, where finding no insurrection by the inhabitants, and hauing espiall that Iohn Adorne approched with a strong band of footmen, he retyred to Altare, a place of the Marquis of Montferat distant eight miles from Sanona. But Triunlce in the beginning, did an action of greater importance, for that hauing a desire to giue occasion to kindle the warre in the Duchie of Myllan, notwithstanding the kings commission was to execute first the affaires of Genes and Sanona, he tooke Bosco a borough of great importance in the countrey of Alexandria : wherein this was his pretext and couler, that for the suretie of the bandes which were gone to the East riuers, it was necessary to take from those of the Duke, the meane to go into Alexandria vpon the lands of the Genowayes. But tempring his desire, with regard to the kings commaundement, which he thought not reasonable to impugne manifestly, he forbore to passe further, loosing a most faire occasion, for that all the countrey there about drew

into great sturre and tumult for the taking of that place, some for feare, as the multitude popular, some for desire of innouation, which commonly is familiar with the condition of wits least moderate: And of that side, there was no greater strength for the Duke, then fūe hundred men at armes, & six thousand footmen: besides, Galeas de Saint Senerin, who being within Alexandria, began to distrust his defence without greater forces: and Lodowyke himselfe, being vexed yet but with apparancēs and threatnings, shewing himselfe no more timorous in this aduersitie, then by the propertie of his nature he expresse in all other accidents, solicited the Duke of Ferrara to worke some accord betweene the french king and him. But the sojourning of Trynulce betweene Bosco & Nony, gaue sufficient time to Lodowyke to furnish himselfe, and good respite to the Venetians (who seeming most readie & prepared for his defence, had sent afore to Genes fūteene hundred footmen) to send into Alexandria, bands of men at armes & light horsemen: yea the Venetians appointed the Count Petillane generall of their regiments, (for that the Marquis of Mantua was withdrawne from their pay) to march with the most part of their companies to the succors of that state. Thus things begun with so great hope, now growing cold, Baptistin hauing nothing profited at Genes (for the citie was quiet for the prouisions that were made) returned to ioine with Trynulce, publishing that his exployts brought forth no successe of seruice, for that the riuer of the leuant was not assayed by the Florentines, who iudged it not a councill wise to enter into warre, if first the things of France appeared not more prosperous and more puissant. In like sort came and ioined with Trynulce, the Cardinall ad uincta, by whom was done no other execution, then that he had taken certaine places of the Marquis of Finale, for that he declared himselfe for the defence of Sauone. The french arnie drawne now all into one strength, made certaine offers to Castellat, a place neare to Bosco which had bene aforetime fortified by the Captaines of the Duke. But the army of the confederats which reassembled in Alexandria, increasing daily in quality of soldiers & quantitie of prouisions: and of the contrary, both money and victuals beginning to faile amongst the french, & their Captaines not a litle impatient to obey Trynulce, it was necessary for him to leaue Nony and Bosco to garrison, and retyre neare the towne of Asst.

It was beleued that the distribution of the bands into seuerall places, brought great harme to the enterprise, as often times hapneth in the like examples: and that if they all ioined into one strength, had bene at the beginning addressed to Genes, the expedition perhaps had drawne some better successe: seeing that besides the inclination of factions, and indignation conceiued for Pietra Santa, one part of the horsemen and footmen of the Almaines, which the Duke sent thither, reuolted from the seruice, and returned vpon the sudden into their countrey, it might be also, that euen those who the yeare before had hindered the kings descending into Italy, and the succors of the kingdome of Naples, applying now the same meanes, did giue impediments to the present enterprise by the difficultie of prouisions. This likelihood of truth was iustified with a brute that ranne, that the Duke of Millan (to the oppression of his subiects) made great presents to the Duke of Burbon, and others that had grace and fauour with the king; in which infamy the Cardinall of S. Mallo had not the least interest. But whatsoeuer was in it, it is most certaine that the Duke of Orleans appointed to passe to Asst, and called vpon by the vehement solicitation of the king, made all his preparations necessary for the expedition. But he lingred, either for that he distrusted the continuation of the prouisions, or, (as some interpret) he had no forwardnesse to depart out of France, the king being continually ill disposed of his health, and (in case of sterilitie) the succession of the crowne appertayning to him.

But the king reaping no frute of his hope for the mutation of Genes & Sauona, continued with more diligence his practises begun with the King and Queene of Spaine, which hitherto had benelingered for this only difficultie, that the french king desiring that he might be in libertie to prosecute his enterprises on this side the Mountes, would not that in the truce then in negotiation, should be comprehended the things of Italy. And the kings of Spaine, shewing that they made no difficultie to consent to his will for other respect then in regard of their honor, solicited much that the Italian actions might be comprehended, alleaging that the common intention of them both being to make a truce, to the end a peace might more easily succede, they might afterwarde with greater libertie of honor and honestie, depart from the confederation which they had with the Italians. In so much that after many meetings & discourses of the Embassadors of both sides, (the Spanish subtilities in th'end carying it) they made a truce for thē, their subiects, & dependants, and also for such as either of them should name: which truce beginning betweene them the fift day of march, (but betweene such as should be nominated, fifty dayes after) should last vntill the end of the next October. Every one of the named those estates & Potentates of Italy which were their confederates and adherents, but the kings of Spaine named moreouer king Federyke & the Pisans. After this they agreed to send me to Montpellier to sollicite a peace, where were to assemble the Embassadors of the confederats. In this practise the kings of Spaine gaue hope to vnite themselves with the french king against the Italians vnder a certaine occasion iustificable, & from that time, they commoned of factions & meanes to deuide the kingdome of Naples. The truce, albeit it was made without the participation of the confederates of Italy, yet it was agreeable to them all, but specially acceptable to the Duke of Millan, to whom nothing was more welcome then the meane to make cease the warre in his quarter. But the power remayning free to offend one another in Italy, vntill the xxv. of Aprill, Trynulce, Baptistin, and Sereuon taking the aduantage of that article, returned with fife thousand men to the riuier of the South, where they assaulted the towne of Albenge, which albeit they had almost caried at the first assault, yet they suffered repulse by a very small strength of the enemy, for that their entry was in disorder. Afterwards they fell vpon the Marquisdome of Finale, to giue occasion to the Italian army to make to their succors, hoping by that meanes to draw them to battell: which not succeeding according to their expectation, they did no further action of importance, the discord of the Captaines continuing in increasing, and their payments sayling daily more and more by reason of the truce. In which times, the confederats had recouered all their places lost before (except Nony) which also they obtained at last by composition, notwithstanding the Count Caiazzo which had besieged it, had bene repulsed. There remained in the power of the french no other thing of the places conquered, then certaine little townes in the Marquisdome of Finale: during all which emotions and stirres, the Duke of Sauoy, who had bene solicited on all parts with no small promises, and the Marquis of Moniserrat (whose gouernment had bene confirmed by the king of Romaines to Constantine of Macedonia) stood newtters, declaring neither for the king nor for the confederats.

In this yeare was nothing done of importance betweene the Florentines and the Pisans, notwithstanding the warre continued without intermission: sauing that the Pisans led, vnder the direction of Iohn Paul Mantfron foure hundred light horsemen, and fiftene hundred footmen, to recouer their bastillion vpon the bridge of the poole, which they lost when the Emperour went to Lyornes. The Count Rinuence hauing espiall of this enterprife, put himselfe vpon the way of Lyornes, to reskew the bastillion with a good troupe of horsemen: the Pisans not looking to be charged but by the way of Pontadere, were set vpon as they began to assault the bastillion, & being easily put to the chase, many of them were made prisoners. But at last, armes and actions of warre ceased also betweene them, by reason of the truce, notwithstanding it was with an ill will accepted of the Florentines, who iudged it very inexpedient for their affaires to giue leasure to the Pisans to take breath, seeing withall, that notwithstanding the truce, necessitie compelled them to continue the same expences, both for doubt of Peter de medicis, alwaies conspiring against them, and for feare of the Venetian bands within Pisa, aspiring to the soueraigne imperie of the whole.

The Duke of Millan pra-ctiseth against the Venetians
someting Pisa.

Thus armes being laide aside on all parts, or at least at point to cease from all action, the Duke of Millan, albeit in his latest dangers, he had expressed with what great contentment he embraced the Senate of Venice, for the ready and full succors he had receiued from them: no lesse exalting with publike and heroicall words the vertue & power of the Venetians, then greatly commending the prouidence of Iohn Galeas first Duke of Millan, for that he had committed to the faith of the same Senate the execution of his Testament: yet hauing no patience to endure that the pray of Pisa, followed by him with so many paines and practises, should be transferred to them, as was likely in manifest apparance of reason, And therefore assaying to obtaine with industry & counsell, that which he could not win with armes & force: he so wrought, that the Pope, and the Spanish Embassadors (to both which such a greatnesse of the Venetians was displeasing) should set downe, that to leaue to the french no foundation in Italy, as also to reduce all into one concord, it were necessary to induce the Florentines to enter into the common league, causing Pisa to be restored to them, seeing otherwayes they could not be brought to it: for that so long as they were separated from the residue, they would not cease to stirre vp the french king to discend into Italy, to whom in such an action, they might (hauing their scituation in the midst of Italy) with their money, money, and with their forces, do things of great importance. But this prouision was impugned by the Embassadour of Venice, as very preiudiciall to their common safetie, alleaging withall the inclination of the Florentines to be such to the french king, that not with this benefit, it was not reasonable to trust them, if they deliuered not sufficient securitie to obserue the things they should promise: and that in a matter of so great estate, there was no other suretie, then to put Lynorne into the hands of the confederats. This was very artificially alleaged by him, to the end to haue alwaies a greater meane to gaine say the proposition, knowing well they would neuer consent to commit to deputation a place of such respect for their estate: wherein, the matter drawing afterwards such succeſſe as he looked for, he still opposed against it with such vehemencie, that the Pope and the Duke of Millans Embassador, not daring to obiekt against him for feare to estrange the Venetians from their friendship, the deuise rested there. And there began betweene the Pope and the Venetians a new plot, to turne away with violence the Florentines from the amitie of the french: (the ill conditions of that citie giuing courage to whom so euer would offend it.)

For from the beginning that the authoritie popular was founded, there was not introduced those temperatures, which assuring the libertie with due & reasonable meanes, might haue bene the let, that the common weale should not haue bene disordered by the ignorance and licence of the multitude. In so much that the Citizens of greatest qualitie and condition, being lesse esteemed then seemed conuenient, and on the other side, their ambition being suspected to the people, and many oftentimes intruding into deliberations waighty who were but little capable, and the soueraigne Magistrat to whom was referred the summe of the most waightie affaires, being changed from two moneths to two moneths, the common weale was gouerned with a great confusion: To this was added the great authoritie of Sauonarole, whose auditories were almost entred into secret intelligence. And albeit there were amongst them many honorable Citizens, & they surpassing in number such as were of the opinion contrary, yet it seemed Magistracies and publike honors were distributed rather to those that followed him, then to others of better merit: and therefore the citie being manifestly deuided, in th'assemblies & counsels publike, one faction charged another, no man making conscience (which hapneth in states false into diuision) to hinder the benefit publike, to imbase the reputation of his aduersaries. These disorders were so much the more dangerous, by how much, for the long trauels & great expenses suffered by the said citie; there was that yeare a generall dearth and want of victuals of all natures; by reason whereof it might be presumed that the people vexed with hunger, would be desirous of new things.

This ill disposition of the ciuill affaires of Florence, gaue hope to Peter de Medicis, (who besides those occasions was pushed on by certaine particular Citizens) to be able with ease to be Maister of his long and iust desire: and therefore applying industry and diligence to the oportunity of the time, he communicated his intention with the Cardinall Saint Seuerin his auncient friend, and with Aluiano in whom he much reapposed for the merits of his valour and long familiarity. And herein being also secretly encouraged by the Venetians, to whom it seemed that by the trauels of the Florentines, the affaires of Pisa would be assured: he determined to surprisethe towne of Florence, the rather being aduertised that they had created their suprenie Magistrat (which they call Gonfaloniere of iustice) Bernardin de Nero, a man of auncient grauitie and authoritie, and had bene of a continued friendship with his father and him: hauing in the same election ioyned to him in assistance of that Magistracie certaine others, in whom (for auncient merit and benefits) he supposed was no small inclination to his greatness. The Pope fauored this plot with his full liking & consent, desiring to deuide the Florentines from the french king with iniuries, seeing he could not separate them with benefits. Neither was the Duke of Millan against it, to whom it seemed that albeit he could not make a foundation or intelligence stable with that citie, because of the disorders of the present gouernmēt: yet, on th'other side, he tooke no delight in the returne of Peter, as well for the wrongs he had done him, as for doubt least he should depend too much of the authority of the Venetians. But as soone as Peter had leauied, what by his own meanes, & with the aide of his friends & fauorers, as much treasure as he could possible, hauing receiued (as was beleueed) some smal quantity in prest of the Venetians, he went to Sienna, & after him Aluiano with the horsemen & footmen, marching alwaies by night, & by wayes particular, to the end his coming might be concealed from the Florentines. At Sienna, by the fauour of Iohn Iacques, and Pandolphe Petrucci principals in that gouernmēt, & assured friends to his house, he was secretly refurnished with

bandes of souldiers: So that with sixe hundred horsemen, & foure thousand footmen of choise, two dayes after the truce was begun (wherein they of Sienna were comprehended) he put him on the way to Florence, hoping that ariuing there by the breake of the day, and at vnwares, he should find his entry easie, either for the generall disorder or speciall tumult, which he expected would rise in his fauour: a plot which happily had drawne some good issue for him, if fortune had not supplied the negligence of his aduersaries: for, as in the beginning of the night, he was lodged in the tabernacles (certaine small houses vpon the high way) with intention to march the residue of the night, so he was so hindred by wonderfull raynes & stormes continuing long, that he could not present himselfe before Florence, till long space after the sunne rising: a chaunce which gaue leasure to such as made profession to be his particular enemies (for the communitie & all the rest of the Citizens stirred not, expecting quietly what would be the issue of things) to take armes with their friends and followers, and to prouide that the citizens suspected should be called and restrayned in the publike pallace by the Magistrates. And lastly to make themselves strong at the gate which leads to Sienna, was at their request Paul Vitelli, ariuing there the night before, in his returne from Mantua: In so much as no commotion appearing in the citie, and Peter not strong enough to force the gate (which he had approached within a bow shoot:) and after he had remayned there foure houres, fearing with his danger the suddaine comming of their men at armes, whom he thought (and his conceit was true) the Florentins had sent for from the seruice of Pyssa: he returned to Sienna where Aluano parting from him, & let into Tody by the Guelfes, he sacked almost all the houses of the Gebelyns, and put to the slaughter 53. of the principall bodies of that faction. According to which example, Anthonie Sanelle entred into Terny, & Gattefquies, by the fauor of the Colonnys, and let into Vuerby, did the like executions against the Guelfes in both the one & th' other place, and all the peeces thereabouts: without that the Pope provided for so great disorders in the state ecclesiasticke, because he abhorred all expences in like cases, and hearing by the propertie of his nature, no compassion to the calamities of others, he was nothing troubled with those things that offended his honor, so that his profits or pleasures were nothing hindered: yet he could not auoide the secret iustice of God, expressed in domesticall miseries, troubling him: but with examples tragicall, and a whoredome and crueltie horrible about all the barbarous regions: for where he had determined from the beginning of his election pontificall, to appropriate all temporall greatnesse to the Duke of Candia his eldest sonne, the Cardinall of Valence (who altogether estranged from priestthood, aspired to the exercise of armes) hauing no patience to suffer that place to be vsurped by his brother, and enuying withall that he had better part then he in the loue of Madonne Lucrecia their comon sister: inflamed with lust, and with ambition (mightie ministers to all mischiefes) caused him to be killed one night as he rode alone in the streetes of Rome, casting his bodie secretly in the riuer of Tyber. The brute was (if such an enormitie be worthy to be beleueed) that in the loue of Mad. Lucrecia were concurrant, not only the two brethren, but also the father, who when he was chosen Pope, taking her from her husband being inferiour to her degree, he married her to Iohn Sforce, Lord of Pesere: and afterwards, not able to suffer her husband to be his cortiuall, he made dissolution of the mariage already consummated, hauing made proofe, before Iudges & delegats of his owne creation, by witnesses subborned, & afterwards confirmed by apostolicall sentence, that her husband was imperfect in the operation of nature, and vnable to cohabitation. The death of the Duke of Candia, afflicted not a litle the Pope burning about all other Popes in a vebement loue to his children. And as it is the greatest tryall of wisdom & courage of men, to be temperat in mortall chances: so, such as are not accustomed to aduersities, haue least rule ouer their passions, & they that neuer felt but prosperitie, can litle iudge of the worthines of patience. This Pope was so vnacquainted with the accidents of fortune, & much lesse enured with earthly losses & priuations, that from his infancy to that age all things had happily succeeded to him: the same making this affliction so grievous and intollerable to him, that in the consistorie, after he had with a great compassion of mind, and publike teares, grievously bewayled his miserie, accusing many of his proper actions, and maner of liuing which he had vsed till that day: he assured with wordes full of efficacie, that hereafter he would gouerne his life with other thoughts, and with a forme of liuing more moderate and ruled: and for a beginning he assigned presently certaine of the number of Cardinals, to ioine with him in the reformation of manners and orders of the Court: wherein after he had employed certaine dayes, at what time beganne to be manifest the author of the death of his sonne, (for the which at the first, he had the Cardinall Ascanius and the Kyrins in strong suspition) he left there his former holy intention, his teares, and all his complaints, and returned more disorderly then euer, to those thoughts and operations, wherein he had consumed his age till that day.

There hapned in those seasons new trauels within Florence, by reason of the enterprise of Peter de medicis: for the intelligence and faction which he had with certaine particulars in the citie, was disclosed: by reason whereof many noble Citizens were imprisoned, and some fled. And after the Magistrates had vsed meanes iudiciall to verifie the order of the conspiracie, not only many were condemned to death which had solicited him to come and giuen him reliefe of money: but also Bernardine de Nero, to whom was imputed no other thing, then that knowing the practise, he had not reuealed it, which fault (of it selfe punishable by the head by the statutes of the Florentines, and by the interpretation which most part of lawyers giue to the comon lawes) was found so much the more haynous in him, by how much he was chiefe Magistrate when Peter came to Florence, as if he had bene more greatly bound to do the office rather of a person publike, then priuate: but the parents and kindred appealing from the sentence, to the great councell of the people, & that by vertue of a law made when the popular gouernment was establisht, those that had bene authors of the condemnation, fearing least the compassion of the age, of the nobility, & of the multitude of parents, would moderate in the minds of the people, the straitnesse of the iudgement, wrought so much that they obtained, that to the lesser number of the Citizens, should be referred the resolution, whether the appeale should be suffered to be prosecuted or restrained: wherein, being more strong the authoritie and number of them which held it a thing dangerous, and no lesse drawing to sedition, seeing that the lawes themselues suffered, that to auoide tumults, the statutes in like cases might be dispensed withall: some of those that held the chiefe offices, were with great importunities, and almost by force, and with threatnings, constrained to consent, that notwithstanding the appeale interposed, execution was done the same night. To which extreame iustice, appeared more affectioned then the others, the followers of Sauonarole, not without his proper authority, forbearing to dissuade (euen his auditors) the violation of a law published a few yeres before by himselfe, as a statute conuenient and necessary for the preservation of the common libertie.

The faction & intelligence which Peter de medicis had in Florence is discovered.

In this year, Federike king of Naples, hauing obtained of the Pope the inuestiture of the kingdom, & making his coronation perfect with all solemnities, recovered by accord, Mont Saint Ange, which had ben valiantly defended by Dom Iulian de Lorraine, whom the french king left there: he reconquered also Cinita, with other peeces holden by Charles de Sanguyn. And as soone as the truce was ended, he chased out of the realme the Prefect of Rome, conuerting his forces to execute the like action vpon the Prince of Salerno, who being at last besieged, in the rocke of Diana, and abandoned of all succors, had permission to go his way in safetie with his goods, leauing that part of his estate which he had not yett lost, in the hands of the Prince of Bisignian, with condition to passe it ouer to Federike, as soone as he vnderstood that he was conducted in safetie to Sinigale.

About the end of this year (the diet which had bene transferred from Montpellier to Narbonne, being afore interrupted by the immoderat demands of the king and Queene of Spaine) the french king and the said king of Spaine, returned eftsouones to new practises, wherein were found the same difficulties that before: for that as the french king had determined not to consent to any accord wherein Italy should be comprehended: so it was against the pollicie of the Spaniard to leaue him a libertie free, & a way open to subdue the iurisdiction of it. And yet it was farre from the desires of the Spanish to intertaine wars with him on the other side the Mounts, because it was a warre full of troubles & expenses, and no hope of honor or profit. At last the truce was concluded betweene them, to indure (without limitation) till it were reuoked and two monethes after. There was no Potentate of Italy comprehended in it, to whom the king of Spaine gaue signification of the truce and the articles and capitulations of the same, alleaging that in him was no lesse power to resolue the contract without the knowledge of the other confederats, then the Duke of Millan made it lawfull (without their consent or priuite) to conclude the peace of Vercell. And albeit (according to the forme and couenants of the league) he had begun the warre in France, and continued it many moneths, without receiuing one portion of the money promised by the confederats, wherein he had iust occasion not to make care of them that had consented to his disappointing: yet he had by many meanes and times aduertised them, that if they would make payment of the hundreth and fiftie thousand duckats, which they ought to him for the expenses of the warre he had made, he was contented to accept that payment, in reckoning of all other actions and enterprises hereafter (hauing determined to enter France with a strong armie:) whereunto as the confederats would shew no will or inclination, and much lesse keepe faith, or be carefull ouer the common safetie: So he in that regard, and seeing withall that the league made for the libertie of Italy, was turned into an vsurpation and oppression of the regions of the same, for that the Venetians not contented with so many ports false to their share in the kingdome of Naples, had made themselues Lords ouer Pysa without any right, he could not but hold it indifferent, reasonable, and iust, seeing by others, the affaires common were disordered, to prouide for his owne particular with a truce, bearing notwithstanding such a forme and manner, that it may rather be called an admonition, then a will to separate fro the league: for that it was alwaies in his power to dissolue or reuoke it, which he would do, when he should discerne an other intention, with other prouisions, in the Potentates of Italy, for the stay of the common benefite. About this time dyed John Prince of Spaine, onely sonne to the King and Queene, to whom the accident brought no small forowes and heauinesse, for that, besides disappointing of the succession, his death gaue no litle impediments to the sweet delights and pleasures which they reckoned to reape in their new tranquillitie and rest.

To this was also ioyned the death of Philip Duke of Sawoy, leauing for a posteritie, one sonne of litle age, and therefore of no iudgement touching his expectation or towardnesse. This late Duke, after he had wauered long time in suspence and newtrality, beholding all their actions without motion or inclination particular, seemed at last to fauour the faction of the confederats, who had promised to pay him euery yeare, twentie thousand duckats: and yet euery one of them had so great doubt of his faith, that they could assure nothing of his promises and truth, if the french king should descend to make any strong enterprise.

Genes rendred

With this yeare, ended the two yeares touching the deputation of the castle of Genes, which the Duke of Ferrara (receiuing it in trust) did estoones render to Lodowyke his sonne in law: he first demaunded of the french king, that according to the capitulations of Vercell, he would see him satisfied of the halfe of the expences employed in the gard and keeping of it, whereof the king consented to make payment, so that the Duke would put into his hands the castle, as he said he was bound for the inobseruation of the Duke of Milán. To this the Duke of Ferrara answered, that that was not verified, and that to put the Duke of Milán in contumacie, it were necessarie to haue interpellation: the king offered to commit the money into a third mans hand, to the end that afore payment were made, there might be construction in iustice, reason, and law, whether he ought not to render to him the castle. But the instance made to the contrary by the Venetians and his sonne in law, caried farre more force in the fancie of the Duke of Ferrara: wherein he was not onely moued by the prayers and solicitations of Lodowyke, who not many dayes before, had indued the Cardinall Hippolite his sonne, with the archbishoprike of Milán: but also he had regard to the daungers that threatned him, if he should prouoke the malice of so mightie enemies, specially at a time wherein was continuall diminucion of the hope that the french men would descend: So that, applying his actions to the inclination of the time, he first called home from the Court of France, his sonne Ferrand, and then surrendered the castle to Lodowyke, who satisfied all charges for keeping it, together with the portion which appertained to the king to pay. By reason whereof, the Venetians, to expresse how much they congratulated his doings, tooke his said sonne into their pay, with a hundred men at armes. This restitution made with no iustice, albeit it was of great importāce against the kings reputation in Italy, yet he dissembled the wrong, and made no such apparance of disliking as was conuenient to the grauitie of the dishonour. And that which more is, the Duke of Ferrara, excusing the action by an Embassador sent to his Maiestie, that by reason of the neighbourhood of the Venetians and Duke of Milán (both prepared to pronounce warre against him) he was constrained to obey necessitie: yet the king gaue as negligent care, as if the nature of the matter had bene light and trifling: wherein this might be one reason of the kings negligence, that, besides he proceeded almost at auenture in all his actions, yet he was ouerweariied with a continuall care and trauell of mind, ioyned to his auncient deuotion to repasse into Italy, hauing now greater occasions then euer, for that he had made truce with the king of Spaine, renewed the alliance with the Swyzzers, and many late causes of disagreement

ment hapned amongst the confederats. But as for the most part, matters of enterprise do nourish their proper impediments, & to Princes their desires do seldome succcede, when their negligence is more common then their resolutions certaine: so, the kings disposition was ouerruled with new means subborned by such as were in most principall grace about him: Whereof some set afore him his pleasures, others encouraged him to embrace the enterprise, but with so mighty preparations both by sea and land, and with so great prouisions of money, as could not be refurnished but with a long space and interposition of time, others made the action slow and impossible by many difficulties and obiections, and the Cardinall of S. Mallo forgat not his accustomed delaies in the expedition of money. In so much, that not onely the time to march into Italy, was more incertaine then euer: but also many things were suffered to suspend and miscarie, which were almost brought to their perfection: for the Florentines (continually incensing the king to march) had contracted with him, to take armes on their sides, as soone as the warre should beginne by him, and for that effect, they did agree that Monfr d'Aubigny with an hundred and fiftie french launces (the hundred to be payed by the king, and the fiftie to be mercenarie by them) should passe by sea into Tuskane, to be generall of their armie. And the Marquis of Mantua, who when he returned victorious from the kingdome of Naples, had bene dishonorably disappointed of the pay of the Venetians, for suspition that he solicited to be mercenarie to the french king: did now with great diligence and in good earnest, negociate with him to that end. The new Duke of Sauoy was confirmed in his good amitie and alliance: Bentinole promised to follow his authoritie, as soone as he were come into Italy. And the Pope, doubting whether he should ioyne with him, (as he was continually laboured) determined at the least not to be against him.

But all expectations began now to dissolue, and mens motions and mindes to grow cold for the detraction and negligence which the king vsed: for that, neither his men of warre (as was promised) passed into Italy to reassemble at Alt: neither was Monfr d'Aubigny dispatched, and much lesse money sent to pay the Vrsins and the Vitellis his souldiers, (a thing of no litle importance for the warre he ment to make.) By reason whereof the Vitellis inclining to enter pay with the Venetians, the Florentines who feared they should not haue sufficient respite to giue aduertisement to the king, kept them intertayned for one year in common, for the seruice of the king and themselves. The king commended much these actions in them, but he made no ratification nor prouision of payment for his part: onely he sent Gemell to them, to intreat them to lend him for the furniture of his enterprise, an hundred and fiftie thousand duckats. Lastly, the king (as he did at other times) measuring the wils of others by his owne, left all things to confusion, and departed almost vpon the sudden from Lyon, to go to Tours, and then to Amboise, with his accustomed promises to returne immediatly to Lyon.

For which respects, hope sayling in all those that followed his faction in Italy. Baptistin Fregose was the first that reconciled himselfe with the Duke of Millan, who taking courage by these good euent and successes, discouered euery day more and more, the ill disposition he bare towards the Venetians for the regard of Pysa, soliciting (with continuall importunities) the Pope, and the king of Spaine, estfoones to call into question (but with more efficacie) a parliament for the restoring of the same citie. And the better to aduance the practise, the Florentines, receiuing counsell and direction from him, dispatched an Embassadour to Rome, but with a commission qualified to proceede so aduisedly; that the Pope and the residue might perceiue, that if Pysa were rendred to them, they would ioyne in vnitie with the others for the defence of Italy, against the french: but in case the restitution of the city succceeded not, to keepe all things from the knowledge of the french, to whom they were carefull to giue any occasion to hold them doubtfull or suspected. This conference continued many daies at Rome, wherein was omitted nothing by the Pope, the Embassadors Spanish, the Duke of Millan, and the king of Naples, that might reasonably induce the Venetian Embassadour to hold it necessarie for the common suretie of Italy, that by the redeliuery of that citie, the Florentines might participate in the generall league against the french. They told him that the Senate of Venice ought to consent thereunto together with others, to the end, that the rootes of all emotions and troubles being supplanted, there should remaine to no estate or degree in Italy, any occasion to call estfoones forreine armes ouer the Mounts. They told him also that if in that regard the vnitie of Italy suffered impediment, there would perhaps be giuen, matter and occasion to others to take new counsels, by the which (to the comon prejudice).

might happen some alteration of importance. But to this, was quite contrary the deliberation of the Senate of Venice, who couering their couetousnesse with many colours, and no lesse perceiuing from whom proceeded principally so great an instance, made answer by the same Embassadour, complaining not a litle that such a motion proceeded not of a respectiue care to the vniuersall benefit, but of an ill tempered affection which some of the confederats bare to them: for that (sayth he) the Florentines, hauing with the french men a secret affinitie and coniunction of mind, and being perswaded that by their returning into Italy, the most part of Tuskane would diuolue to their rule and iurisdiction: it was without doubt, that to reestablishe them in Pysa, would not suffice to draw them from so ambitious inclination. But of the contrary, the restitution was a thing dangerous, for that by how much they should be mighty and strong, by so much would they be hurtfull to the suretie and quiet of Italy: he said that in this restitution, it went of the honour and faith of euery one, but principally of their common weale, seeing the confederats hauing promised the Pyssans with one consent to protect their libertie, and afterwards (euery one in particular putting an vnwilling hand to furnish the expenses of the comon businesse) imposed the whole burden vpon them alone, who (for that cause) had refused no charges, cares, nor trauels, it could not but turne to their speciall dishonor, to leaue them abandoned when they were in most necessitie of stay and comfort, and to withdraw their faith and promise, which though others esteemed litle, yet with them it had alwayes carried this reputation, not to suffer staine or violation in any sort: he alleged it was a thing most grievous to the Senate of Venice, that (without respect reasonable) others sought to lay vpon them by imputation, that which had bene begun with one common and generall consent, and continued for the benefit of euery one, and that with so great an ingratitude, they were punished for their good workes: That the intollerable expenses which they had defrayed in this enterprile and many others, ioyned to so many perils and trauels sustayned since the creation of the league, deserued not such recompence and retribution, their actions deseruing that nature and qualitie both for expenses, pollicie; and care, that they may say with reason and iustice, that Italy hath bene preserued by their meane: for that neither the battell of Taro was fought with other armes then theirs, nor the kingdome of Naples recouered with other forces then of their common weale: That no other armie constrayned Nouaro to render, and chased the french king to returne beyond the Mounts: That no other strength then theirs, was opposed against him in Pyemont, as often as he assayed to returne: And that it could not be denied, that those actions proceeded principally of the desire they had to protect the safety of Italy, seeing as their estates were alwayes furthest remoued from perils; so, for their occasion, there were no disorders hapned which they ought to readdresse or amend: for they called not the french king into Italy, nor accompanied him when he was come ouer the Mounts, and much lesse for sparing their proper treasures, haue they suffered to fall into perill, the affaires common and vniuersall. No, rather necessitie and occasion haue so required, that the Senate of Venice did giue remedie to the disorders hapned by the faults of others, to the common harmes of the whole. All which operations, albeit they were not knowne, or though they were so soone committed to forgetfulness, yet they would not for all that (forbearing the ill excusable example of others) defile neither the faith nor dignitie of their common weale, the rather, for that to the preseruacion of the libertie of the Pyssans, was ioyned the suretie and well doing of all Italy.

the eight.

Whilest things passed in these practises amongst the confederats, with a manifest and generall disagreement, there hapned a new accident, which engendred effects diuerse and much different from the thoughts of men. The night before the eight day of April, king Charles dyed at Amboise, of a catterhe which the Phisitians call apoplexie, the same rising in him with such abundance as he beheld a match plaied at tennys, that in few houres he ended at the same place his life, during the which, he had with greater importunitie then vertue, troubled the whole world, with great apparance of daunger to kindle estsoones new fires of innouation and troubles: for that it was beleued of many, that being pushed forwardes with a vehement desire to returne into Italy, he had in the end, either of his proper knowledge, or by the emulation of such as bare enuy to the Cardinall of S. Mallo, remoued all the difficulties that had withholden the action. In so much, that albeit in Italy (according to his variations) sometimes he increased, and sometimes he diminished the opinion that men had that he would march: yet he kept them in continuall suspition, & made his intentions to trouble their coniectures and counsels. And for that cause, the Pope puffed with ambition ambition to rayse his sonnes, had begun already to sollicite with him touching some secret innovation, the Duke of Millan hauing done the like (as was bruted) to the end he would not liue in continuall feare.

King Charles dying without issue, the realme of France descended to Louys Duke of Orleans, Louys Duke as nearer in blood then any other of the masculine line; to whom (remayning then at Blois) came of Orleans succeeded to the crowne. to do reuerence, the kings gard, and all the generall traine of the Court, together with the nobilitie of the kingdome, by whom he was saluted as king with titles and inuocations royall, notwithstanding some did secretly murmure, that (according to the auncient statutes of the land) he was vnworthie to aspire to the crowne, against the which he had taken armes in the warres of Brittaine.

The day after the death of king Charles (a day obserued in many places by a celebration and solemnitie of palmes) tooke end the authoritie, life, and doctrine of Sauonarola: who hauing bin long time before accused by the Pope, that he preached slanderously against the manners of the Clergie and Court of Rome, that he nourished sects and discords in Florence, & that his doctrine was not fully catholike, and for those reasons called to Rome by many writs, refused to appeare there, alleaging many excuses: and therefore after much ado he was at last (the yeare before) separated by the Pope with censures from the fellowship of the Church: of which sentence (hauing absteyned from preaching for certaine moneths) he had easily obtained absolution, if he had longer continued, for that the Pope, who held slender reckoning of Sauonarola, had proceeded against him more by the incensing and perswasion of his aduersaries, then any other occasion. But heudging that it was for his silence, that his reputation came so to be diminished, or at least, that it brake the purpose for the which he stirred (for he was principally aduanced for his vehemencie in preaching) he fellt soones to despise the Popes commaundements, and returned publickly to his office, wherein affirming that the censures published against him were vniust and of no force, he opened his mouth soones to blaspheme the Pope and the whole court of Rome with great vehemencie: of this arose no small emotion, for that his aduersaries (whose authoritie increased daily in greatnesse with the people) detested such inobedience, rebuking the action, for that by his innovation and rashnesse, the Popes mind was drawne in vncertainties and alteration, in a time specially, wherein the restitution of Pysa being negotiated by him and the other confederats, it was necessarie to do all things to confirme him in that inclination. On the other side, his disciples and partakers defended and iustified him, alleaging that men ought not for the regard of humane things, to trouble the operations diuine, nor consent that vnder such colours, the Popes of Rome should begin to intrude into the affaires of their common weale. But after there were certaine daies spent in this contention, and the Pope wonderfully inflamed, sending out new thunderbolts with threats of censures against the whole citie: he was at last commaunded by the Magistrates of the citie to forbear to preach, to whom though he obeyed, yet diuerse of his brethren supplied his office in sundry Churthes. And the diuision being no lesse amongst the spiritualtie then the layetic, the Fryers and brethren of other orders ceased not to preach feruently against him: arising at last into such high and malicious inflammation, that one of the disciples of Sauonarola, and one of the Fryer Minors, agreed to enter into the fire in the pefence of the whole people, to the end that the disciple of Sauonarola either being burned or preserued, the people might be left satisfied and certaine whether Sauonarola were a Prophet or an abuser: seeing that at times afore, he had affirmed in his sermons, that for the iustification of the truth of his prophecies, he could in all necessities obtaine of God the grace, to passe without hurt, thorough the midst of a flaming fire. And yet notwithstanding greening not a litle with the resolution made without his priuie touching a present experience, he laboured to breake it with all his deuises and diligence: But the matter being so farre proceeded of it selfe, and earnestly solicited by certaine citizens desiring to haue the towne deliuered of so great troubles, it was necessary at last to passe further: In so much as the two religious brethren, accompanied with all their brotherhoods and couët, came at the day appointed to the place afore the publicke pallace, where was not only a generall concourse of the people of Florence, but vniuersall assemblies of the cities adioyning. There the Fryer Minors were aduertised that Sauonarola had ordeyned, that his disciple and brother entering the fire, should beare in his hand the Sacrament: which deuise they impugned greatly, alleaging that there was sought by that meane to put in danger the authoritie of Christian faith, which in the minds of the ignorant would not a litle decline if that holy oast should be burned: by which contention, Sauonarole being there present, and perseuering in his resolution, there arose such factions and disagreements, that the action of experience proceeded no further, the same diminishing so much of his credite, that the day following in a tumult then hapning, his aduersaries tooke armes, whereunto being ioyned the authoritie of the soueraigne Magistrate, they entred the Monasterie of S. Marke where he was, and drawing him out of the place, they led him with two other of his brethren to the common prisons. In this tumult, the parents of those that had bene executed the yeare before, killed Francisque Vatori a Citizen of great authoritie, and the most apparant fanorer and follower of Sauonarole: the chiefe motion inducing this quarrell, was, that about all others, his authoritie had depriued them of the facultie to haue recourse to the iudgement of the counsell popular. Sauonarole was afterwards examined with torments, but not very grieuous, and vpon the examination, a proesse published, which (taking away all imputations that were laide on him for couetousnesse, corruptions of manners, or to haue had secret intelligence or practise with Princes) conteyned, that the matters by him prophesied, were not pronounced by reuelation diuine, but by his proper opinion grounded vpon the doctrine and obseruation of holy Scripture. Wherein he had not bene moued by any wicked intention or purpose, and much lesse by that meane, to aspire to any office or greatnesse in the Church: onely he had a holy desire, that by his meanes might be called a generall counsell, wherein might be reformed the corrupt customes of the Clergie, and the estate of the Church of God, (so farre wandred & gone astray) to be reduced, as neere as might be, to the resemblance of the times drawing nearest the Apostles; A glory, which, to giue perfection to so great and holy an operation, he esteemed farre about the obteyning of the popedome: for that the one could not succede but by meane of an excellent doctrine and vertue, and a singular reuerence of all men: where the Popedome most often was obteyned, either by sinister meaues, or else by the benefit of fortune: vpon which proesse confirmed by him in the hearing and preface of many religious persons euen of his owne order, but (if that be true which his owne faction bruted afterwards) with words darke, and such as might receiue diuerse interpretations: there were taken from him and his two other companions with ceremonies instituted by the Church of Rome, the holy orders, and that by sentence of the generall of the Iacobins and of the Bishop Romolin, Commissioners delegate by the Pope: and so being passed ouer to the power of the secular Court, they were (by their iudgements) hanged and burned, being at the spectacle of the degradation and execution, no lesse multitudes of people, then at the day of the experience of entring the fire, when was an infinite concourse to behold the issue of the miracle promised by Sauonarole. This death constantly endured (but without expressing word whereby might be discerned, either their innocencie or fault) quenched not the diuersitie of iudgements and passions of men: for that many supposed he was but an abuser: and others (of the contrary) beleueed, that the confession that was published was falsely forged, or perhaps, in his aged and weake complexion, the torments had more force then the truth: wherein they excused that maner of frailtie with the example of S. Peter, who neither imprisoned, nor constrained with torments, or by any other extraordinary force, but at the simple words of the handmaidens and seruants, denied that he was the disciple of his master, in whom he had seene so many holy miracles.

THE ARGVMENT.

LOWYS Duke of Orleans succeedeth to the crowne of France: he determineth to reconer his Duchie of Millan: Pisa and Florence make warre: Lodowyke Sforce flieth from Millan: the Florentines giue batterie to Pisa, and agree with the french king: Pope Alexander aspireth for his sonne to the iurisdiction of Romagna: Lodowyke Sforce reconereth Millan, but being betrayed by the Swizzers, he is taken, and led into France.

IT was almost an vniuersall coniecture amongst the Italians, that by the death of king Charles, all the regions of Italy were now deliuered of those feares, afflictions, and dangers which the power and nation of the french did threaten. Their opinions were induced by this reason, that the new King Lowy presently ascended to the crowne, would not intangle the beginning of his raigne with forreine warres, hauing first to looke with great study into the state of his owne gouernment at home, which commonly to kings newly inuested, brings many causes of new counsels and alterations: but the spirits of such as discoursed with iudgement vpon the traine and euent of things, nourished alwayes a secret suspition, that the afflictions that then were but deferred, would with time redouble, and rise growing to greater daungers and more generall harmes, specially so great an Empire being false vpon a king ripe in age, full of experience, ruled in his counsels, resolute in action, moderate in expenses, and in all things (without comparifon) holding more of himselfe, then did his predecessor: and to whom withall, did appertaine (as in the right of the crowne of France) not onely the inheritance of the realme of Naples, but also he maintained that the Duchie of Millan was his freehold by the succession of the Lady Valentina his grandmother, who was married by Iohn Galeas Viscounte his father (afore that, of viccaire of the Empire, he had obteyned the title of the Duke of Millan) to Lowy Duke of Orleans, brother to king Charles the sixt. At which marriage, there was added to the state of the dowry (which was the citie and countrey of Ast with great summes of money) an expresse condition, that as often and when so euer as the line masculine of the said Galeas should fayle, the Lady Valentina should succede to the Duchie of Millan, or she being dead, her next heires and discendents: which couenant albeit strong enough of it selfe, was confirmed (if the french traditions be true) by the authoritie of the Pope (the imperiall seat being voide at that time, for the Popes of Rome pretend that the administration of the Empire vacant belongeth to them:) by which meanes, the blood male of Iohn Galeas, determining afterwards by the death of Philipp Alaria Viscounte, Charles Duke of Orleans, sonne to the Lady Valentina, began to pretend to the succession of the said dukedome: But as the ambition of Princes is ready to help on their titles with euery apparant colour, so there aspired at the same time to the said dukedome, not onely the Emperour Federike, alleaging that it was reuerted to the Empire, for that the line nominated in the inuestiture made to Iohn Galeas by Vincislaus king of Romaines, was extinct and dissolued, but also Aiphonso king of Aragon and Naples, who was instituted heire by the Testament of Duke Philipp; and amongst the residue, Francis Sforce with a fortune, force, and felicitie, more fauourable then the others, quarrelled the same title, who to giue a better shadow to the armies which he leauied in that cause, alleaged that his wife Blanche, the onely daughter (but a bastard) of Philipp, had peculiar interest in that succession: So that Charles Duke of Orleans, who (being taken prisoner at the battell of Agincourt in the warres betweene the English and french, and remaining restrayned in England xxv. yeares) was able to do nothing, by reason of his pouertie and hard fortunes to iustifie his title, and much lesse could he obtaine aide of king Louys the xj. notwithstanding he was his nearest kinsman: the reason was, that the same king, in the beginning of his raigne, was much molested and manifestly inuaded in diuers partes of his kingdome, by the great Lords and Barons of the same, shadowing their conspiracies with a shew of publike profit. But because the king saw that their intentions drew with them priuate regardes and particular interests, he kept them alwaies in bridle, and esteemed his estate and suertie to consist in the embasing of the great ones of his realme, but chiefly his nearest competitors: And for that reason, Louys Duke of Orleans sonne to Charles, albeit he was his sonne in law, could draw no fauours or succors from him: the same driuing him, after the death of his said father in law, together with his impaciencie that the Lady Anne Duchesse of Burbon the kings sister, was preferred afore him to the gouernment of Charles the eight then in minoritie, to trouble France with a very slender successe, and after retyred into Britaine with a worse fortune: for ioyning with these that were against the intention of Charles, to obtaine Britaine by marrying with Anne heire of the state by the death of Francis her father leauing no issue male, (yea aspiring secretly to the same mariage) he was taken in an encounter between the french and the Brittons neare S. Aubin in that countrey, and from thence led prisoner into France, where he remained two yeares. In so much as sayling then of nieanes, and finding no succors in king Charles after he was out of prison, he ioyned no further action to that enterprize, but when the king left him within Ast, he made himselfe Lord of Nouaro with a very litle profit: but being now become king of France, he held nothing of greater affection, then to reconquer the Duchie of Millan as a succession iustly appertayning to him. This desire planted in him from his youth, was estoones wonderfully increased and aduanced, by the successe he had at Nouaro, and withall, for that he greatly hated Lodowyke Sforza, by reason of the insolent demonstrations and behauiours which he vsed to him, when he had the kings deputation in Ast: Therefore, not long after the death of King Charles, by resolution set downe in his elect councell, he intitled himselfe not onely king of France, and (for the regard of the realme of Naples) king of Iernsalem & both the Cicillies, but also soueraigne Duke of Millan. And because he would make knowne to the world what was his inclination to the things of Italy, he wrote letters full of amitie and congratulation touching his ascending to the crowne, to the Pope, the Venetians and the Florentines, and withall dispatched men of speciall credence, to giue hopes of new enterprises, but chiefly of his determination to conquer the Duchie of Millan: wherein the time running, nourished for him many fauours and oportunities, for that the death of his predecessor had innouated in the minds of the Italians many new humors and inclinations, much differing from the cogitations and purposes they had afore: for the Pope (whose ambitious thoughts could not be satisfied if Italy stood in tranquillitie) wished that things might growe to hurly burly, seeking his peculiar aduancement in the common diuision of principalities and states: A desire not vnlikely to deriue from such a mind, to whom all things were hatefull that held of equitie, conscience, or religion, and nothing vnfaurie that smelled of troubles, innouation, and change. And the Venetians, being now deliuered of the feare they had of king Charles for the wrongs and iniuries they had done him, expressed manifestly that they had no distrust in the new king: which disposition increased daily more and more, for that Lodowyke Sforza (notwithstanding he knew that he had to do with an enemy more mightie and lesse plyable) feeding himselfe with this hope (the same also beguiling Federyke of Aragon) that the french king could not with such expedition execute any action on that side the Mounts, forbare not to oppose himselfe against the Venetians in the quarrell of Pisa, wherein his spite present would not let him see the danger that was to come: an error familiar with Princes ambitious, who measuring the euent of things more by their proper fancie and imagination, then by any rule or comparison of times & reasons, are often in that securitie, caried to their vndoing; as men that wander and beleue an eccho which beguiles them to their extreame ruine. The Florentines only began to estrange themselves in mind from the amitie of the french: for albeit this new king had bene their protector afore, yet now that he is made great with the estate and dignitie of the crowne, he had with them no league of amitie, neither in regard of faith giuen, nor for benefits receiued, as his predecessors had by meane of those capitulations which were made at Florence and Ast: for regard of which they would would alwayes lay them selues open to many perils and perplexities, rather then to abandon his alliance. Besides, the discord which continually increased betweene the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan, was the cause that the feare being ceased which they had of the forces of the confederates, and wishall hoping more in the fauours certaine and present of Lombardy, then in the succors absent and doubtfull of Fraunce, they tooke occasion to hold lesse reckening of his friendship or confederation. In this different disposition of mindes, were also no lesse diuerse, the Embassages that were sent: for the Senate of Venice dispatched with great speed to the king, one of their Secretaries remaining at that time in negociation with the Duke Sauoy. And to establish with these beginnings, the foundations of a well assured alliance, as the dayly affaires & occurrants of times required, they made an election of three other Embassadours to go to his Maiestie, not onely to congratulate his right worthy ascending to the crowne, but also to protest in forme of excuse, that what they had done contrary to the liking of the late king Charles, proceeded of no other motion, then of a timorous suspition (confirmed by many apparant signes and demonstrations) that not contented with the kingdom of Naples, he would lift vp his minde to those meanes which might make him Lord ouer the whole Monarchy of Italie. The Pope also, whose deuotion had this determination, to appropriate to his sonne Cesar at that time Cardinall, all temporall greatness, raised his thoughts to high things, and sending Embassadours to the French king, was at a point to sell to his Maiestie spirituall graces, receiuing in recompence, possessions temporall: for he was not ignorant that the French king had great desire to refuse Iane his wife, both barrein and deformed, who was giuen him almost by force by Lewes the eleuenth: And that he had no lesse liking to marry Anne now widow by the death of the late king, not so much for the ancient affection that was betweene them afore the encounter of S. Aubin, as that by the prerogatiue of that marriage, he should insinuate into the Duchy of Britaine, an estate great and very conuenient for the crowne of Fraunce: this chaunge could not be done without the authoritie of the Pope. The Florentins in like sort sayled not to send Embassadours to the king, as well to testifie the auncient custome and deuotion of that Citie to the crowne of Fraunce, as to put his Maiestie in remembrance of their merites, and the bonds and promises of the late king: wherein they were much solicited by the Duke of Myllan, hauing two intentions, the one that by their meanes the practises of the Venetians might be hindered, (both the one and other common weale intreating of the affaires of Py/a) and also that if they obtained any credit, amitie, or authoritie; they might vnder some occasion, employ all to worke an accord betweene him and the French king, a thing not a litle desired and sought by him. All these Embassadours were well receiued of the king, who began euen at the first to sound euery one of them seuerally, notwithstanding he had no meaning to put any thing to action in Italie, afore he had first assured the realme of Fraunce, by new leagues and confederations with the Princes his neighbours and borderers.

But it was a thing fatall, that the fire of Py/a, to the which the Duke of Myllan gaue the first kindling, and nourished by an inflamed desire to assubiekt it to him selfe, should in the end breake his brand vpon the head of the author, and consume him with his proper flame: for that as well by his naturall ielousie, which was infinite in him, as for daunger of the greatnesse of the Venetians, which he saw to aspire not only ouer him, but also aboue all other Potēates of Italy, he could not endure with reasonable patience, that the fruite of his deuises and trauels, should be gathered by them, or transferred to the reputation of their imperie: wherejo, taking occasion vpon the disposition of the Florentins, resolute to pursue in all accidents the quarell of Py/a, and seeming to him that by the death of Sauonarola and Francis Valorie which were strong parties against him, he might now reappose more in that City then he could do in times past: he determined to ayde the Florentins in the recouery of Py/a with armes, seeing neither with practises, authoritie, nor the power and meanes of others, he could hitherunto worke no good effect of that plot: he perswaded him selfe vainely, that either afore the French king could execute any action, Py/a would be reduced by composition or force to the iurisdiction of Florence, or else the Senate of Venice, (guided by that wisdom which he would neuer suffer to gouerne him selfe) would neuer desire either for enuie, or other lesse occasion, that (to the common daunger of the whole) the French armies should euen soones returne into Italie, seeing it was an vniuersall trauell to chase them out so lately.

lium consule-tori pressi-

This indiscreete resolution was furthered by a disorder which hapned against the Florentins in the countrey of Py/a: for their people which were at Pontadere, hauing aduertisemēt by their espials that a troupe of seuen hundred horsemen, and a thousand footemen of the Py/sans, were returning home with a great pray of cattell which they had taken in the fields of Voltere, issued out almost all vnder the conduct of the Count of Rinuccce and Guillaume of Pazzi, Commissioner for the Florentines, to cut betweene them and home for the recouery of the booty: & encountering with them in the valley of S. Reale, and as they had almost put them to disorder and recouered the most part of the pray, there ioyned to the Pisans an hundred and fiftie men at armes sent out of Pisa to the succours of their fellowes, who finding the Florentine armie both wearie and disordered with the trouble of the pillage, and the authoritie of the Count not able to range the horsemen to the fight, they were put all to the chafe, notwithstanding the footmen made some head and resistance, among whom many passed by the sword, and most of their horsemen taken prisoners with the chiefest of their leaders: in so much as the Count and Commissioner for Florence, saued them selues with great difficultie within S. Reale, where they imposed one vpon another (as is the custome in chaunces of aduersitie) the fault of the disorder happened.

Paule Vitelli Capitaine generall of the Florentine armie.

This journey brought no litle affliction to the Florentins, who to readdressse with speed so great a danger, and not able to refurbish their companies with expedition, and Count Rinuccce Generall of their whole armie, hauing lost his reputation, for that his regiment was broken, determined to turne to the affaires of Pisa, the Vitelles who were then in the countrey of Aretze: But afore that contract was perfected, they were constrained to accord to Paule Vitelli the title, dignitie, & reputation of Capitaine general of their armie. This ouerthrow constrained them estoons to demand succours of the Duke of Milan, and that with so much the more instance, by how much since the chafe, they had besought the French king, that to put them out of danger with his forces and with his authoritie, he would send them three hundred lances into Tuskane, and ratifie the retaining of the Vitelles according to the contract made in the time of the late king Charles, prouiding his portion of their payment, & also that he wold cause the Venetians to abstaine from further vexing the: of all which requestts, they reaped but gracious words without any effect, for that the king would not bring himself suspected with the Venetians, nor make any stirre in Italy afore he put beginning to the warres of Milan. But in these necessities & estate of things, the Duke of Milan was neither cold nor negligent, who doubting lest the Venetians (by the occasion of this victorie) would enter further into the iurisdiction of Pisa, then they could be afterwards repulsed but with great difficulty, made known to the Florentins that he had a firme intention to succour them, but first he would establish with them, what sorts & proportiōs of prouisiōs were necessary not only for his defence, but also to archieue the enterprise of Pisa, to the which (for there was no feare of any action in the French king for that yeare) were turned vniuersally the eyes of all Italy, being then free from all other troubles: for albeit in the territories of Rome the families of Colonne and Vrsin had takē armes, yet their wisdoms preuailed more in the quarell, then either their hatreds or their iniuries.

Quarell betweene the families of Co- lonne and Vr-
sin.

This was the substance of the quarell: The Colonniois and Sauelles, stirred vp belike for the occupation which Iacques Count made of Iatour Mathias, had inuaded the places and territories of the Counts: and of the other part, the Vrsins (for the affinitie and coniunction of factions) took armes in their fauour: So that many boroughs and villages, being vsurped both by the one & other partie, they fought together at last with all their forces at the foote of Mottelle in the countrey of Tynoly, where, after a long and braue battell, the inflamed passion of the parties pushing them on no lesse then either regard of glory, or consideration of daunger of their estates, the Vrsins (whose armie contened two thousand footemen and eight hundred horsemen) were broken and put to the chafe, their enseignes lost, & Charles Vrsin taken prisoner, and of the side of the Colonniois was hurt Anthony Sauelle a Capitaine of nō small reputation, who dyed of his wound not many dayes after. After this successe of the battell, the Pope, seeming that commotions in the countrey so neare to Rome, were displeasing to him, made as though he would sollicite an accord, which, whilest he intertained in action (not with good meaning and faith, for he was disguised in all his doings) the Vrsins readdressed their armie with new supplies, and planted a campe afore Palombare, a principall town belonging to the Sauelles, which the Colonniois (who after the victorie had occupied many places of the Coñtes) prepared to rescue: But both the parties finding at lēgth the dissembled behauiours of the Pope, sometimes giuing courage to the Colonniois, and estoones comforting the Vrsins, and that he did but nourish the warre & giue them medicines to weaken them both, to the end he might with more facilitie oppresse them when their strengths were consumed, they came altogether to a parley (without the interposing of a third) at Tynoly, where, of the selues, they established an accord, by the which Charles Vth was set at libertie, the places taken in the controuersie restored to their proper owners, & the quarell for the Earledoms of Albe and Taillecouffe referred to the arbitration of king Federik, to whom the Colonnys were mercenarie soldiers.

These stormes thus resolved into calmes, and the quarels that earst caried apparant shewes of blood and murder, being now qualified by wisdom and temperance, there was not discerned in any part of Italie any tokens of warre; but about the countrey of Pyfa: wherein, albeit the Duke of Myllan had derennined in the beginning not to succour the Florentins openly, but to minister to their wants with secret aides of money: yet suffering his minde to be continually ouer ruled with passions of disdain and enuy, and not abstaining from words insolent and full of threats against the Venetians, he determined now to declare him selfe publikely, and to cut off all regards and considerations of things; denying euen then, passage to their bands and foldiers which marched to Pyfa by the way of Parma and Pontrema, and put them in necessitie to passe by the Duke of Ferraraes countrey, a way of far more trauell and greater trouble: he wrought so that the Emperour commaunded all those Embassadors which were resident in his Court (except the Spanish) to returne home, reuoking them all within few dayes after except the Embassador for the Senat of Venice. He sent also to the succour of the Florentins three hundred shot with crossebow, & contributed to the leuying of three hundred men at armes partly vnder the Lord of Plombyn, and some vnder Iohn Paule Bailon: he lent them at sundry times more then three hundred thousand ducats, and lastly made continuall offers of greater aides, if their necessities so required. Besides all these, he made great instance to the Pope (the importunities of the Florentins greatly inducing him) to ayde them in some sort. The Pope knowing how hurtfull and intollerable it would be to the estate of the Church, that the Venetians should preuaile to make a foundation of Pyfa, promised to furnish them with a hundred men at armes, & the three gallies which were in his pay vnder Captaine Ville Marine, & they to giue impediments to the prouisions of victuals that should enter Pyfa by sea. But afterwards (being familiar to him to protract and delay) he deferred with diuerse excuses to send to them any proportion, and in the end refused them with open deniall, for that drawing dayly more and more into other deuises and thoughts, he made his resolution to restraine him selfe only to the French king, by whose meanes he hoped to obtaine no small nor common recompences: yea (it is oftentimes the property of men to make easie with will and hope, that which in reason and wisdom they know to be hard) he ascended in weening to the crowne and kingdome of Naples. It was almost a thing fatall, that the refusing of the alliañte which the king of Aragon made to the Pope, should breede in him the beginning of new things and chaunges: for long before he had wholly determined to ioyne him selfe with the French king, he had made great instance to king Federike to giue to the Cardinall of Valence (who was resolved to forsake the habit and profession of the Church vpon the first occasion) his daughter in marriage, with the principallie of Tarent in dowry, wherein he perswaded him selfe, that if his sonne (whose wit was subtle and hart hawty, and rayfed) were once become Lord of so large & generall a member of the kingdome of Naples, that then there would be litle difficultie (hauing the colour of a daughter descending of the king) to take occasions, what by force and strength, and what by the authoritie and rights of the Church; to dispoyle his father in law of the kingdome; both weake in men of warre, and poore in money, and from whom also were estraunged the affections of the Barons. This matter was hoatly furthered and fauoured by the Duke of Myllan, who debated with king Federike (by his Embassador the Marquis Stampe sent specially to Rome and Naples) how daungerous it would be for him, if the Pope (made frustrat of this ) went suddenly to ioyne with the French king: And withall he preferred to the kings remembrance how much it would sauour of pusillanimitie and indiscreffion (specially the matter concerning wholly his safetie) to put in consiration indignitie onely, and not to haue so much rule ouer him selfe, as to preferre the protection of his estate, afore his proper will: But Federike fearing that in this fitteltie of Lodowike was layd the foundation of his ruine, refused the plot with continuall obstinacie, confessing that the alienation or estraunging of the Pope was a degreeto put his kingdome in daunger, but he stood assured that to giue his daughter with the principallie of Tarent to the Cardinall of Valence, were to put his life in daunger, & therefore in two perils he had rather to abide the hazard of that which he might runne into with most honour and honestie, and which proceeded not of any fault or error of him selfe. By this meane, the Pope turning wholly his minde to ioyne with the French, and desiring that the Venetians would do the like, (whom he was loth to offend) abstained altogether to minister any fauours or succours to the Florentins: whose receiuing courage by the ready succours of the Duke of Myllan, and for the recommendation of the valour of Paule Vitelli their new Capitaine, forgot nothing that might aduance the enterprise, notwithstanding they esteemed it of very hard action: for that besides the numbers, experience, and resolute courage of the Citizens and countrey men of Pysa, there was within Pysa, a strength of the Venetians of foure hundred men at armes, eight hundred estradiots, and more then two thousand footemen: They were also (as occasion required) ready to refurnish them with stronger succours, for that euen such as at the beginning had no will to consent to accept the protection of the Pysans, were now no lesse ready then the rest to support their quarrell for the regard of common honour: The contract made in common by Lodowike and the Florentins, gaue such an increase to the armie, that it seemed now to cary proportion sufficient not onely to recouer all the places within the countrey of Pysa, but also to make a wonderfull industrie that the neighbours should forbear to giue aide and fauour to the Pysans, or at least eschewing the example of the Venetians, not molest any more the Florentins in other places: Lodowike hauing afore he determined to protest him selfe openly, entertained in common with the Venetians, Iohn Bentynole with two hundred men at armes, laboured him so much, that he bound him with the state of Bologna, to him selfe onely: wherein the better to confirme Bentynole, the Florentins tooke into their pay, Alexander his sonne: And to make a more generall resistance against the Venetians, making inuasion on the side of Romagnia, (who for such a purpose had taken into their protection the Lord of Faenza) the Florentins won also to their appointments and deuotion, together with fiftie men at armes, Ottavian de Riare, Lord of Ymola and Furly, who was gouerned according to the direction and will of Katherine Sforce his mother: She followed without any regard, the faction of Lodowyk and the Florentins, many occasions mouing her, but principally for that she was married to Iohn de Medicis, whom the Duke of Myllan (nothing liking of the gouernment popular) laboured to make great at Florence, & also his brother Lodowyk had no small credit with the people of Lucques, whom he solicited with all his authoritie and meanes, not to comfort any more the Pysans with those properties of succours & fauours which they had accustomed to minister to them: which request albeit they did not obserue so fully as he required, yet they withdrew and abstained from many helpes for his regard. There remained onely they of Genes & Sienna ancient enemies to the Florentins, hauing equall occasions of controuersie against that state: the one for the interest of Montpulcian, & the other by reason of the countrey of Lunigiana. Touching the Siennnoys, it was a thing much to be feared, least being made blind with hate, and enuie they fell not into their ancient error, in giuing to euery one commoditie to trouble and molest the Florentins by the oportunitie of their lands and estates, such sufferance sometimes not being without their proper damage. And for the Genoways, albeit by reason of ancient iniuries, it greeued them not a litle, that the Venetians should be maisters ouer Pysa, yet (in that Citie there is litle care of the common weale) they gaue sufferance to the Pysans and vessels of the Venetians to exercise a traffike in their riuers & streames, in regard of priuate gaine which some particulars got by it, by the which the Pysans receiued many great comodities: For these respects, and also by the counsell of Lodowyk still soliciting, the Florentins sent Embassadours to Genes and Sienna, to solicit (the rather by his meanes) an accord and finall resolution of all their quarels: But as touching the Genoways, the practise and negociation was frustrate, and brought forth no effect, for that they demanded to be acquitted frankly of Serezana without giuing other recompence then a simple promise to bereaue the Pysans of all oportunities and commodities of their countrey: wherein the Florentins making conference of the qualitie of the demaund, found the losse so present and certaine, in regard of the profit so incertaine and litle, that they refused to buy so dearely their friendships.

But whilest these deuises occupied the reasons and mindes of men in diuerse places, the Florentine armie, more mighty in horsemen then strong in footemen, aduanced into the field vnder their new generall: By meanes whereof, as the Pysans, whose estradiots since the victory of S. Recall had made incursions at pleasure ouer the whole countrey, retired from Pour de sac where they last incamped: So Paule Vitelli hauing taken Calcinaia, and setting his armie there in expectation of new strength of footemen, bestowed one day one part of his soldiers in ambush near to Cascina, whither the regiment of the Venetians were retired, who gouerned by Marke Marsimenguo were not onely without obedience, but without order: in so much as when Paule Vitelli gaue the charge to the, he slue many of the stradiots, with Iohn Gradania Captaine ouer men at armes, & tooke prisoner Franque Coronell of the stradiots, with the pray of an hundred horses. The successe of this encounter much amazed the companies of the Venetians; and therefore supposing Cascina not sufficient for their safetie, they retired to the borough of S. Marke, expecting new succours to come from Venice: But Paule Vitelli, after he was refurnished with his strength of footemen, and making as though he would assaile Cascina (which the Pyfans beleueed by many apparances) turned his march, and beguling the coniectures of the enemies, passed ouer the riuer of Arne, and pitched his campe before the borough of Buri, hauing sent afore, three hundred footemen to keepe occupied the hills and frontier places: And hauing drawne thither with the strength and working of a number of Pioners, the artillerie by the way of the mountaine (not without great difficultie for the troublesome wayes) he tooke the towne by force the second day after he had braked his artillerie. Paule made choise of this enterprise, for that he iudged that Pyfa, (in the which was an incredible obstinacie aswell of the inhabitants as others retired out of the countrey, in whom by long vse was great sufficiencie touching actions of warre) could not be taken by force, the Citie of it selfe being proud in strength of wals and rampiers; and hauing within it many bands of the men at armes of Venice: he held it an action of better pollicie, to deuile rather to languish and consume them, then to execute and enforce them, and setting the warre in that part of the countrey which is on the right hand of the riuer of Arne, he esteemed it a good counsell in warre to lay plots to take the peeces in that quarter, and to commaund all those places by whose helpe & oportunitie, he might giue impediment to the succours that might come to them by land from any forreine countrey: And therefore after the taking of the borough of Buri, hauing raised a mount or fort vpon the mountaines which be aboute S. Iohn de la Vene, he drew his campe right afore the fort which the Pyfans had made neare to Vicopisan, drawing thither his artillerie with the same difficulties he did before: and taking almost in one season Valdecalcio, and building aboute Vico in a place called Pietro Dorloso, another bastillion, to keepe that no succours enter there, he held besieged the castel of Verrucola. In these pollicies of this new generall, to the end the Pyfans (doubting that he would assaile Labrafatta and Valdeserale,) might be less ready to be farre from Pyfa, the Count Rinuccio was incamped with other companies at Valdimenoli. All which notwithstanding, foure hundred footme issuing out of Pyfa, brake all the regiment of footemen which were negligently bestowed in the Church of S. Michael to keepe Verrucola besieged: But Paule Vitelli, after he had got the bastillion, which yielded vpon condition to cary their artillerie to Vicopisan, encamped afore Vicopisan, not on that side where the Florentin campe was when he was within to defend it, but he lay towards S. Iohn de la Vene, to giue impediments to the succours that were to come from Pyfa. After the furie of his artillerie had brought downe to the earth a great quantitie of the wals, the defendants, despairing belike of rescue, rendred the place, their life and goods saued. They were perhaps, discouraged to hold out to the vttermost, for that Paule when he tooke Buri (to giue terrour to others) cut off the hands of three Cannoniers Germanians which were within the towne, and vsed his victorie with many cruelties. Immediately after the successe of Vicopisan, there followed another occasion of happy exploite, for that the bands which were within Pisa supposing it would be very easie to surprise the bulwarke of Pietro Dorloso, they sent thither afore day, two hundred light horsemen, with many troupes of footemen, who finding a stronger resistance then they looked for, lost more time then the action of their enterprise required: in so much that whilst they were giuing the assault, the generall of the Florentins, discouering him selfe vpon the mountaines thereabouts, and with part of the armie descending to succour the fort, sent Vitellietze with the residue of the bands to giue impediment to their returne: against whom as they entertained skirmish in the plaine towards Calcy, the generall fell vpon them on the backes, and put them to flight, not without the losse of many horsemen; and the most part of their footebands.

rendred.

But in this discourse and euent of things, the Florentins hauing some likely aduertisements from the Duke of Ferrara and others, that the Venetians were not without a willing inclination to peace, whereunto they would be more easily induced, if in the action (as belonged to the dignitie and respect of so great a common weale) they proceeded with tokens and demonstrations as though they negociated not with equals, but with a state of more greatnesse: They sent as Embassadours to Venice to sound their intentions Guido Antonio Vesputcio & Bernard Rucellai, two of the most honorable Citizens of their common weale: A matter from the which they had abstained till that time, partly for that they would not offend the minde of king Charles; but more for that as they knew themselves not to be strong enough to oppresse the Pisani, so they iudged that their petitions would be vnprofitable, being not accompanied neither with reputation nor forces: but now that they were the stronger in the field, and that the Duke had publicly declared him self against the Venetians, their hopes were greater then their doubts, to find some conuenient meanes of honorable composition. The Embassadours were receiued with great office and reuerence, and immediatly brought into counsell, the Duke sitting and the whole resort of Senatours, in whose presence after they had formed many excuses for not sending Embassadours to them afore, the same being refrained for many regardes proceeding of the qualitie of times, and sundry accidents of their Citie: they required frankly that they would abstaine from the defence and protection of Pisa, a request whose moderation put them in hope not to be denied, seeing that both in the common weale of Florence, had bene found no occasions of offence or displeasure to them, and also, according to the rumour & recommendation that went of the equitie of the Senate of Venice, they hoped they would not in this case abandon iustice, which being the pillar and foundation of all other vertues, it was but reasonable to preferre it afore all other respects. To these the Duke made answer; that as they could not charge the Florentins with any trespasse or iniuries in these times, so also the Senate was not entred into the protectiō of Pisa for any desire to offend them, but for that the Florentines onely, hauing supported in Italie the factions of the French, meere and simple regardes to the common profit and safetie, had induced all the Potentates of the League to giue faith to the Pisani, to helpe them to defend their libertie: wherein, though some others of the residue did fall into the error of forgetfulness after they had giuen their faith: yet the custome of others should breede no law in them; and much lesse contrary to the vse of their common weale, would follow them in a matter so vnworthy: Onely if the state of Florence would propound some meane, by the which the libertie of the Pisani might be preserued, they would make knowne to all the world, that neither for their generall ambition, nor for their particular or proper profite, they haue thus long continued the defence of Pisa. Vpon this answer, they drew certaine dayes to disputation vpon some meane which might leaue satisfied both the one and other parties, wherein some contention rising, for that neither the Venetians nor the Florentin Embassadours would propound the meane, they agreed that the Embassador of Spaine, who encouraged them to the agreement, should interpose betweene them: this was the meane he opened, that the Pisani should returne to the deuotion of the Florentins, not as subiectes, but as people recommended, and vnder the same capitulations which had bene agreed vpon at Pistoia, as a thing indifferent betweene seruitude and libertie. But the Venetians answered, that they could not acknowledge any part of libertie in a Citie wherein the fortresses and administration of the lawes were in the power of others: by reason whereof the Embassadours of Florence interpreting this answer to a deniall of their demaundes, departed from Venice, with this coniecture, that the Senate, vnlesse they were compelled by necessitie, would not abandon the defence of Pisa, whither they sent supplies of soldiers continually: besides, they had in the beginning no great feare of the enterprise of the Florentins, for that deferring the action till the most part of the spring was past, they could not long keepe the field, the countrey of Pisa, by reason of his basenes & lownesse, being much subiect to waters. And lastly hauing of new taken to their pay vnder the Duke of Vrbino (to whom they gaue the title of gouernour) and vnder certaine other Captaines, fise hundred men at armes, being holpen with all with diuerse good intelligences: they had determined, (the more easily to turne the Florentins from offending the Pisani) to begin the warre in another place, ioyning to their plots the oportunitie of Peter de Medicis, at whose perswasions they entertained into their pay Charles Vrsin and Bart. Aluiane with two hundred men at armes: They were also without hope, to be able to induce Iohn Bentiuole to consent that they might make warre vpon the Florentins on the side of Bolognia, for that the Duke of Myllan (stirred belike for that in the retaining which was made by Annyball his sonne, the Venetians were preferred before him, and ioyning to that new offence a recodation of old iniuries done against him, as he sayd, when the Duke of Calabria passed into Romagnia) had occupied certaine Castels which belonged to the Duchy of Myllan, & possessed by right of

of dowrie, by Alexander his sonne. For these causes albeit he forbore not to vex him vpon euery occasion, yet the Castels being at last restored to him againe at the request of the Florentins, the deuile to make warre on that side, was broken: Therefore the Venetsians laboured to dispose them of Sienna to graunt that they might begin the warre in their quarters, wherein they grew into hope to prehaile (besides their ordinarie disposition against the Florentins) by a diuision that was in Sienna amongst the Citizens: for Pandolphe Petruccio with his wit and suttletie, hauing drawn to him selfe almost a speciall authoritie ouer the counsels & bugnesse of the Citie, Nicholas Borghefe his father in law and the familie of the Belantis, to whom his greatnesse was displeasing, laboured that passage might be graunted to the Duke of Vrbino & the Vrsins, who, with foure hundred men at armes, two thousand footemen, and foure hundred estradiots, were stayed by commission of the Venetsians at Fratte in the countrey of Perusse: They alledged also that to make truce with the Florentins according to the solicitation of the Duke of Myllan and continuall instance of Pandolphe, was no other thing, then to giue them oportunitie & meanes to dispatch the affaires of Pisa, which being resolued, they would be so much more mighty to bring iniuries and subiection vpon them and theirs: And therefore they ought (making their profite of occasions, as appertained to wise men) to be resolute in this, not to make other accord with them then a peace, which might make them giue ouer the right they pretended to Montpulcian, a graunt whereunto they knew the Florentins would neuer agree: And then it would follow by necessitie, that the demaundes of the Venetsians must be consented vnto, with whom hauing obtained the first place of grace, they hoped easily to embrace the authoritie of Pandolphe, who, hauing made himselfe authour of the contrarie opinion at the perswasion of the Duke of Myllan, found enough to do to maintaine it, for that the hatred which the people bare naturally to the Florentins could do much, & it was not vnlikely that by this feare, it might be brought to passe, that they would disclaime the right of Montpulcian. This couetousnesse accompanied with hatred, had more force then the considerations alledged by Pandolphe, either touching the trauels that would follow the warre, if it were drawn vpon their countrey, or in regard of daungers, which with time would afflict Tuscanie by the greatnesse of the Venetsians: for iustification whereof (saith he) we neede not haue recourse to the examples of others, seeing euen of late memorie, for fauouring the faction of Ferdinand king of Naples against the Florentins, they were in perill to fall into seruitude, if Ferdinand, for the occupation which Mahomet Ottoman made of the towne of Ossirante in the kingdome of Naples, had not bene compelled to call home from Sienna the person of Alphonso his sonne, and his regiment: And that their histories and traditions tell them (without these examples) that the same desire to offend the Florentins by the meane of the Earle of Verus, together with the disdain conceiued for the respect of Montpulcian, was the cause that of them selues, they had assubiected to him their proper countrey. These reasons, albeit they were true, yet not sufficient to repress the furie & affectiōs of the others, so that he was not without apparant daunger of some tumult to be raised by his aduersaries. Notwithstanding to preuent them, he caused suddenly to enter into Sienna, many of his friends thereabouts, by whom he wrought with so great courage and wit, that at the same instant, the Florentins sent to Poggi Imperiall three hundred men at armes and a thousand footemen, with whose reputation and force, confounding the audacitie of his aduersaries, he brought to passe a truce for five yeares with the Florentins who, preferring a seruile feare of perils present, afore regard to dignitie and honour, bound them selues to pull downe one part of the bridge of Valiane, and to dismantle euen to the earth, the bastillion which had so much molested the Siennoyes: they condescended further, that the Siennoyes within a certaine time, might build such fortes and fortresses as they would betweene the shoare and channell of Chianes, and the town of Montpulcian. By this accord Pandolphe, rising into a stomacke and greatnesse more then before, found meanes soone after to kill his father in law, who, with too liberall a disposition of minde, objected him self against his purposes: & so by the dispatch of him, increasing terrour to the residue, he confirmed him selfe dayly more and more in tyrannie. By this accord, the Venetsians, being depriued of the hope they had to diuert or turne by the way of Sienna, the Florentins from the enterprise of Pisa, and being not able to obtaine licence of the Perussins, to manage the warre by their countreys, they determined to vex them on that side to Romagna, hoping with the auncient fauours and factions which Peter de Medicis had there, to aspire easily to the occupation of those places which they held in the Appenine. In so much, that hauing obtained passage of the litle Lord of Faenza, by the vale of Lamone, with one part of their Regiment which they had in Romagna, with whom Peter and Iulian de Medici were ioyned: they occupied the borough of Maradi situate vpon the Appenine, on that side which lookes towardes Romagna, where was made against them no resistance, for that Demys of Nalde a man of the same vale, entertained by the Florentins with three hundred footemen to defend it, together with the strength of that Countrey, led thither so small a force of footemen, that he durst not abide there: by meanes whereof they incamped afore the rocke of Chassillon, built in a place about the sayd borough, which they hoped to cary, though by no other meane, yet by want of many things which they knew to be within it, but specially the lacke of water, & so by the oportunitie of that, to haue free way to passe into Mugelle, which is a countrey neare to Florence.

 Cota ~~~~ " But it is hard to assure any thing that depēds vpo the will of another, & much lesse can the wisdom of man warrant all those things which imagination & coniecture do suggest. So, they found themselves deceived in the iudgement of those wants which they supposed the Rocke did suffer, for that the constancie and diligence of the Castell keeper, supplied the slender prouisions of victuals that were within it, and the liberalitie of heauen auoyded the pēurie of water, raying so much in one night, as all the vessels and cisternes being full, they were deliuered from that paine: And in the meane while, the Count Rinucci with the Lord of Plombyn & other Capitaines, being stolne vpon the enemy by the way of Mugelle, enforced them to the chase, hauing vndertaken this enterpryse with a greater confidence in their diligence, then with sufficient strength. Besides, the Count Cajazza sent to Cotignole by the Duke of Myllan, with three hundred men at armes and a thousand footme, together with Fraoasse entertained by the same Duke, who was within Furly with a hundred men at armes, prepared to charge them vpo the backe. The consideration of these daungers, and to auoyde the harmes that threatned, they went and ioyned with the Duke of Urbyn then departed from the countrey of Perouse, and with othor Regiments of the Venetians, who altogether were bestowed betweene Ranenna and Furly, but with a very small hope of happy enterpryse, for that, besides the bandes of Florentins, there was in Romagna a strength of fise hundred men at armes, fise hundred crossebow shot, and a thousand footemen of the Duchy of Myllan, the impediment also which Imolga and Furly gaue to them, being of great importance.

But in this meane while Paule Vitelli, who after the taking of Vicopisan had remained there certaine dayes expecting prouisions necessarie that were to come, & continuing in one intention to cut from the Pysans the commoditie and meanes of succours, was gone to the enterpryse of Librafatta: And the easier to approach that part of the towne which was most weake, & to preuent the dispositiō of the enemy to inuade his armie much troubled with artillerie & cariage, he left the way which descends by the mountaines to the plaine of Pysa, and cutting by force of Pioners a new way through the mountaines, he tooke in his marching the same day, the bastillio of the Mont Maior, which the Pysans had built vpon the top of the mountaine, and so descended with great suretie into the plaine of Librafatta: where, hauing easily the day after, brought into necessitie to yeeld the bands of footemen that had the charge of Poriso & the old Castell, (two towers answering one another very neare Librafatta) he bestowed in the second tower and in other places, certaine peeces of artilleries to gouerne the towne, which was well manned and guarded, containing two hundred footemen of the Venetians: from these places he battered the wall both on high and below, and from the first day had hope to carie it: But after the wall was shaken with the artillerie, there fell by chaunce so great a part of it in the night, that the ruinous matter raised the rampier which was begun there about foure cubits: In so much as Paule, assaying in vaine three dayes together to mount vp by ladders, began to doubt much of the successe, the rather for that the armie receiued great harmes by a peece of artillerie which came from the towne by a low lowpe hole: But his industrie and vertue was aided by the benefite of fortune (without whose fauour great Capitaines are oftentimes deceived in their enterprises) for that with great shot out of the campe, the peece which beat them was broken, & one of the best Cannoniers within the place killed, the bullet passing through the towne: which accident so amazed those within the towne, being so commaunded by the artillerie of the second tower, that they durst not assemble to make head: but yeelded the fourth day, & not long after, the castell abiding some shot of the cannon, did the like: After the conquest of Librafatta, he deuised to make certaine bastillions vpo the hills thereabouts, but chiefly he erected one of capacitie to receiue great nūbers of men, about Santa Maria in Castello, called by the name of the mount, where was built the bastillion of la ventura commanding the the countrey thereabouts. This and Librafatta being garded, trobled all commodities that might come to Pisa by the way of Lucque and Petra sancta, and brought besides, generall distresses to the state of the common cause of Pisa.

In this variation and fortune of things, the Venetians ceased not to study means by the which they might minister comfort to Pisa, sometimes with immediate succours, and sometimes by diuerting and drawing away the forces of the enemy: wherein they hoped to preuaile the rather for the differences which happened between the Duke of Milan and the Marquis of Mantua, entred of new into the appointments and directions of the Duke: who because he would not take away the title of Captaine general ouer all his companies from Galeas de S. Senerin more great with him by fauor then by vertue: had promised to the Marquis to honour him within three moneths with the place of Captaine generall in common, either with the Emperour, or with the Pope, or with king Federike, or with the Florentins; which being not performed by Lodowike at the terme promised, Galeas giuing many impediments against it, and adding to the wrong, many other difficulties vpon the payments of his entertainments; the Marquis determined to reenter into the pay of the Venetians, who practised to send him to the succors of Pisa, with three hundred men at armes: whereof Lodowike hauing a liuely doubt, and dreading by the propertie of his wit (sounding the bottome of things) the daungers that might grow by the losse of a man of that importance, declared him immediatly by the consent of Galeas, captaine to the Emperour and to him. But such is the mutabilitie of men mercenarie, that as their profession is to liue by occasions and diuisions of times and Princes: so, oftentimes they interpret small faults to great causes of their reuolt & change, holding it no iniustice, to disappoint those that breake the first promise with the, according to the example of this Marquis, who hauing already bene at Venice, and communicated with the Senate the great confidence he had to enter Pisa in despite of the Florentine bands, was reentered into their pay: and receiuing part of his pay in prest, he returned to Mantua, preparing himselfe to the expedition; which he had further aduanced, and put his companies to march, if the Venetians had vied the same diligence to dispatch him, which they did to entertaine him: but because they began to proceed slowly vpon the occasion of a new hope they had, that by certaine ancient fauorers of the Medicis, they should be able to obtaine Bibiene, a borough in the countrey of Caentin, they were of opinion that in regard of the difficulties to passe to Pisa, it would be more profitable to diuert then to succour. The Marquis taking his aduantage of these delayes, and iustly displeased with the forme of their dealings, returned eftsloones to the pay of Lodowike with three hundred men at armes and an hundred light horsemen, vnder the honour and title of Captaine to the Emperour and to him, reteining the money he had receiued of the Venetians vpon an account or reckening of payes due of old. The practise which was debated with the Venetians, was not without suspicion to the Florentins, who, besides their generall meanes of aduertisement, had certain dayes before, a particular intelligence from Bologna. But it often hapneth, that diligent and wise counsels be vnprofitable when they are executed with negligence and indiscreffion: for the commissary or commissioner whom they sent thither to assure them from such a danger, after he had apprehended such as he doubted most, and bare apparant guiltinesse of the practise, turning his dissembled faith into true meaning, and their offence into innocencie, he set them eftsloones at libertie, and in other things was so negligent, that he made the action easie to Aluiano appointed for the execution of this practise: for he hauing sent before certaine horsemen attired like victuallers, and they marching all night, were at the gate by the point of day, which they wonne and occupied without difficultie, for that the negligence of the Commissarie had not onely left it without gard, but also not set order that the gate should be opened later then was wont in times nothing dangerous. After the first troupes, followed with a readie speed and diligence, other bands of horsemen, who named themselves by the warres to be of the regiments of Vitellus. Assoone as the gate was possessed by the souldiers forreine, the parties of the conspiracie, drawing to commotion in their fauour, they embraced immediatly the whole towne, & were absolute maisters of the enterprise: at what time they were also encouraged with the presence of Aluiano, who arriuing the same day, and albeit had but a small proportion of soldiers (his nature being alwayes to follow the ayde and benefit of occasions, yea to preuent them with his incredible diligence) yet he went suddenly to assaile Poppi, the principall borough of that valley, but finding a resistance aboue his strength, he deuised to occupie the places nearest to Bibiene, albeit but litle and of no great importance. Casentin, amid the which runneth the riuer of Arne, is a countrey narrow, barren, and full of hills, seated at the foote of the Alpes of Appennine, at that time laden with snowes, for that the spring was but then begun: neuerthelesse it had bene a passage verie commodious to go to Florence, if the enterprise of Poppy had succeeded well to Aluiano, and no lesse conuenient to make entrie into the countreys of Aretze and Valdarno, countreys which for the plentie of great townes & boroughs, were of great importance to the estate of the Florentines: who taking occasion of the present perill, not to be negligent, reformished with a readie speed, all places needfull, breaking by that means the execution of a conspiracie pretended in Aretze: And studying about all other things to cut from the Venetians all meanes of new succours and supplies to the countrey of Casentin, they called from Pysa the Count Riunccio, & dispatched him speedily to occupy the wayes of the Appennin betweene Valdibagna and the strait of S. Stephen: who, albeit he disposed his regiment into troupes and companies as the nature of the place and present seruice required, yet was both their strength and industrie vnprofitable to let the Duke of Urbino, Charles Ursin and other Captaines from passing, whose strength in the sayd valley being seuen hundred men at armes, and six thousand foote men, with some bands of Lanck knights, commaunded all the countrey of Casentin, except a very few places, and eftsloones gaue a new life to the old enterprise to take Poppy: but their diligence was vnprofitable, and the whole action in vaine: By meanes whereof, the Florentins were compelled (according to the proper intention of the Venetians) to call backe from the affaires of Pysa, Paule Vitelli with his bands, leauing sufficient guard in the places of importance, and also in the bastillion of Laurentura. His comming into the countrey Casentin, caused to retire the Venetians, who were remoued to incampe the same day about Pratto Vecchio, and Fraccasse being ioyned with him (sent by the Duke of Myllan with five hundred men at armes & five hundred foote men in fauour of the Florentins) he brought presently into hard termes and difficulties the state of the enemies, who were disperfed into diuerse places, both for the incommoditie of the countrey, which was strait and narrow, and also for that (to the end they might haue free entry and going out of the countrey Casentin) they were compelled to keepe the wayes of Vernia, Chiusa, and Montalona, places very high vpon the Alpes: By which meane, being inclosed in that valley in a season very sharpe, they were without all expectation of aduauncement either there, or in any other place, the Count Riunccio being within Aretze with two hundred men at armes: And in the countrey Casentin, the enterprise of Poppy not succeeding in the beginning, and the name of the Medici bearing no further power or authoritie, for that the spirites and affections of the men of the countrey were against them, they had receiued many harmes of the paissants afore the comming of Vitelli. In which regard, together with an assured intelligence of his comming, and the marching of Fraccasse, they sent backe beyond the Alpes, one part of their cariage and attillerie, & drew them selues all together into one strength as the nature of the place would suffer. Against whom Paule Vitelli determined to vse his custome, which was (to carie the victory with more ease and surety) to beare no regard neither to the longnesse of time, nor to great paines & trauell, & much lesse to expences, esteeming it a better office in a generall, to proceede with all necessarie prouisions, then, for a desire of glory to make the victorie speedy, to put in perill the issue of things, and the whole armie in hazard. In so much as (touching the countrey Casentin) his counsell was, not to attempt suddenly any action vpon the places most strong, but in the beginning to make the enemye abandon the peeces most weake, and close the wayes of the Alpes and the straits of the countrey, with bastillions, guards, & intrenched wayes, with fortifications, both to cut off all succours and supplies, and to take from them all meanes of mutuall aides and rescue from one place to another: hoping that this forme and manner of proceeding would in the end breede occasions to oppresse them further, besides that the great numbers that were within Bybienna could not but consume, both by the incommoditie of horsemen and want of victuals. With this counsell, hauing recouered certaine places neare to Bybienna, for their qualitie but of small importance, but for their commodities very proper for his intention (with the which he looked in the end to preuaile) and winning euery day more & more, he stripped euery day many men at armes bestowed in diuerse peeces neare to Bybienna: And to cut off all wayes from the bands of the Venetians assembling beyond the mountes to minister rescue to their peoples, he deuised to command all the places about the mount la Vernia, & to intrench all the wayes thereabouts. In so much as many difficulties increasing to the enemies, together with necessities and want of victuals, many of them refused the campe, who stealing

away by sundry wayes, fell euery day into chaunge of distresse and fortune, sometimes vexed with troubleſome paſſages: and ſometime ſtripped by the paiſants, and oftentimes ſlaine by the ſoldiers. Theſe were the actions of armes betwene the Venetians and Florentins.

Now in theſe times, albeit the Embaſſadours of Florence, were departed from Venice without any hope of accord, yet was there holdē at Ferrara, a new practiſe of compoſition, moued by the Duke of Ferrara at the inſtance of the Venetians: Amongſt whom many of thoſe which held the greateſt authoritie in that Senat, no leſſe weary of the warre drawing with it increaſe of expences and difficulties, then now to be voyde of all hopes to preuaile further in the countrey of Casentum, deſired to ſhake off the ſtudies and trauels they ſuffered for the defence of Piſa, the cares and charges of that warre being greater without compariſon, then the commodities or fruits of the ſeruice, in which regard they were ready to omit no occaſion which might miniſter any honeſt colour to be diſcharged of it.

But whileſt the regions of Italie were in theſe afflictions for the quarels of Piſa, the new French king forgot not to make preparations to execute the conqueſt of Myllan the yeare following: Wherein he hoped to haue in his fauour and on his ſide the friendſhip of the Venetians, who; carried with an incredible hate againſt the Duke of Myllan, held ſtrait negociation with his maieſtie. No leſſe did ſolicite with the king in no litle ſecrecie & earneſtneſſe the Pope, who, excluded from the alliance of Federike, and embracing ſtill the deſire to the kingdome of Naples, was wholly conuerted into the hopes of the French, by whoſe meanes he ſought to obtaine for his ſonne the Cardinall of Valence, Charlotta, daughter to Federike, who was not yet married, but trained vp in the Court of France: Wherein the king nourishing him with ſome tokens of hope, for that he ſuppoſed the power ouer her marriage reſted in his maieſtie, the Cardinall (ioyning with the intention of his father) entred one morning into the conſiſtorie, and with an action in ſpeech and geſture farre from the office and modeſtie of his profeſſion, beſought his father and the whole colledge of Cardinals, that ſeeing he entred not into Prieſthood of his proper will and diſpoſition, that they would make it lawfull to him, to leaue the dignitie and the habite, to follow the exerciſe whereunto his deſtinie and inclination drew him. This requeſt being made eaſie in the Cardinals by purchaſe and corruptiōs, was not denied of his father, whoſe authoritie going with the infected partialities of the Cardinals, made his demaund lawfull, and ratified it: And ſo reſuming the habite of a perſon ſecular, he prepared ſpeedily to go into Fraunce, by whom the Pope ſent this comfort and promiſe to the king, to make it lawfull by the authoritie Apoſtolike to reſuſe his wife: And the king, for his part, became bound to ayde him (aſſoone as he had cōquered the Duchy of Myllan) to reduce into the obedience of the holy ſea, all the townes poſſeſſed by the Vickars of Romagna, and withall, to giue him preſently thirty thouſand ducats, vnder this colour, that he was conſtrained to intertaine a greater force for the guard of his perſon: as though to knit him ſelf with the French king were to ſtirre vp many of the Potentates in Italie to ſeek to hurt & oppreſſe him. For the executiō of theſe couenants, both the king began to make payment of the money, and the Pope committed the action of the diuorce to the Biſhop of Setto his Nuncio, and the Archbiſhops of Paris and Roan. And albeit in the trauerſe of the cauſe, the kings wife impugned the iudgement: yet in the end, holding for no leſſe ſuſpected the conſciences of the Iudges, then the might and greatneſſe of her aduerſarie, ſhe tooke comfort in her innocencie & diſclaimed her ſute, receiuing for the entertainment of her perſon, the Duchy of Berry, with thirtie thouſand frankes of reuenuē: and ſo the diuorce confirmed by ſentence of the Iudges, there reſted nothing elſe expected, for the diſpenſing and accompliſhing of the new marriage, but the comming of Caſar Borgia, lately of a Cardinall and Archbiſhop of Valence, become a ſoldier & Duke of Valentinois: the king hauing giue him a companie of an hundred Launces and twenty thouſand frankes penſion: and for his title of Dukedome he indued him with Valence a Citie of Dauphine, with twentie thouſand frankes of reuenuē: he embarked at Oſtia upon the galleys which the king ſent him, and arriued about the ende of the ſame yeare at the French Court, where he entred with a pompe and pride incredible, and brought with him the Cardinals hat for George Amboiſe Archbiſhop of Roan: who, hauing alwayes afore, participated in the daungers and fortunes of the king, held with him great authoritie, grace, and reputation. This new Duke albeit he was receiued of the king with great honour and all other offices of Court, yet his maner of dealing was not well liked in the beginning, for that, according to the direction & counſell of his father he denied that he had brought with him the Bull of diſpenſation, ho-hoping that the desire to obtaine it would make the king more easie to assist his plots & purposes, then would do the remembrance that he had receiued it, vsing this reason, that there is nothing endureth so small a time as the memorie of benefits receiued, and the more great they be, the more commonly are they recompensed with ingratitude. But the bishop of Sessa reuealing the truth secretly to the king, who making it sufficient to Godward, that the Bull was dispatched and justified, consummated the mariage openly with his new wife, without making more demaunds for the Bull: the same being the cause that the Duke could no longer keepe from him the Bull autentike and justified: and finding out after by suttile inquirie, that the Bishop of Sessa had reuealed the matter, he caused him soone after by secret meanes to die of poison, the vnfortunate bishop not remembring that in matters of great estate betweene princes, he that discloseth his secret to another, worketh to himselfe the occasion of his death. The king being now in some stabilitie of minde by his new mariage, began to be carefull to renew leagues and amities with his neighbours, making presently a firme peace with the king of Spaine, who, bearing now no more regard to the things of Italy, called home all his Embassadors remaining there, except him that lay resident with the Pope, and readiourned Consaluo into Spaine with all his regiment, leauing to Federike all those peeces in Calabria which he had holden till that day: he had a great deale more trouble to accord with the king of Romains, who was newly descended in Burgundy by occasion of some commotions stirring there, being for that expedition, ayded with a round summe of money by the Duke of Millan, in whom preuailed much this kinde of perswasion, that either the warre which he should make vpon the French king, would turne him from the enterprise of Italy, or at least, if any agreement succeeded betweene them, he should be comprehended in it as the king of Romains had assuredly promised him. But at last, after much discourse of reasonings and meetings, the king made a newe peace with the Archduke, by the which were to be rendred vnto him the places of the countrey of Artois, a thing which to the end it might bring effect and profit to his sonne, the king of Romains consented to make truce with him for many moneths, without making mention of the Duke of Millan, against whom he seemed at that time much discontented, for that he had not alwayes satisfied his infinite demaunds of money. Lastly, the French king, ratifying the peace made with the king of England by his predecessor, reiected all solicitations and sutes made to him to receiue the Duke of Millan to any composition, who for his part albeit he protested large offers and offices, & vsed no lesse corruptions to induce him, yet all his industries and practises were vaine in the kings sight, who to lay a more sure foundation of the war pretended, sought how he might at one time, tie to him in suertie of amitie the Venetians and Florentines, and therefore he required with great importunities that ceassing to vex the Pisans, the Venetians would put Pisa into his hands: whereunto the rather to draw the Florentines to consent, he offered secretly to restore it to them within a short time. This practise being found full of many difficulties, & concurring in it diuerse ends and interests, was for many moneths debated with delayes: for that the Florentines (holding it necessary, that in that case they should make alliance with the French king, and fearing by the remembrance of the infidelity of Charles, the present businesse should suffer no lesse breach of promise in the king raigning) could not agree amongst themselves, nor consent in vnitie of opinion & counsell: wherein one reason of their disagreement was, that their City was vnquietly tossed betweene the ambition of the greatest Rulers, and the vnbridled liberty of the gouernment popular, and being reapposed (by reason of the warre of Pisa) vpon the Duke of Millan, the whole Citie was fallen into such generall diuision, that it was hard to deliberate in peace and quiet vpon matters of importance, some of the principall citizens desiring the victory to the French king, and others of the contrary, bearing their whole affections to the Duke of Millan. The Venetians also, notwithstanding all other difficulties had bene overcome which might hinder the accord, had yet determined not to consent to put Pisa into a third hand, hoping that for the regard of the repayment of their charges, & to leaue Pisa with lesse dishonor, they should obtaine better conditions in the negociation that was holden at Ferrara, which was vehemently solicited by Lodowike, both for feare least the deputation of Pisa falling to the French, both those common-weales would knit with the king: and also hoping that the controuersie being accorded for the profit of Italy, the Venetians would shake off & leaue there the malice they had to hurt him: which respects and consideration together with the practise that continued at Ferrara, displeased not a litle the French king: like as also the Pope, to make his profit of the trauels of others, sought indirectly to hinder it: for that standing in great place of credit and fauour with the king so farre as concerned the affaires of Italy, he hoped that making Pysa to diuolue by deputation to the king, he should in some sort participate with a plentiful share.

But as in matters of enterprise, wise-men will debate all things at large, and by how much the cause is weightie and may nourish occasion of many accidents and fortunes, by so much it concerneth the reputation of magistrates and counsellors, not onely to looke into the generall estate and nature of the businesse, but to examine euery particular circumstance with a full discourse of reason, wisdom, & foresight: euen so in these actions of practise and intelligences, they consulted at Venice, whether, if the king missed of his demaund for the deputation whereupon they had determined neuer to consent, they might enter confederation with him touching the warre against the Duke of Myllan, as the king with great importunitie had solicited, and offered them for the reward of the victory the city of Cremona and all Guinaradadda: an offer, which albeit was greatly desired of the all with no small ambition, yet the deliberation seemed to some of them to cary so many respects & considerations of importance, & that the power of a french king in Italy but could not bring daunger to their estate, that the matter was brought into the counsell of the Pregati (the chiefeest assemblie amongst them) & there was disputed with no small diuersitie of opinions and reasons: Amongst whom, one day wherein the last resolution should be set downe, Anthony Grymany, a man for his authority much reuerenced, and for his wisdom no lesse respected, perswaded the residue of the Senate in this sort.

It is (my Lords) in the disposition of men, a custome vile and odious, to forget what they haue receiued of their friends, euen when they were at point to fall into their full ruine and desolation: but it is an vnthankfulnesse, too intollerable, and euen slanderous to nature and all naturall office, to requite benefites with iniuries, and make recompence to the merits & good wils of men, with conspiracies and harmes stretching to the spoyle of those by whose helps and ministrations they were earst preserued. And as in cases of harmes and domages, there is no man that can tell how sweete is the passion of reuenge, better then he that hath receiued the hurt: so, the despite of the iniurie drawing with it a desire of reuenge, I can not thinke that it is any iniustice to be reuenged of him that hath done the first wrong. If therefore (my Lords) you well consider the greatnesse of the good turnes which the Duke of Myllan hath receiued of our common weale, by the which in these later yeares, his whole estate hath receiued his whole protection and preseruacion: and of the contrary, looke thoroughly into the parts of his ingratitude trayning many grosse iniuries done to vs, to compels vs to abandon the defence of Pysa, whereunto he gaue vs the first suggestion & encouragement: I doubt not, but making a right collection of his dealings & behauiours past, you will iudge against his corrupt properties and conditions, & so not thinke it vnecessary to be reuenged of him, that hath not thought it dishonest to requite our friendships and well meaning, with iniuries and actions of conspiracie. There can not happen a greater infamy to this common weale, then by the tolleracion of so many apparant wrongs, to expresse to all the world that we are come to degenerat from the magnanimity of our elders, with whom this was an auncient and settled custome, that as often as they were discontented with offences, they neuer refuse to embrace any perill or daunger, to preserue the dignity, reputation, & honour of the name of the Venetians: and not without reason: for that the deliberations of common weales require not regards and ends abiect and priuate, and much lesse that all their counsels and actions stand only vpon respects to profite. But it is also conuenient that they aspire to ends more excellent and honourable, by the which may be increased their glory, & their reputation preserued: A matter which nothing makes so soone to be lost and defaced, as when there is occasion giuen to the world to thinke that there is neither valour, vertue, nor abilitie, to be touched with the remembrance of iniuries receiued, nor no readinesse shewed to be reuenged: an action not a litle necessary, not so much for the sweetnesse & pleasure in the reuenge, as for that the iustice and punishment of the offender, breeds such example to others, that they will haue lesse courage to attempt the like: of such consequence is that glory which is found to be ioyned with vtilitie, high and honourable deliberations alwayes declaring themselves full of commodities & profits. Thus one displeasure takes away from men many others, and often times, by one onely and short punishment, they are found to be deliuered from many and very long paynes. And yet if we consider the estate of the affaires of Italy, and the disposition of many great Princes against vs, together with the ambushes which Lodowyk Sforze dresseth continually against vs, we may knowe, that we are ledde to this deliberation, no

Naples:

Naples: So that the perils which may fall vpon vs at any time after the victorie of the French king, are neither so certaine, nor of such nature, as for the auoyding of them, we neede to remayne in a daunger present and of great consequence. And to reiect (for feare of daungers to come and vncertaine) so large and conuenient a part of the Duchie of Myllan, could not but merit imputation of pusillanimity & faintnesse of courage: A thing reprochfull euen in men priuat, but much more infamous to a common weale more mighty in glory, riches, and reputation, then euer was any (except the Romaine estate) in any part of the world. There happen seldome so fauourable and fit occasions, which being transitorie & fleeting, it is an office in wisdom & magnanimity to embrace them when they be offered. A wit curious & standing too long in considering of things to come, is often hurtfull and reproveable: for that the things of the world are subiect to so many and sundry accidentes, that rarely doth that come to passe which the wisdom of man seemes to haue fore-seene, & imagined would happen: and he that leaueth the benefit present, for feare of the daunger to come (if the perill be not certaine and neare at hand) findes himselfe to haue lost oftentimes (to his slaunder and displeasures) occasions full of profit and glory, and all for standing in feare of daungers which afterwarde turne to nothing. It is no great matter to suffer a mischief when we are sure of the remedie, and in this case, if there be any mischief other then such as we may discern before, which is neuer so greuous as when it chaunceth vpon the sodayne: yet I haue borne alwayes this iudgement, that that aduersity is honourable which brings with it prosperity, glory, and reputation. For these reasons (my Lordes) I wish vs to accept the confederation against the Duke of Myllan, for that it puts vs in iuertie for the present, protectes vs against all daungers to come, breedes our credite with all other Potentates, and offreth vs the possession of those great things, which another time we would be glad to get with intollerable expences and trauels, as well for their proper importance, as for that they be lynes to leade vs to high & honourable actions, drawing with them a meruellous augmentation of the glory and Empire of this flourishing common weale.

This counsell and forme of reasoning made no small impression in the minds of the others, who heard his reasons with iudgement, and fauoured his opinion, recommending much the liuely valour of his spirit, accompanied with a resolute loue to his countrey: Against him stood vp and reasoned Melchior Tremisan, singular for his wisdom, & excellent in all graces and gifts of the mind.

This hath bene alwayes (touching offences and wronges) a wise obseruation in countreys and common weales well gouerned, to make true conference betweene the nature and estate of the iniuries, and oportunities to reuenge: not that those wise-men heheld altogether the proprietie and manners of the wrongs, (for that belongs to passion) but withall they vled to foresee whether the hurt in reuenging would not exceed the harmes already happened by the trespass committed, a forme of dealing which caried not their affections afore their wisdoms, but bridling the readinesse of nature, they oftentimes found more security to dissemble any iniury then to reuenge it. And albeit it can not be denied that the iniuries done by Lodowik Sforce to our common weale, are many and great, and offend much our dignity: yet, by how much they are great, and by their property offend our reputation, by so much more belongs it to our wisdom to moderate our iust anger with maturity of iudgement & consideration of the publike interest & benefit: for that, for men to commaund ouer themselues and vanquish their proper passions, is so much the more commendable, by how much lesse often it happeneth in vse, and by how much more iust are the occasions that kindle that anger or any other humane affection. And therefore (my Lordes) it appertaineth to this Senate to the which is ascribed of all other nations the true parts of wisdom & discreffion, & who not long since made profession to haue deliuered Italy from the french: it is our office I say to consider well not onely of the infamy that will rise, if now through our occasion they prepare their returne, but also to looke carefully into the daungers that may threaten vs if the Duchy of Myllan fall into the power of the French King: perils which if we can not consider of our selues, let vs call to memory what feares were brought vpon vs by the conquest which the late King Charles made of Naples, of whom we held not our selues assured, but when we conspired against him almost with all Princes Christians. But in true comparison, there is great difference between the one daunger and the other: for, the late king, naked almost of all the vertues of a king, was a Prince more in shadow & shew then in body & substance: & as the kingdom of Naples, so far removed from Fraunce, held his forces so deuided, that they weakened more then strengthened his power, so that conquest, (for the feare of their estates, so neare neighbours to the realme of Naples) procured him two great enemies, the Pope & the king of Spaine, in whom touching the one are occupied for the present many diuerse intencions, and the other made weary with the things of Italy, will make him selfe no partie without very great necessitie. But the new king, both for his proper vertue is to be feared, and for his wise proceeding in this action to be doubted: as, for the estate of Myllan bordieth so neare Fraunce, that in respect of commoditie to succour or feskew it there is no hope to driue him backe, but by setting all the world in a stir. In so much, that we being neighbours to so great a power, shalbe sure to be exercised in trauels and perplexities both in peace and warre: Intimes of peace, subiect to expenses and suspitions, and during the warres, so entangled with daungers, that we shall find many difficulties to make our owne defence. And sure I can not but maruell much at him that hath reasoned afore me, who on the one side makes no feare of a king of Fraunce being Lord ouer the Duchie of Myllan, and on the other side holds for terrible Lodowyk Sforce, a Prince for power much inferior to vs, and with whom this hath bin alwayes a custome, either with fearefulness or couetousnes, to put in daunger all his enterprises: he alledged feare of succours which others might make to him, as though it were easie, in so great diuersitie of spirits & wills, & in so generall varietie of conditions, to make such an vnion: or rather, as if the absolute concord and vnion of a great and strong power, were not more to be feared, then the power of many, which as it hath diuers ends & motions, so doth it bring forth actions diuerse & discordant: he seemes to haue a confidence, that in those, who for hate and many other reasons, desire our embasement, wold be found that wisdome to vanquish disdaineth & couetousnes, which we find not in our selues to retain his ambitious thoughts. Besides, I know not why we may make promise, that the ieaiousies and new and auncient disdaineth against the french king (aspiring to the conquest of Myllan) may do more on the behalfe of the king of Romains and the Almain nation, then the rooted and settled hatred which both they beare to vs, by reason of so many townes which we hold appertaining to the Empire & house of Austriche: Neither can I see vpon what ground or discourse of reason the king of Romains will more willingly ioyne with vs against the french, then take part with the french quarrell against vs. No, rather the vnion of the barbarous & perpetuall enemies to the name of the Italians, carieth a more likelihood of truth & seems more proper to make a pray: for that being vnited with him, he may rather hope to be victorious ouer vs, then ouer him if he were knit with him. Besides these, such were his actions during the league past, and when he came into Italy, that he left no reason why we should so much desire to haue him estfoopes reunited with vs. I deny not, but Lodowyk hath done vs many iniuries, but euen so it is farre from countell and wil dome, for a passionate desire of reuenge, to put in perill the whole estate of things. And seeing times keepe their certaine measure and course, and euery time is enabled to his proper function, it is neither shame nor ill pollicie to respect those accidents and occasions to reuenge, which a common weale may very well attend and tarie for. No, rather it is infamous and merited imputation, to be caryed with affection, and prester the suggestion of disdaineth afore the oportunitie of the time: and in matters of state, it is no small flaunder, when rashnes and indiscreffion are accompanied with damage and generall harmes. No man will say, that for such reasons, we were moued to make an enterprise so rash, but all the world will iudge, that the desire to haue Cremona hath pushed vs forward, the same giuing cause of question to euery one, what is become of the auncient wisdome and grauitie of this Senate: And iustly may all the world maruell, that we are falne into the same rashnesse to be guides to the french king into Italy, into the which our selues wondred so much that Lodowyk Sforce ranne so farre. Great is the profit of Cremona, and the place very conuenient for many respects: but we ought to consider whether it be not a greater losse to haue a king of Fraunce Lord of the state of Myllan: yea, we ought to consider whether our greatnesse and reputation be stronger in Italy, when of our selues we are chiefest and most absolute there, or when there is in the heart of the same region a Prince so mighty and so neare our neighbour. We haue occupied at other times with Lodowyk, both disagreements and friendships, as estfoones may happen dayly betweene him and vs, neither is the difficultie of Pisa such but there may be applied some remedy, and much lesse doth it deserue, that for it we make vs subiect to so great daungers: But hauing the french to our neighbour, we shalbe alwayes trauelled in discordes, for that occasions will dayly arise in the diuersity of our minds, in the haughtie pride of the french nation, in the hatred wherein Princes do alwayes pursue common weales, & in the ambition bition which the most mightie haue to oppresse the most feeble and weake: for which regard, not onely the respect of Cremona can not allure me, but it doth euen astonish me, for that in it is aggravated the occasion of the french king to vex vs, which will be so much the more set forward by those of Myllan, by how much lesse they can suffer Cremona to be dismembred from the Duchie. And the same occasion will also stirre vp the German nation and the king of Romaines, for that Cremona and Guia adadda be also members of the iurisdiction of the Empire. At the least our ambition would not be so much blamed, and we should not search with new conquests to get vs every day new enemies, and to make vs suspected to euery one. By reason whereof it must needs come to passe in the ende, that either we must be souereigne and maisters ouer all, or scourged and beaten of all, and which of these two is soonest to happen, it is easie to consider by such as take not pleasure to beguile themselves: The wisdom and grauitie of this Senate by how much it is knowne and published through Italie and all the world, by so much more would the action be infamous and slaunderous, to defile our doings with a deliberation so rash and dangerous; seeing, to be carried with passion against our proper profit, is nothing else but lightnesse, and to esteeme more daungers that be litle then such as be great, can not but hold of folly and indiscretion: which two things being directly contrary to the wisdom and grauity of this Senate, I hope you will set downe a resolution so moderate and well aduised, as both your reputation shall be preferred, and your custome not broken.

This counsell, albeit was sustained with so many mighty reasons, and fauored of many of the principall and most wise of the Senate, was not for all that of such force, but that the contrary ad-uise caried the resolution, as well for respect of hatred, as for desire to beare rule, two things which leade men easily to dangerous deliberations: for, in the hatred which euery one had conceiued against Lodowik, was neither measure nor limit, and no lesse was the desire to adioyne to the iurisdiction of Venice the citie of Cremona with all the countrey about it, and all Guia adadda: an enlargement of no small value, for that it yeelded yearly a reuenue of an hundred thousand Duckats: but more to be esteemed for this oportunitie, for that embracing by this increasement almost all the riuer of Ogla, they stretched out their limits euen to Pau: they amplified also their iurisdiction along the riuer of Adda, and approaching within fiftene myles of the city of Myllan, and somewhat nearer the cities of Plaisance and Parma, it seemed in their coniectures that they had the way opened to occupie all the Duchie of Myllan, as often as the French King was either caried with new thoughts, or troubled with great impediments on the other side the Mountes: which they hoped would happen within short time, both for the nature of the Frenchmen, who are more apt to get then able to keepe: & also for that their common weale is perpetuall, where, in the kingdome of Fraunce, it often happeneth by the death of kings, that things deuolue to alteration, and gouernements and counsels chaunge. They brought also into consideration the difficulties of the french to continue the amities and good wils of their subiects, no lesse for the generall diuersitie of bloud, then for the difference of the french manners from the customes of the Italians: So that that sentence estoones confirmed by the voyces of the greatest number, they sent to their Embassadors, resident with the king to conclude the confederation vpon the offers they made, not speaking in any respect of the affaires of Pysa.

This exception of Pysa did not a litle trouble the king, for he hoped by the oportunitie of that deputacion, to vnite the Venetians and Florentins with him: and knowing that the Venetians were inclined to withdraw themselves by composition from the defence of Pysa, he held it but reasonable, that in that action they should rather haue regard to him, to make easie the enterprise of Myllan, as a thing nourishing common benefit to them both, then that hauing better conditions in the composition, to be the causers that the Florentins should remaine ioyned with Lodowik Sforce, by whose meane the king knowing that the Negociacion continued at Ferrara, was in no litle doubt, that he should not haue on his side either the Florentines or the Venetians, if Lodowik had power to bring the conference of Ferrara to a good conclusion. And the king wauering in many varieties and fancies of mind, and iudging that to be a resolution both vaine & ill aduised, which should leaue in neutralitie and doubt both the one and other common weale, and lastly being moued not a litle with the distrust which they expressed to haue against him: he began to incline rather to conclude the peace which continually was solicited with the king of Romaines, bearing this condition, that it should be lawfull to the one to make warre vpon Lodowijk Sforce, and to the other to vex the Venetians. In which disposition of minde, he made answer by the deputies which debated in his name with the Embassadors of Venice, that he refused to accord with them, if for their parts, they gaue not perfection to the deputation of Pysa, wherein he had solicited them before: And in his owne person he assured the Florentin Embassadors that he would neuer make other agreement with the Venetians. But the Duke Valentinoys and the Agents of the Pope with the Cardinall of S. P. ad vincula, Triunlice, and the other Italians, to whom appertained many particular respectes and interests touching this warre, would not suffer him to remaine constant in that deuise: They perswaded him with many & great reasons, that waighing with the power of the Venetians, the oportunities they had to annoy the Duke of Myllan, his maiestie could not follow a counsell more hurtfull, then to suffer himselfe to be depriued of their aydes and succors, for feare to loose the fauour of the Florentins, from whom, by reason of their own troubles, and that they were farre removed from the Duchy of Myllan, could be drawne no great profite or commoditie to his purposes. Besides, in that action, the occasion would made easie to Lodowyke, not onely to forsake the fauours of the Florentins, but also in reconciling him selfe to the Venetians (a matter which had bene the very spring and originall of all the disagreements betweene him and that state) to be effsoones reunited with them: by which alteration if there were no other meane to discerne what difficulties and impediments might ensue to the affaires of his maiestie, at the least, the experience of things past giues sufficient warning of it: for that albeit in the league that was made against king Charles, the names of so many kings were concurrant, yet the onely forces of the Venetians & Lodowike, tooke from him Nouare, and alwayes defended the Duchy of Myllan against him: They told him that it was a counsell dangerous & deceitfull, to make a foundation vpon the vnitie with Maximilian, in whom the world had seene euen till that day far greater attempts & dispositions to enterprises, then were his meanes and wisdom to colour them: But if his actions brought forth more happy successe then in times past, it ought to be well considered, how euil would agree with the intentions of the king, the augmentation of so great and perpetuall an enemy to the crowne of France. With these reasons they so altered the inclination of the king, & changed his former counsels, that, without speaking further of Pysa, he consented and concluded the confederation with the Venetians, wherein was agreed, that at the selfe same time that his maiestie with a mightie armie should assaile the Duchy of Myllan, they for their parts, should do the like vpon their frontiers: That the king hauing conquered the residue of the Duchy, Cremona with all Guardadda should be for the Venetians except foure furlongs along the riuer of Adda. Lastly, that after the king had conquered the Duchy of Myllan, the Venetians were bound to defend it for a certaine time and with a certaine proportion of horsemen and footemen, the king promising to do the like office for Cremona, and all the rest that they posselt in Lumbardie euen vnto the marshes of Venice. This confederation was so secretly contracted, that Lodowike for many moneths could not vnderstand, whether they had made betweene them a league onely for their common defence as from the beginning had bene published both in the French Court and at Venice, or whether there was any article that touched him, or made mention to manage warre against him: Such were the respects to keepe the couenants of this league secret, that the Pope him selfe notwithstanding his strait familiaritie with the king, could haue no certaine aduertisement of them, but very late.

The league thus concluded with the Venetians, the king (without speaking further of Pysa) propounded to the Florentines conditions much differing from the former: by which occasion, accompanied with the displeasures which the Venetians did to them, they were effsoones and further constrained to make their stay vpon the Duke of Myllan, by whose aids as their affaires continually prospered in the countrey of Casentyn, so the enemies receiuing many hurts by the soldiers & peasants, and suffering want of victuals and forrage for their horses of seruice, were retired within Bybienna and other small places, forgetting a necessary diligence to commaund the straits of the Apennine, to the end the way of their succours might be kept open, and the meane more assured (vpon the first necessitie) to abandon the countrey of Casentyn with lesse damage. By reason whereof Charles Vrsin was bestowed with his men at armes, and an hundred footmen, for the gard of the strait of Montalona, and a litle more below, Alutano defended the passage of La Vernia. But on the other side, Paule Ustelli proceeding discretely and substantially according to his custome, after he had so restrained them into straits and hard termes, laboured to compell them to abandon the countrey of Montalona, with intention afterwards to drue such as kept the passage of La Ver-

nia to do the like, to the end that the regiment of the Venetians being wholly penned in Bybienna, and enuironed on all sides with enemies and hils, they might either be the easilier vanquished, or at least, be driuen to consume them selues: seeing their numbers were already much diminished, for that besides those that were stripped here and there, there were departed from the army at sundry times, both for want of victuals, and ill surtie of their lodgings, more then fiftene hundred horsemen with many troupes of footemen, who, being set vpon in the passage of the Alpes by the païsants, receiued great harmes. In the end the consideration of these difficulties constrained Charles Ursin with his regiment to abandon the strait of Montalona, not without daunger to be put to the chase, for that many of the Florentin bands (to whom his distresses were knowen) and companies of païsants embracing the present occasion, set vpo them on the way: yet the Ursins, hauing already taken the aduantage of the strait, albeit, they lost a great part of their baggage, performed notwithstanding such defence, that the cōpanies that followed the chase in disorder, tasted of their valour. The example of Charles Ursin (in regard of the same difficulties) was followed by those of La Verma and Chiusa, who forsaking that passage, were retired to Bybienna, wherein were inclosed the Duke of Urbino, Aluiano, Astor Bailon, P. Marcell superintendent to the Venetian companies, and Iulian de Medicis, who were referred for the guard of that place (their only fortresse in the countrey Casentin) with a strength of three score horses & seuen hundred footemen. In which distresse they were nourished with no other cōfort then a hope in the succors which the Venetians prepared, iudging that for the regard of honor, but much more to haue better conditions by agreement, it imported them much not to abandon wholly the enterprize of the countrey of Casentin. And as for that cause, the Count Persilane mustred at Rauenna with great diligence the bands appointed for that rescue, whereunto he was sollicitated by the perpetuall complaints of the Count of Urbino and the rest, who signifying that their miserie and want of victuals had brought them to such estate of necessitie, that without speedy succour they should be constrained to offer composition with the enemy: euen so, of the contrary, the Duke of Mulan and the Captaines that were in the countrey of Casentin, nourished a speciall desire to preuent that succour by the expugnation of Bybienna, demanding, for that ende to be sent foure thousand footemen to ioyne with the strength of the campe. But their desire found many impediments, both for that in that countrey cold and full of hils, the nature of the time hindred much all actions and exercise of warre, & also there was no franke readinesse in the Florentins to furnish such prouision, partly being ouerweariied with the long and intollerable expences growing dayly to increase, and renouation: And partly for that in the Citie (not in great stabilitie & quiet) was disclosed a new dissention, some of the Citizens fauouring Paule Vuelli for his late merites in the warre; and others desiring to raise the Count Rinuocce for that he had bene an ancient & faithfull Captaine to their common weale, and had parentage of great authoritie within Florence: he lost the hope to manage the first place or dignitie in their seruice, by his misfortune at S. Reall, & very vnwillingly did he endure to haue that degree of reputation transferred to Paule Vitelli: & therefore leading his regiment in the countrey Casentin, he expressed no disposition nor readinesse to aduance the enterprises, by the which might grow increase of reputation to him whom he had desire to embase. These difficulties also became the greater by the naturall propertie of Paule, who seeking to haue his payes before the time, could not agree with the Florentin Commissioners, and who oftentimes in the deliberation and expeditio of affaires, possessed him selfe of more authoritie then seemed reasonable, & had euen at that time without the priuie of the superintendents, given to the Count Urbino being sicke, safeconduite to repasse in suretie out of the countrey Casentin: vnder the warrant of which safeconduit, Iulian de Medicis was also gone with him, to the speciall displeasure of the Florentins, who occupied this reason, that if they had made difficultie to suffer the Count Urbino to passe, his desire to go to recouer his health in his owne dominions, would haue constrained him to agree to the deliuerie of the bands that were within Bybienna: but much more did they complaine that Iulian de Medicis should communicate in such a liberall fauour, expressing aforetime manifest action of rebellion, & euen then was in armes against his countrey. Those differences hindred much that at Florence they neither beleueed counsels, nor agreed to the demaundes of Paule Vitelli, but much more did they proue impediments to the proceedings of the warre, which was not continued with his reputation towards the people, for that not onely many executions of importance were performed more by the païsants then by the soldiers, but also, considering the great opinion they had of his valour, they promised to them selues with a quicker expedition, the victorie of the enemies: wherein perhaps (according to the nature and iudgement of peoples) they attributed to the want of will, that which with more equitie they might haue referred to want of power, hauing regard to the sharpnesse of the time, and want of things necessarie. By these occasions (hurtfull to their affaires) and the strength of the foure thousand footemen being too slow in coming, the Count Pettillano had leasure enough to come to the borough of Elcie, appertaining to the Duke of Vrbino, & very neare the limites of the Florentins: A place where were before Charles Ursin and Peter de Medicis, and where were assembled all the bands to passe the Appenin, whose strength and order (as best agreeable to that countrey desert and rude) stood more vpon footemen then horsemen, and the most of them armed after the light horsemen. This was the last strength which the Venetians made in the countrey Casentin: and to breake it, Paule Vitelli leauing about Bybienna a certaine forme of a siege & sufficient guard in the straits and passages most necessary, marched with the residue of his armie to the strait of S. Stephen, (a towne of the Florentins seated at the foote of the Alpes) to withstand the enemies descending from the hills: But as in matters of daunger, discreffion and counsell are remedies no lesse assured then courage and execution: so, the Count Pettillano, hauing before him, the Alpes loaden with snowes, and at the foote of the Alpes so great an impediment, together with the strait passages very troublesome to passe, euen when the season is faire: was content to forbear to descend or passe, notwithstanding with great complaints he was perswaded to it by the Senate of Venice, perhaps more vehement to push him forward, then able to foresee the perils. But albeit they propounded to him diuerse plots and meanes to retire Paule from whence he was, and that already in Ualdbagna was done some enterprize of vexation vpon the peeces of the Florentins, yet he stood resolute in his determination, and would not stirre in any sort.

Milan made astonished with the league, solicited an accord betweene the Venetians and the Florentins.

But by how much more coldly the warre proceeded, by so much more hotly were recontinued the solicitations and practises of accord, equally desired of both the one and other partie for diuerse regards, and no lesse followed and solicited by the Duke of Milan: the reason and reappoynt of the league made betweene the French king and the Venetians, made him somewhat amazed, and withall drew him to dispositions of hope; that the accord being made, the Venetians would haue lesse desire to the passage of the French, perswading him self also, that at the least (contenting them selues in that regard with his good will and with his workes) they would be somewhat appaised, and cut off the rigour of their indignation conceiued against him. Therefore interposing amongst them a meane by Hercules Deste his father in law, he constrained the Florentins to condescend somewhat to the desire of the Venetians, not so much with authoritie (for they seeing into his intentions, began to hold him for suspected) as with letting them know, that if the agreement went not forward, his necessities would compell him, for the feare he had of the french king, to turne to their disfauour, and to take from them either all his men of warre, or at least the best part of his trained bandes: The matter was debated many moneths at Ferrara where, after many difficulties disputed, Hercules was required by the Venetians, to come in person to Venice for the more facilitie of the expedition, whereunto he made some resistance: but much more the Florentins, for that they knew that the Venetians desired that a cōpromise might be made in the person of the Duke of Ferrara, against the which they stood: & were very far of. But such were the importunities of Lodowike Sforce, that at last he consented to go thither; & the Florentines to send with him Iohn Baptista Rodolpho, and Paule Antony Sodorny, two of the chiefest and wisest Citizens of their common weale. The first thing that was disputed vpo at Venice, was to know if Hercules as Arbitrator would put an end to the controuersie, or as a friend indifferent, would labour to bring them to accord, interposing betweene the parties according to their order of proceeding at Ferrara, where they were not farre of from resolving the articles most principall and importing. The Florentines desired that the custome begun should be obserued, knowing that Hercules, in as much as might depend vpon his arbitrement, would hold more account of the greatnesse of the Venetians then of them, and pronouncing the sentence at Venice, he should be so much the more compelled to beare respect to the Venetians: And yet though he would do nothing of him selfe, they were assured the Duke of Milan would induce him, for that he desired greatly to make knowne to the Venetians, that he had serued their turne in that action. And albeit many difficulties were almost resolved at Ferrara: yet both in their last perfection, and in many particularities, the power power of the arbitrator was not litle, who, notwithstanding the cōpromise would yet haue a liberty to depart from that which was first debated. On the other side, the Venetians were at a point, if the cōpromise went not forward, to passe no further, not so much for that they were promised more in the arbitrator then the Florentines, as for that there were risen amongst them many contrarieties & objections touching the present matter: for, albeit the greatest part of them were weary with the intollerable expences that increased dayly with a very small hope of profit, which not a litle aduanced their dispositions to agreement: yet were there many euen in the Senate, who for their experience not so wel stayed as the rest, and for their motions of youth, more forward then would counsell or reason, would not consent to agreement, vnlesse the libertie of the Pysans were wholly preserued, or at least vnlesse that part of the countrey remained still to them which they possessed when they tooke them into their protection: To which opinion they ioyned many reasons, but chiefly they vrged a promise ratified by decree publike to the Pysans to protect their liberty, which they could not breake without apparant blemish to their cōmon honours, and perpetuall staine to the reputation of their common weale. Some others, made easie touching all other articles, were immoderate in the quantity of the expences, which they required to be repayed by the Florentins in abandoning of Pysa: A request which they commended to be very reasonable, for that it was no lesse iust for the Florentins to make recompence of the charges, then for the Pysans to make restitution of that they held in possession. But the chiefe wisdom and authoritie of the Senate, had a counsell contrary: who, founding more deeply the estate of things, preferred still with many importunities the consideration of the great charges, wherein as good stewardest of the treasures of their common weale, it was a iust office in them all, to be carefull and circumspect: They saw nothing but dispaire in the defence of Bybienna, and lesse possibilitie to sustaine any longer the generall quarell of Pysa, without increase of new troubles and charges, for the many difficulties that still appeared, as well in succouring them, as to diuert and draw away the forces of the enemies, the Florentins hauing objected impediments farre aboue their expectation in the beginning. Besides, they considered that albeit the enterprise against the Duke of Myllan might be supposed easie, yet the French king, being not pacified with the king of Romains, and standing subiect to diuerse impediments ordinarily hapning at home, might by many aduentures be hindred and made slow to prosecute the warre: And though he should put it to action, yet in the businesse of warre, many daungers vnlooked for & difficulties no lesse intricate, may chaunce dayly, either to the vtter disappointing of his purposes, or at least to alter his disposition. But aboue all, trembling at the great preparations which the sayd Baiazet Ottoman made both by sea & land to inuade those parts towards Greece, their resolution was, (seeing their necessitie was more mighty then their inclination) that it was both iust, reasonable, and necessary, rather to consent that honestie in some part should giue place to vtilitie, then, in standing obstinately vpon their promise and faith giuen, to perseuer & nourish as it were a perpetuall interest in troubles, charges, and perplexities. And because they were well assured that these conclusions would be hardly consented to in their counsels, (albeit they knew from the beginning that of necessitie they must be allowed) they had (whilest the negotiation was at Ferrara) wisely procured, that by the counsell of the Pregati should be giuen fulnesse of authoritie touching the affaires of Pysa, and the resolution of the accord, to the counsell of the Duci, which is a counsell compounded of a lesser number, none being called vnto it but such as be of greatest grauity and authoritie, which contained the most part of those that most desired the accord. But now the solicitation continuing at Venice, and being in no trust to be able to dispose the counsell of the Pregati to consent to the articles which had bene debated at Ferrara, and knowing withall, that if onely the counsell of the Duci condescended to them, there might rise occasions to charge those that assisted it: they solicited that the cōpromise might be made, hoping that touching the iudgement that might come of it, men would rather transferre the imputation to the arbitrator then to them, and that more easily would that be ratified which had bene already published in sentence, the that which should be consented vnto with the party entreating by way of accord: So that after those things had bene debated for certayne dayes, (the Duke of Myllan threatening the Florentins refusing to compromit, to withdraw immediatly all his cōpanies out of Tuscan) there was a free and absolute compromise for eight dayes in the person of Hercules Duke of Ferrara, who, after he had well considered of all things, pronounced the sixt day of Aprill, that within eight dayes next following the Venetians and Florentins should cease to offend one another, and that by the next S. Markes tyde all the bands, succours, & aydes of either parties, should retire and returne into their countreys: that the Venetians at the same time should make issue out of Pisa and all the places thereabouts, all their regiments of soldiers, which they intertained there: That they should abandon Bybienna with all other peeces taken vpon the Florentins, and they to pardon to those of Bybienna all their faults & trespasses: That for the recompence of all charges (which the Venetians assured to amount to eight hundred thousand duckats) the Florentins should be bound to repay them in twelue yeares, fiftene thousand duckats by the yeare: That all the offences should be pardoned to the Pisans, to whom should be sufficed to exercise by sea and land all sorts of offences and marchandise, and to remaine in their guard all the fortresses of Pisa and those other places which were holden by them the day of the sentence: but vnder this charge, that if they bestowed garrisons of the countreymen or others, that they should not be persons suspected to the Florentins, & that they should be payed of the reuenues which the Florentins should collect of Pisa, increasing neither the numbers of men, nor the payes accustomed afore the rebellio: That if the Pisans thought good, they might deface and dismantle all those citadels and fortresses of the proper countrey of Pisa, which had bene recovered by the Florentins for the time the Venetians held them in protection: That within Pisa the first instances of causes ciuile should be iudged by a Podesstat straunger chosen by the Pisans of a place not suspected of the Florentins, that the Captaine chosen by the Florentins should not meddle but with causes of appellation, & haue no power to proceede in any case criminall concerning blood, banishment, or confiscatiō, without the counsell of a superintendent to be chosen by Hercules or his successors, and of fise Doctores of law which the Pisans should name to him: That the goods moueable & vnmoueable occupied by the one and other partie, should be restored to whom they appertained, not making restitution of the frutes, of the which euery one was absolved: That in ali other things, they should suffer the Florentins to enioy fully their rights in Pisa and the territorie, forbidding the Pisans, that neither for the regard of the citadels and fortresses, nor for other cause whatsoeuer, they should practise or conspire any thing against the common weale of Florence. This sentence was no sooner published at Venice, but there were heard through the Citie great complaints euen of the nobilitie, against the Duke of Ferrara, and those speciall Senators which had managed the whole action: The most of them, construing great blame to that faith should be broken to the Pisans, with so many infamies to the maiestie of the common weale, complained vehemently, that the article touching the expences of the warre was past ouer with so light consideration. The discourse of this agreement inflamed not a litle the Embassadors of the Pisans, who, being before the sentence cunningly entertained by the Venetians in many promises and hopes, that vndoubtedly they should remaine in full libertie, and that not onely the residue of the countrey should be adiudged to them, but haply also the port of Lyuorne, made the resolution so much the more grievous to them, by how much the effectes fell out contrary to the perswasions wherein they had bene nourished. In so much as they began with publike cryes to appeale to the equitie of the Senate, to whom they complained, that the promises to protect their libertie so oftentimes reiterated by the Senate, vnder the assurance of whose faith they had not onely reiected the amities of all other Potentates, but also refused farre better conditions offered by the Florentins, were vnworthily defiled and broken, their securitie being not provided for but with vaine apparāces: for, what degree of safety was that, or how could they be assured that the Florentins reestablishing their magistrats within Pisa, and their marchants and subiectes returning to trafficke there, & on the other side their paisants, who had serued as a principall member in the defence of the Citie, retiring to their houses and farmes would not bring vnder their iurisdiction by some propertie of fraude, the whole gouernment of their towne? hauing withall so many oportunities, but chiefly the guard and commaundement of the gates. And how could there but lurcke intention of infidelitie vnder that suerty, where we holding the fortresses, & such as were appointed to the guard of them, were to be payed by the Florentins, & not to be lawfull in a time so doubtfull, to bestow a stronger guard then had bin accustomed in seasons peaceable and assured. The pardon for the trespasses committed, was likewise a thing vaine, seeing the Florentins had good meane to destroy them by wayes iudiciall and by iudgements: for that the marchandises and other goods as had bene made pillage in the time of rebellion, amounted to such a value, that in recompence they would not onely dispose and confiske our substances, but also in such a reuengefull authoritie our persons should not be assured from imprisonment. But to cut off the importunitie of these complaints, the principals pals of the Senate brought to passe the day following (although the terme of the compromise was expired) that Hercules, (to whom the generall indignation of the citie brought not a litle feare) added to the sentence published, a declaration without the knowledge and priuie of the Florentins: That vnder the name of fortresses, was comprehended & meant the gates of the towne of Pisa, with other peeces that had fortresses, for whose guard, & intertainemēts of the Podestat & superintēdet, should be assigned to the Pisans a certaine part of the reuenues of Pisa. And that the places not suspected, wherof mention was made in the sentence, & fro whence they might draw soldiers, should be the state of the Church, of Mantua, of Ferrara, & of Bologna, not comprehending therein soldiers of other places: That touching restitution of goods, there should neuer be speech of it: That it should be in the power of the Pisans, to name the superintēdet, borne in any place not suspected: That the captaine should not proceed in any cause criminall, (how litle soeuer it were) without the superintendent: That the Pisans should be well intreated of the Florentins according to the custome of other noble Cities of Italie, & that there should not be imposed vpon the any new charges.

This declaration was not solicited for any desire the Venetians had that it should be obserued, but somewhat to qualifie the iust importunities of the Pisan Embassadours, and so to iustifie them to the counsell of the Pregati, that if the libertie of the Pisans were not altogether obtained, at least they had so well provided for their suertie and comoditie, that they could not be charged to haue passed them ouer as a pray, or left them abandoned: So that in this counsell of the Pregati, after much discourse of disputation and reasoning, at last what with consideration of the conditions of times, and the difficulties to maintaine Pisa, but specially for feare of the Turkes armies, it was resolved, that the sentence should not be ratified with an expresse consent, but that things which were of greatest importance should be put in execution, making to cease within eight dayes all offences, and drawing all their bands out of Tuscan at the time determined, with intention to medle no more with the quarell: yea many of the Senators began to desire, that the Florentins should rather recouer Pisa, the that it should fall into the power of the Duke of Millan. At Florēce, after the tenour of the sentence was communicated to the citie, most of the multitude began to murmur in their mindes, and not onely held them selues oppressed in this, that they must make repayment of the expences of the warre to those who had vniustly vexed them: but much more for that it seemed to them they had obtained no other thing but the naked and simple name of Lords, seeing both the fortresses were in the guard of the Pisans, and the administration of criminall iustice (one of the principal meēbers to preserue estates) could not haue his course without their magistrats: Neuertheless, the same protestatiō of the Duke of Millan which had induced them to cōpromit, constrained the to ratifie it, & hoping withall that within a litle time, by industry and good behaviour to the Pisans, they might redresse things in a better forme: they ratified by name the sentence published, but not the additions and declarations which were not yet come to their knowledge.

But farre greater were the indignations & doubts of the Pisans, who moued not a litle against the name of the Venetians, and calous of some greater deceit, as soone as they vnderstood the report of the sentence, discharged their soldiers from the guard of the fortresses and the gates: and not suffering them any more to lodge in the Citie, they stood many dayes in great variation and doubt, whether they should accept the conditions of the sentence or not. On the one side, feare, being the instrument of compulsion, ouerruled their wils, standing now abandoned of all comfort and counsell: and on the other side, the generall hate they bare to the Florentins, made their passions to redouble, and kept them resolute. But much more did retaine their inclination to constancie, their desperate expectatiō to obtaine pardon for their heauie & infinite transgressions, whose qualitie they held so much the more great and intollerable, by how much they had put the state of Florence to infinite expences and harmes, and many times had brought into termes daungerous, even their proper libertie. In these doubts and diuersities of mindes, the Duke of Millan counselled them to giue place, offering that he would worke so much with the Florentins, that the conditions of the sentence should be more in their fauours and to their aduantages: yet, they, to make triall if he remained still possessed with his ancient couetousnesse, determining in this case to giue the selues wholly to him, they sent to him Embassadors. But at last (such are the destinies of minds drawne and deuided) after many thoughts and variations, they determined rather to make triall of all extremities, then to returne vnder the yoke of the Florentins; whereunto as the Pisans had secret incitation by the Genoways, Lucquoys, and Pandolph Petracci: So also it was not doubted of the Florentins but that the Duke of Millan (the truth being other wayes) had encouraged them to that obstinate resolution, so little expectation is there of sinceritie and faithfull actions in that man, whom the world hath taken into opinion to be double and suttle.

keeping the accord are beset-ted by the Florentins.

Thus the Florentins, being out of hope to recôcile Pisa by accord, thought they had a great occasion to vanquish & force the Citie: and therefore, causing Paule Vitell to returne swiftly into that countrey, they leuied with ready diligence the prouisions demaunded by him: But whilest that strength was assembled and in preparing to action, the dangers of Lodowike Sforce increased wonderfully, for that his interposition into the accord had in no sort appeased the mindes of the Venetians, who, for hate to the man, and hope of their profite, were wholly in desire to conspire his ruine. To these distresses of Lodowike, was ioyned this further aduersitie, that Maximilian was nothing so ready to make warre on the French king, as he was importunate in continuall demands of money of Lodowike: yea, contrary to his many promises, he prolonged the truce for the whole moneth of August next, taking from him at one time the hope that he had that his succors would stand him in more stead, then he had done his counsell to diuert the warre. Maximilian also, being vnitied with the league of Sweden, began warre vpon the Swissers declared rebels of the Empire for many controuersies betweene them: which warre continuing on both sides in great furie, with sundry accidents and fortunes on both parts, Lodowike began to assure him selfe, that in no necessity, he could hope for succours from Maximilian, vntill that warre against the Swissers tooke end, either by victorie, or composition: And yet Maximilian, promising him that he would neuer accord with the French king or with the Swissers, without comprhending him in it, Lodowike was still constrained to refurnish the expences of that warre, and to entertaine the Emperours prodigalities with new supplies of money. This occasion was not vnknownen to the new king of Fraunce, who considering how much it imported him, to haue the Pope and the Venetians for him, esteemed little the perswasions of many of his counsell, that in regard he was newly ascended to the crowne, and his treasures very ill furnished, he might put off the warre till the yeare following: But the king framing his hopes according to the importunities of his desire, imagined a possibilitie to obtaine the victorie in few moneths: and therefore casting in his coniecture that in such a shortnesse of time, the seruice could not suffer great necessities of money, entred into open preparation for the warre, alwayes furnishing the Swissers afore had with some proportion of money, to the end to keepe Maximilian in businesse: for which cause the Duke of Millan, discerning such manifest tokens of the warre, laboured with a wonderfull diligence & care not to be alone in so great dangers: wherein hauing an absolute distrust in all possibilities and meanes of accord or reconciliation with the Venetians, and finding in the king of Spain an inclination suspitious, & (notwithstanding his many solicitations) a carelesse remembrance of his perils, he turned his eyes to the contemplation of other helpe, and founding in one instant the wills almost of all other Potentates, he sent Claude Viscount to Maximilian and the Swissers to negotiate an agreement betweene them. And as aduersitie is mighty to make men search the operation of all counsels: so, Lodowike knowing, that according to the Popes desire, the mariage of Charlotta with his sonne Cesar Borgia, could not well succede, for that the young Lady either moued with the loue and authoritie of her house and parents, or else gouerned by the perswasions of the French king (in whom notwithstanding were expressed many faire apparances to the contrary) refused with great constancie and resolution of minde, to make him her husband, if withall he put not an end to the affaires of Federike her father, who offered to the French king yearly tribute with very large conditions. Lodowike labouring vpon these occasions, had hope, to alien and estrange him from the fauours he bare to the enterprises of Fraunce, soliciting him with many importunities to draw him into confederation with him, wherein he promised the association of king Federike and the Florentins, with many faire offers, that aswell he as the confederates, would contribute with him in a common succour against the Vickaires of the Church, and indue him besides with a great quantitie of money to purchase some honorable estate for his sonne. These offers, as the Pope at the first motion seemed to heare them with a dissembled eare: so, in the end he was content to giue them leaue to vanish & become merely vaine: for, hoping to receiue by the societie & fauours of the French king, benefits and farre greater liberalities, then those which he looked to obtaine if Italie were not filled full of the forreine enemies of France: he consented that his sonne excluded already from the mariage of Charlotta, should take one of the daughters of the Lord Albret, who, for his affinitie with the bloud to yall, and for the

the greatnesse of the estates and liuings, was one of the greatest in all the kingdome of Fraunce. By Lodowick to whom appeared daily more tokens and testimonies of the euill inclination of the Venetians, ceased not by expresse solicitors (but in secret manner, king Federyk concurring in the same action) to stir vp against them the Prince of the Turkes, hoping that being assailed and vexed by him, they would haue no oportunitie to molest the state of Mylan. And being withall well aduertised of the preparations which the Florentyns made to haue Pisa, he laboured, vnder offers of all sorts of succors to them, to bind them to his defence with three hundred men at armes and two thousand footmen after they had recouered Pisa. On the other side, the french king required importunately their promise to furnish him for one yeare with five hundred men at armes: and for recompence offered to bind himselfe, as soone as he had accomplished the conquest of Mylan, to minister to them for one whole yeare the succors of a thousand Launces, for the aduancement of their enterprises, with promise that he would make no accord with Lodowick, if not at the same time they were not repossessed of Pisa, & their other places withholden: besides, he wold bring to passe that the Pope & the Venetians should ioyne to their protection, if (afore the conquest of Mylan) they fell into any necessitie of defence. For which demands so contrary & full of variety, the Florentyns stood wauering in their resolution, no lesse for the difficulty of the matter then for their diuision of minds: for, Lodowick requiring their aid (but in case that they recouered Pisa) the succors that he promised were far more present & certaine, then the helps promised by the french king, in whom they iudged little oportunitie of action to the aide of Pisa, for that, being abandoned of euery one, they determined to haue it that sommer. Besides, many were moued with the memory that the Venetians were confederat with the french king against Lodowick, for that he had ministered to them in their perils: but much more moued them the feare of despite, least in refusing to gratifie his demands, he would hinder them to get Pisa, a thing which he might easily doe. And of the contrary, looking into their owne infirmities, and seeing no possibilitie of power to resist the french king and the Venetians, it seemed a counsell dangerous to make themselves enemies with a king whose armies they expected within few moneths to runne ouer all Italy. And the memorie of the fauours receiued of Lodowick in the warre against the Venetians (to the which they referred the originall of all their dangers) was easily defaced by this consideration, that the rebellion of Pisa was first kindled by his meanes: and that nourishing alwayes ambitious desires to aspiere to the iurisdiction of it, he had sustained them, and for many moneths ioyued the supportation of others, conspiring in those times many other wrongs and iniuries against the Florentines: so that they referred more imputation to his offences, then benefite by his fauours, which yet he did not communicate in liberalitie and franknesse, but by the impatiencie and intolleration he had, that the Venetians should not take from him that which with hope and ambition he had long since iudged to be duly appertaining to him: they fell at last into this last doubt, that if they declared them selues for Lodowick, the French king aduancing the meanes and oportunities he had by the Pope and Venetians, might many wayes hinder them in the recouering of Pisa. In so much, as conferring the nature of the perils on both sides, with their condition present, they determined in the end, not to stirre either in the fauour of the French, or the Duke of Mylan, but to apply the time to the aduancing of the enterprise of Pisa, wherein they reapposed nothing in fortune nor forreine aides, but iudged their proper strength able and sufficient, not forgetting for all that, to entertaine Lodowick with shewes and shadowes and neare tokens of hope, least he should take occasion to object impediments, da-lying with him in those deceptes; which to their hurtes they had oftentimes experienced in him. Therefore after they had for many dayes made delayes in answering, they dispatched at last a Secretary publike to giue him vnderstanding, that the intention of the common weale was conformable to his desires as touching the effect, but concerning the maner there was some difference, for that as they had made a full resolution, that as soone as Pisa was recouered, he should not faile of the succours he had demanded: so they desired him to consider how perillous it was to contract their promise vnder expresse covenant, for that in free cities, such things being not to be dispatched without the consent of many, there was no possibilitie to hold them secret, & being disclosed, they wold giue occasion to the french king to draw the Pope & the Venetians to readminister succours to Pisa: by which it would come to passe that their promise would bring harme to them selues, and proue vnprofitable to him, for that Pisa being not taken, neither should they be bound to him, neither were they able to helpe him: for these reasons they sayd and esteemed that faith and promise might suffice giuen in words with the consent of the chiefe citizens, vpon whose authoritie all their publike deliberations depended: That for other occasion they refused not to covenant with him by writing, but offered him for end for better declaration of their will and intention, that if he knew any other meane whereby his desire might be satisfied, and so great damages avoided, they would be as ready to execute it in deede as they required him to hold him assured in good will and affection towards him. By which answer subtil and full of art, and for that also they did not accept the offers of his succours, Lodowyk saw there was no hope left to haue bandes of souldiers from them, and lesse expectation of succours from other parts, for that the comforts promised so continually by the king of Romans proued very vncertaine, no lesse by his naturall inconstancy, then for the impediment of his warres with the Swyffers. And for Federik, where he promised to send him a strength of foure hundred men at armes, and fise thousand footmen vnder the leading of Prosper Colonne, he doubted not so much of his will (for the defence of the Duchie of Millan turned to his profit) as of his disabilitie and delays: And Hercules, his father in law (reproaching almost the auncient iniuries done by him in the composition of Polesina) answered him with excuses, & that it brought no small grieue to him to be restrained to succour his distresse, for that the lands of the Venetians ioyning to neare to the gates of Ferrara, he was constrained to be carefulfull ouer the suertie of his owne estate.

himself against the king.

Lodowyk thus made naked of all forreine hopes, & driuen altogether to reappose in his strength and comforts at home: began carefully to fortifie Luon, Nouaro, and Alexandria de la Paille, townes standing in the mouth of the first perils and inuasions of the french: his resolution was to send out against the fury of the french army Galeas de S. Seneryn with the greatest part of his strength, and to oppose the residue against the Venetians, vnder the gouernment of the Marquis of Mantua, notwithstanding a litle after, either by indiscretion or by conetousnesse, or for that there is no power to resist the counsels of God, he became estranged from the Marquis: for that falling into this vaine perswasion, that the Venetians (against whom the Turke had opened the warre as well by land as by sea with a wonderfull preparation) would haue no oportunitie to molest him, being constrained to defend their owne estates against so strong an encmie: and desiring withall to satisfie a particular humour in Galeas S. Seneryn, whose ambition could not brooke that the Marquis should enjoy a title more honorable then he, he began to make difficulties, as refusing to pay him a certaine remainder of old payes, & required of him othes & cautions not accustomed for the assurance of his faith: And alio notwithstanding that, afterwards being aduertised that the Venetians dispatched many bands of men into Bresse, to be ready to enter into the war at the same time that the french should begin it, he sought by the meane of the Duke of Ferrara his father in law, to reconcile him to him, yet the difficulties could not so soone be resolved, as the daunger appeared, growing daily both more great and terrible: for the Duke of Sanoy, being eftsoones conioyned with the king, set at liberty all oportunities and passages for his bands to march continually through Piemont, and to be bestowed about the confines of Ast. And to the hopes of Lodowyk appeared daily tokens of declination, for that king Federik, either by disabilitie or by negligence, was slow to minister to his perils: and that small remainder of hope which he entertained as his chiefest comfort, that the Florentynes hauing once gotten Pisa, would send to his succours Paule Vitelly (whose valour held great reputation in all the parts of Italy) was cut from him by the diligence of the french king, who, debating with their Embassadors with words sharpe and full of threatnings, wrought so much with their common weale, that they made him secret promise by writing to minister no aide at all to the Duke of Myllan, a promise, for the which they receiued in recompence no covenant or graunt of him. Lodowyk leauing the Count Caiarze on that side to the Venetians with a very small companie not sufficient to any great resistance, sent Galeas de S. Seneryn beyond the riuer of Pau, with an army of a thousand sixe hundred men at armes, a thousand fise hundred light horsemen, ten thousand footmen Italians, & fise hundred footmen Allemaings, but more with intention to defend his places, then to resist in the plaine field: for that he esteemed it most to his profit to entertaine and hold things in delay, chiefly for that he had daily expectation of the conclusion of an accord solicited in his name by the Viscount, betwene Maximilian, and the Swyffers: which if it were accomplished, he was fedde with many promises of mightie succours, which other wayes he could not onely not hope for, but it was verie hard for him to draw any proportions of footme from those quarters, for that by the troubles that were were thereabout, all the countrey was almost kept trauelled in that warre.

Touching the warres of Myllan, there was performed neither of the open nor other part, any exploit of war, other then certaine light incurſions, vntill the regiments of the Lord de Ligny, Eberard, Subigny, & Tryualce, were paſſed the mounts : for that, albeit the king was come to Lyon and the bruite ran, that he would paſſe into Italy in ſeaſon conuenient, yet he referred things to direction, appointing the march of the army to be gouerned by his Captaines. The ſtrength of the french army was a thouſand ſixe hundred Launces, ſiue thouſand Swyſſers, ſoure thouſand Gaſcoins, and ſoure thouſand of other natures of ſouldiers in Fraunce; with whom, aſſoone as they were drawne into an army accompliſhed and beſtowed vnder their ſeueral, Guidons and leaders, the Captaines erected a Camp, and the thirteenth of Auguſt, planted it afore the Rocke Arazze : ſituate vpon the ſhore of the riuer Tanare : And albeit, it was garded with a ſtrength of ſiue hundred footmen, yet was it taken within a very ſhort time; the fury of the Artillerie being the cauſe, and no leſſe the cowardiſe of the Garrifon that were within : from thence they drew their Campe to Anon, a litle village along the high way to Aſt and Alexandria, vpon the bankes of Tanare, and right ouer a gainſt Arazze. And being ſtrong by the propertie of his ſituation, the Duke of Myllan had eſtloones fortified it. certaine moneths before : And albeit Galeas S. Seneryn who with his armie had taken the field neare Alexandria, was well aduertified of the loſſe of Arazze, and had determined to ſend to the ſuccours of the other, bandes of footmen better reſolued, for that the ſeuē hundred beſtowed there firſt, were of the new leuiēs and not trayned to the warre : yet he could not put his deuife in execution, for that the French men, to cut off all recurrence of ſuccours thither, had manned Solizana which is betweene Alexandria and Anon, and that by the ſufferance and conſent of the Marquis of Mont Ferat Lord of the place : In ſo much that they that were within Anon expreſſing in action and experience no better prooſe of their valours, then aunſwered the expectation and opinion of moſt men, fell into the daunger of the French, who, after they had firſt battered the Suburbs, and afterwards ſhaked the walles of the towne in ſoure ſeueral quarters, they enforced it in two dayes and likewiſe the Caſtell, making ſlaughter of all the footmen that were thither withdrawne. The ſucceſſe of which enterpriſes (whoſe ſuē ievanquiſhed all reſiſtance, and the ſuddenneſſe ouercame all opinion and expectation) brought ſuch aſtoniſhment to Galeas S. Seneryn, that he retyred with all his army into Alexandria, colouring his feare with an excuſe, that both in his ſouldiers wanted valour, and in the people was litle faith towards Lodowyk : which timorous reſolution ſtaying not a litle the reputation of a General, gaue occaſion of greater courage to the french, who drew their Campe within ſoure miles of Alexandria, and at the ſame ſeaſon tooke Valence plentifully ſtored with Artillerie and ſouldiers, and that by the treaſon of Donat Raſſagum of Myllan, at that time Captaine of the Caſtle, corrupted by the promiſes of Tryualce : This Captaine let them into the towne by the Caſtle, beheld with his eyes all the ſouldiers that were within either ſlaine or taken, & Oſtavian baſtard brother to S. Seneryn made priſoner : ſo buſie is the humor of treaſon, that in whom it aboundeth, it rageth without reſpect to time, perſon, or the ſelfe partie in whom it worketh : for, this Captaine twenty yeares before falſifying his faith to Madame Bonne and the yong Duke Iohn Galeas, deliuered up to Lodowyk Sforce one of the Portes of Toriona : the ſelfe ſame day that he put the frenchmen into Valence. Thus fortune following the victors, & the victors applying to the fauour & opportunity of the time, the frenchmen as a violent thynnder running ouer the whole cuntry Baſſigiana, Vognera, Newcaſtle, & Pont Corona, yelded to them without reſiſtance, as alſo the caſtle and towne of Toriona, from whence, Anthony Maria Paluoſin gouerning the Garrifon there, retired beyond the Riuer of Paw without tarying for any aſſault. The aduertifement of theſe accidents being come to Myllan, Lodowyk Sforce, ſeeing afore his eyes nothing but a lamentable face of all extremities, and that his eſtate haſtned with a violent ſwiftneſſe to his ruine, became confuſed (as hapneth in ſuddaine extremities) both in counſell and courage, and had recurrence to thoſe remedies, wherein (men being accuſtomed to runne to them when thinges be ſo farre afflicted, that they be almoſt brought to the laſt deſpaire) they declare to every one rather the greatneſſe of the daunger wherein they are, then that they receive profit or comfort by them : he cauſed to muſter and enroll all the men of the towne of Myllan that were able to beare armes, and cauſing to aſſemble the people, which hated him not a litle for the many exactions he had impoſed vpon them, he acquitted them of one part of the tributes & impositions whereunto they were bound, using perswasions accompanied with words and lectures pitifull, that if they thought he had at any time too heauily burdened them, that they would not ascribe it to his disposition and nature, but to any desire to heape to himselfe a particular treasure, but rather to the estate of the times, & dangerous conditions of Italy, nolesse for the greatnesse of the Venetians, then for the descending of the late king Charles of Fraunce, matters for their importance very icalous, & for which, his particular interest constrained him to those actions, to the end to be the better able to protect the peace & surety of that state against all oppressions & inuasions, iudging that he could not shew a greater affection to his country & his people, then to foresee they should not be trauelled with wars: That the fruits which they had reaped made good testimony of the inestimable profits they had gathered by such a policy & counsell, seeing they had liued many yeares vnder him in great tranquillity, & by that benefit their city raised into a wonderful estate & maiesty of riches, reputation, & glory, as was well expressed in the aspect of so many pompes, glories, & honors, with the multiplication almost of infinit. sciences and inhabitants: benefits, wherein the towne & Duchy of Millan, doth not only not giue place, but doth exceede all other Climats & regions of Italy: That they should remeber, that he had gouerned them without blood & cruelty, & with what affability & readinesse he had heard euery one, & that he onely (aboue all the Princes of his time) without bearing respect to the paines & trauels of his person, obserued the dayes appointed for publik audiences, & alwayes had giuen to euery one a ready expedition & vpright iustice: That they should beare respect & remembrance to the merits & gracious behauiors of his father, who had gouerned them rather in an affection of children, then in the property and condition of subiects: and withall to set before their eyes, how hard & grieuous it would be for them to beare the proud & insolent yoke of the french, who, for the neighbourhood and nearenesse of the realme of Fraunce (if they once came to commaund ouer the state of Myllan) would plant there their perpetuall dwelling, & chase out the ancient inhabitants, an impiety which heretofore they had exercised vpon all Lombardy. To these reasons he added the consideration of the barbarous maners of the french nation, & to ioyn all together with minds resolute for the defence of their countrey & proper safety, not doubting but if their resistance vanquished the first brunt of daungers (which like a storme would be violent & but short) but the residue of the actiō would be easie, for that this was a property infallible in the french nature, to be more furious to assaile, then constant to continue, & for that also he had in expectation a speedy and mighty succour from the king of Romains, who, being already compounded with the Smyssers, prepared to reskue him in person, like as also the regiments which the king of Naples sent to him vnder the leading of Prosper Colonne, were on the way, and did marche: Lastly he made them beleue that the Marquis of Mantua (all the controuersies betwene them being now resolute) was already armed, & with three hundred men at armes entered the countrey of Cremona: to which succours and forces, if he might adioyne the readinesse and faith of his people, he made himselfe assured against his enemies, yea if their army contained all the power of Fraunce. These perswasions were heard with more diligence then profit, & serued him to as litle purpose, as the forces which he opposed against the french: for feare of whom, waighing lightly the present daungers of the Venetians, who had begun the warre in Guinradadda, & taken the towne of Carravage with other pceces neare the riuer of Adda, he called backe the Count Caiasse with the most part of those bands which he had sent for the defence of that quarter, & caused him to marche to Panya to ioyn with Galeas for the defence of Alexandria. But, as such as haue their destruction determined, are seen to decline by degrees, so his ruine was aduanced on all sides: for the Count Caiasse, was a litle before at a secret accord with the french king, being more caried with disdain that Galeas his brother, younger in yeares, & of lesse exercise & experience in armies, was preferred before him in the gouernement of the army, and in all other honors and fauours, then with the memorie of the innumerable benefits which he and his brethren had receiued of Lodowik. Some are of opinion, that Lodowik was aduertised of his reuolting certaine monethes before, and after many deepe cogitations of the disposition of the man, he answered at last with many sighs to him that gaue him the aduertisement, that as he could not be perswaded of so great an ingratitude, so, if it were a thing true, it was an euill whose nature resisted all remedies, and for his part, he knew not in whom to reappose confidence, since in his fauorites, and familiars, and such as had most communicated with his liberalities and benefits, were found dispositions of treason: Affirming (with compassion bringing teares) that he esteemed it not a calamitie lesse hurtfull to depeine himselfe by vaine suspicion of the seruice of personages faithfull, then by too hasty & light credulitie, to reape his surety in the faith of those whose behauiors gaue occasion to doubt them. But in the meane while, the Count Caiazzo makes a bridge ouer Po to ioine with his brother, & entertaining with cunning delays the execution, whilst the bridge is in worke & labour he deferreth to passe, notwithstanding the french army was two dayes afore, entred into Alexandria which they did batter; and Galeas whose strength was a thousand and two hundred men at armes, a thousand & two hundred light horsemen, with three thousand footmen, in the night of the third day without the priuie of any of the Captaines except Luke Muluezzo, fleeth secretly out of Alexandria with a part of the light horsemen, giuing the whole world to know, to his great dishonour, and no lesse reproch to the wisdom of Lodowyk, how great difference was betweene the sport to manage a Courser, & run at tilt and torney with huge Launces (exercises wherein he exceeded most Italians) and the office to be a Captaine of an army: And how much those Princes beguile themselves to their harmes, who, in the election of men to manage and commaund ouer affaires of daungerous importance, beare more regard to the fauour of such whom they choose, then to their vertue & ability. As soone as it was knowne in Alexandria that Galeas was fled, such as remained in the army (example doing much in cases of aduersitie) began in generall tumult, to show disorder, disobedience, and all the other euils that inflict an armie abandoned: some fled, some hid themselves, and some wandred at aduventure, without all hope of fortune: by occasion whereof, the french army (running with the oportunitie) entred the towne at the breake of day, and not only stripped all the souldiers that were there, but with an vnbridled libertie of warre, put the whole city to sacke. There ran a bruite, that Galeas was commanded by secret letters subsigned with the name of Lodowyk Sforce, that for a certaine mutinie then risen at Myllan, he should retire thither immediatly with all his bands: But some were of opinion that the letters were falsly made and forged by the Count Caiazzo, as by that meane to make more easie the victorie of the french: The letters Galeas was wont to show afterwards for his iustification, as though he had bin charged by the same, to abandon rashly his armie, and not to leade it safe into places where he knew he could leaue it in security. But to what inuention so euer the letters were referred, or to what intentions so euer they were interpreted, his excuses are not so credible, as it is holden: most certaine with all men, that if in Galeas had bin found any reputation of a Generall, any counsell of a Captaine, or any courage of a man resolute, he might haue made easie the defence of Alexandria, and all the residue beyond Po, with the strength he had: wherein happily fortune would haue honored his valour with good success, for that one part of the french army, being passed the riuer of Bornia a few daies before, and by reason of the sodaine raines falling, albeit they were inclosed betwene the riuers of Bornia and Tanaro, yet Galeas had not the heart to sit vpon them, notwithstanding he was told that certaine of his light horsemen, issued out of Alexandria by the bridge vpon Tanaro which ioyneth the suburbs to the city, had charged them, and almost put to the chase the first battell.

The dishonorable flight of Galeas from Alexandria.

The losse of Alexandria brought no litle astonishment to all the residue of the Duchy of Myllan, not only afflicted more and more with fresh calamities, but also so much the more neare his peril & ruine, by how much the frenchmen hauing passed their army ouer the riuer of Po, were gone to bessege Mortaro, which made them of Paunya put themselves in accord with them: And the Venetians, hauing taken the rocke of Carauage and passed the riuer of Adda vpon a bridge made for present seruice, commanded almost all the countrey euen to Loddy, the whole residue of the places being for the most part drawne into rebellion. And as, when aduersities come, they thunder all at once, so euen at Myllan there was no lesse confusion and feare, then in the other places, for that the multitude, being now weary of their long expectation of chaunge, and the particular factions of Citizens drawing to Monopies and priuate counsels, the whole city conspired and tooke armes, and that with so slender reuerence to their Lord, that his treasurer generall comming from the Castle from soliciting affaires with him, was slaine at noone dayes in the streetes (particular hatreds working no lesse in the conspiracie, then the counsels of such as desired innoation and new things: by reason of which accident, no lesse insolent in the manner, then bloudie in the matter, Lodowyk entring into great feare of his person, and standing naked of all hopes and possibilitie, determined to auoyde the present daunger, not by his vertue to resist, but by his policie: & deuising to leaue the Castle of Myllan in good gard, he found no better remedie for his safety, then to flee into Germany with his children, where carying with him in his person the true aspect of his calamities, he sayd he would solicit Maximilian to come to his ayde and succours, hauing already concluded, or at least held for resolved, the peace with the Swyſſers: following this resolution, he sent away his children accompanied with the Cardinall Aſcanius (come from Rome not many dayes before to succour aswell as he could the affaires of his brother) & with Cardinall S. Seneryn, with whom also he sent his treasure, very much diminished from his auncient proportion: for it is credibly knowne to many, that not eight yeares passed, Lodowyk, to make a glorious bragge of his power, shewed to many Embassadours and others of respect, the estate and substance of his treasure, which at that time, aswell in money, as in plate of gold and siluer, (besides Jewels & wealth of other natures in no small number) amounted to a Million and an halfe of Duckats: but at his departure, according to the opinion of men, it contained not a reckening of two hundred thousand. Assoone as his children were departed, he appointed (notwithstanding many of his friends laboured to turne him) for the gard of the Castell Bernardin de Corto borne at Panya, whom he had nourished & brought vp of long and being at that time Captaine of the castle, he preferred the faith of him, afore all opiniō & trust in his brother Aſcanius offering to take vpon him that charge: he left for that defence three thousand footmen vnder the authority of Captaines in whom he reapposed molt, with proportions of victuals, munitions, and money, sufficient for many moneths. Touching Genes and the affaires there, he determined to recommend them to the honour and confidence of Augustin Adorne (gouernour present) and to his brother John, to whom (the better to assure his faith) he had ioyned in marriage one of the sisters of the S. Seneryns, and sent them forthwith the assignation of the Castle. To the Baromoyes, Gentlemen of Myllan he restored Augmara, Arona and other landes vpon the lake Maioir which he had taken from them: And to Isabell of Aragon the widow of Duke John Galeas, he gaue by reason of her dowrie, the Duchie of Bary and the principalitie of Rossano for thirtie thousand Duckats, notwithstanding she denied to trust him with the son of John Galeas, whom he desired to send with his children into Germany.

The towne of Millan yieldeth to the frenchmen.

After he had established this forme of direction, and in his owne seeming had set downe as much as might suffice for the suretie of things, leauing the towne to the gouernement of it selfe, he departed the second of September with his eyes full of teares, accompanied with the Cardinall of Este, and Geleas S. Seneryn, and for his safety by the way, he had Luke Maluexze with a good troupe of men at armes & footmē. And as he was issuing out of the castle (decay of fortune traynes with it all sorts of discomfort) the Count Caiazzo, seeking to shadow his disloyaltie with some colour, met him and sayd, that seeing he abandoned his estate, he held himselfe acquitted of the oth of warre which he had made to him, and from thence forward to be in full power to professe what seruice he would: and at the instant the Count disclosed to him the titles, names & ensignes of the army of the french king, into whose pay he entered immediatly with the selfe same regiment which he had leauied with the treasure of Lodowyk: who from Coma where he left the Castle in the power of the people, went along the riuer, to Belleasia, & from thence (being set on land) he passed by Bormy & all those places, whereat other times when he was in glory & felicitie he had receiued Maximilian passing then into Italy, rather as a Captaine to him & the Venetians, then with a maiestie & estate of a king of Romans. Betweene Coma and Bormy, he was pursued with bands of the french & the companies of the Count Caiazzo: from which places, leauing garrison within the Castle of Tyrans occupied not many dayes after by the Grisons, he tooke his way towards Spruch, where he vnderstood was the person of the Emperour. After the seedes of aduersity be sown, there is no long expectation for the fruits, which draw to their effects with a swift course, euen as when the cloud is gathered to his thickeſſe, there is an apparance of raine, with a disposition ready to disperse the storme that long hath bin in breeding: for Lodowyk was no sooner departed, the inhabitants of Millan, despatching Embassadors to the french Captains (approching with the whole army within fixe miles of the city) consented with ready and franke wils to receiue them, reseruing the conditions and capitulations till the kings comming, in whom they had many hopes to find great fauours and graces (regard to particular profite preuailing more in them, then any consideration or conscience of obedience to their Lord.) Most of the other places of the Duchie of Myllan made their example a sufficient occasion to reuolt: The Citie of Cremona which was beset with bands of the Venetians (whose yoke the inhabitants abhorred) would also haue done the like, if the french king, that yet would not breake the contract made made with the Venetians, had not compelled the towne to be redred to them. And as in calamities generall examples induce wonderfully, so the Citie of Genes, followed this vniuersall reuolt, (the people, and familie of the Adorneys with Iohn Lewes de Fiesque, striuing who should giue vp the Citie vnto the king.) And to the end that with so great and sodaine ruines against Lodowick (losing in eight dayes so mighty an estate) the world might also discerne the examples of ingratitude, the capitaine of the Castle of Millan, chosē aboue all others for the reputation of his faith and vertue, not abiding so much as one bullet or any forme of assault, deliuered to the French king within twelue dayes after the departure of Lodowick, the Castle, which was supposed to be impregnable: and receiued in recompence of so great disloyaltie a great proportion of money, a company of an hundred Launces, a perpetuall pension, with many other priuiledges and graces: but with such infamy and hate euen amongst the French, that being eschued and reiected of euery one, and persecuted with scornes & reproches, he dyed of thought within few dayes after, tormented belike with shame & the spirit of his conscience which are two mighty and most assured scourges to vex traitors and faithbreakers. The Captaines assigned to him for the seruice of the Castle, did communicate in that infamy, but chiefly Philippin de Feisque, who, trained vp and aduanced by the Duke, and left there for the credite and opinion of his faith, ioyned him selfe to the consent of the Castle keeper to betray their charge (being both made blind with one powder of corrupt promises.) The king receiuing at Lyon the newes of so great a victory, succeeded with a speed swifter then his expectation, made way with great diligence to Millan, where, being receiued with a ioy of the people, equall to the fortune of his victorie, he agreed to the deposing of diuerse tributes and impositions, which as it is an action first requisite in Princes newly possessed of conquest, & a fauour most plausible to people altered: so they of Millan, rayfing their desires aboue reason or order, were not fully satisfied for the opinion they had that the kings liberalitie would make them free from all exemptions: he distributed honorable gifts of reuenues to many Gentlemen of Millan, and amongst other things gaue Viguenua to Iohn Iacques Triunlee in recompence of his merites.

In the selfe same seasons that the French king rammeth this fortune against the Duke of Millan, Paul Vitelli, hauing now reassembled the bands and prouisions of the Florentins to cary with more ease, the victory of Pysa, planted his campe afore the towne of Casina, which, notwithstanding it was sufficiently manned and victualled, with a wonderfull strength of trenches and rampiers, was taken, after the summons of the artillerie, within lesse then fixe and twentie houres: for that, the defendants, beginning now to feare the great ruine which the artillerie had made of their wals being of no strength, ioyning with the forreine soldiers that were within, rendred the place, & compounded onely for their liues and goods, leauing the Commissioners & soldiers of the Pisans wholly to the arbitration of the victors. Immediately after this, (one euill following another,) the towre builded to guard the mouth of the riuer of Arne, and the bastillion of the poole, being abandoned of the Pisans, yeelded at the summons of one onely trumpet: the malice of fortune confounding the valour & vertues of men.) So that the Pisans held no other peeces within the whole countrey then the Castle of Verrucole and the litle towre Askanius, which suffred no vexation of the enemies, both for the incommoditie of the riuer of Arne, which hindred all actions of inuasiōs or assault, and also being so neare Pysa, it stood possible to speedy and ready succours, the importance also of the enterprise required not the losse of so much time: In so much as there remained now no more to get but Pysa, which was an enterprise very hard (according to the discourse of Pisa, such as sounded things with discreffiō) as well for the fortresse of the town, as for the nūbers, vertue, & resolution of the mē that were within it. For, albeit there were within Pisa no forreine soldiers other then Gurū de Rauenna with some very smal troupes, who comming at first in the pay of the Venetians, remained still possessed of that seruice after their regiment was withdrawne: yet there were no small numbers of Citizens and paissants well worthy of account, both for that by a continuall experience of fiue yeares, they were made seruiceable & fit for the warre, and also they nourished such an immoueable resolution of the minde not to returne efsōones vnder the power of the Florentins, that they held for nothing all other aduersities how grievous soeuer they were: And albeit there were no ditches nor trenches before the wals of the City, yet were they very thicke, & of auncient building, with stones so well couched by the facultie of the lyme and sand proper to that countrey, that their resistance was more mighty against the artillerie then is the common sort of wals, and by that benefite, afore they were beaten flat with the earth, the defendants had time and leasure to reenforce their rampiers. But these defences, considered with all the other strengths of the Citie, could not stay the disposition of the Florentins, who, being determined to assault it, were stirred to it the rather by Paule Vitelli, and Rinucce de Marciano, who gaue no small hopes to take it within fiftene dayes. And hauing mustred together a strength of ten thousand footmen, with many Guidons of horsemen, and drawne together according to direction, many other great prouisions, Paule planted his campe there the last of Iuly, not (as many aduised him, & the Florentins desired) on that side to Arne to intercept succours that might come from Lucqua: but on the other side the riuer right ouer against the bastillion and towre of Stampace: where he occupied this reason, that either in taking that fortresse he might the easilier cary the towne, or in respect of the great commoditie of victualls brought from the boroughes about the hils, or at least by some special foresight or coniecture that he had, that the Pisans not suspecting the siege to be planted on that side, had not begun any rampier there as they had done on the other side. The batterie containing twentie peeces of great artillerie, beat vpon the bastillion of Stampace and a great part of the wall as well on the right as left hand, namely from S. Anthonie vntill Stampace, and from thence vntill the watergate, or gate towards the sea built vpon the banke of Arne. And of the contrary, the Pisans (ioyning their labours to their daungers) trauelled day and night, and with them their wiues & other sortes of women no lesse resolute and well disposed then the men: in so much that their valour and labours were some resistance to the furie of the enemies, for that in very few dayes, they had made right against the wall that was battred, a rampier of a great height and largenesse, and a ditch of more then commo depth, being nothing amazed to see many of their companies slaine directly with the bullet, & many wounded with the reuerberation of the same. The shot also so thundred vpon the soldiers in the campe, together with the artillerie from the towne, specially from a platforme that was vpon the towre of S. Marke, that the whole campe was constrained either to remoue their tents to haue better couerture, or else to pitch their Cabinets within the ditches. Many dayes past in this forme of action, wherein albeit they had throwne to the ground a great quantitie of the wall from S. Anthonie vntill Stampace, and had reduced that fortresse into such termes, as the Generall hoped to obaine it without great difficultie, yet, to make the victorie more easie, he continued the battery fro Stampace till the gate to the sea, entertaining in the meane while many skirmishes betweene the wall which they battered, and the rampier; so farre separate from the wals that Stampace remained wholly without the rampier. In one of these skirmishes the Count Rinucce was hurt with a shot of an harguebuze. The Generall determined, as soone as he had won Stampace, to plant there his artillerie, & also vpon the wall which he had battred, by which meanes, giuing (in the flacke) vpon all that side which the Pisans defended, he made his hope of the victory almost certaine. He made at the same time fal towards the rampier (to the end the ditch being filled, the soldiers might enter with more ease) one part of the ruine of the wall which was betweene Stampace and the rampier, which being already shaked, was not now supported but with proppes and matter of wood. On the other side, the Pisans, who, in defending were altogether directed by the counsell of Gurlyn, had made towards S. Anthonie certaine murdering houses within the ditch, to the end that if the enemy descended, it should not be filled vp by them: they had also bestowed vpon the rampiers towards S. Anthonie, much artillerie, and placed their footemen at the foote of the rampier, to the end that things drawing to straits and extremities, they might be opposed with their proper persons against their enemies. At last, Paule Vitelli not willing to deferre any longer the taking of Stampace, the tenth day after he had planted his campe there, gaue the assault at the breake of day: and notwithstanding his soldiers were grieuously vexed with the artillerie of the old citadell, yet, their proper vertue preuailing aboue their present daunger, & the prefence of their Generall assuring much the victory, they tooke it, both with a fortune more speedy, and an action more easie then was looked for, & with such a terrible amaze to the Pisans, that abandoning their rampiers, they fled in all quarters of the citie, yea many, amongst whom was Peter Fambecourte a noble citizen with forty crossebow shot on horsebacke which he had in charge, fled out of Pisa: many did the like, without that the Magistrates made resistance at the gates, in so much as if others of the cape had followed the fortune of that morning, they had caried the towne to the great glory of the Captaine, to whom had bene most happy the successe of that day, which indeede was the beginning of his calamities: for that, not knowing (so he excused him selfe) of the occasion that hapned without thinking of any such, and being not determined to giue the assault

with all the campe, nor to other place then to that towre, he sent not his men onely to assault the rampier where they shold haue found no resistance, but also he made retire most part of his forebands, and they vnderstanding that the fortress of Stampace was won, desiring to make a pillage and pray of the towne, ran thither by heapes to enter. And in the meane while the Pisans (a brute running through the Citie that the enemies followed not the victory) pulhed forward by the lamentable cryes of their wiues and women, who encouraged them rather to chuse death, then to liue vnder the yoke of the Florentins, began to returne with a new valour to the guard of the rampiers: amongst who, Gurlin remembring that from a part or Iawne of Stampace, bending towards the towne, there was a way that led to the gate of the sea which they had before filled vp with earth and wood, and fortified on that side to the campe, but not on that part that looked to Stampace, he caused it to be rampierd and filled vp on that side, and casting a platforme of earth, he cut off the entrey on that part with the artilleries that were bestowed in flanke. Asloone as Stampace was won, Paule caused to be mounted there certaine Falcounets and port peeces, which shot thorough the towne of Pisa, but offended not the rampiers, which albeit were much afflicted with the artillery that was planted below, yet the Pisans redoubling in courage by the importunitie of their daungers, abandoned them not. At the same instant they battred the murdering house towards S. Anthoue, and the water gate, and the defences (Paule Vitell not ceassing to labour to fill vp the trench with earth baskets, the more easilie to take the rampier: Against which oppressions the Pisans, rising in courage, in that they had receiued the night following from them of Lucqua a succour of three hundred footemen, hurled into the trench many sortes of wildfiers: and labouring with a wonderfull resolution of mind and diligence to constrain the campe to abandon the towre of Stampace, they turned directly thither a very great port peece called Bufole, by whose furie the campe was compelled to dismount the artillerie which they had moued aboue: And albeit Paule caused to be braked against it certaine port peeces of his, by the which the mouth of Bufole was choked and broken, yet, sparing not for all that to shoote, they brought in certaine dayes the towre to that reason, that Paule was constrained, not onely to remoue his artillerie, but also to abandon the place. Norwithstanding all this, the Generall would not make himselfe frustrate of the hope he had to cary in the end the victorie, which (according to his custome) desiring to haue with the most suertie, and the least hurt to the armie that could be, albeit in many places there was more the five hundred yeards of the wall vpon the earth, he laboured continually to increase the batterie, to fill vp the ditches with earth, and to fortifie the towre of Stampace, to replant new artilleries, & to beate in flanke the great rampiers which the Pisans had made, labouring with all pollicie and industrie to winne alwayes some commoditie to giue with more suertie, the assault general & determined: which last exploit (notwithstanding he had brought things into that estate that as often as he would haue followed the assault he might haue had great hope of the victorie) he prolonged willingly, to the end the harmes of the army might not deface the honour and reputation of the victorie. And albeit the assistants of the Florentins (to whom euery litle respit was troublesome) and the continuall letters and messages from Florence, ceased not to hasten him to the assault, the better to prevent those impediments that might happen: yet Paule stood firme in his owne counsell, which, albeit might happely be discrete and according to the experience and discipline of warre, yet, it had a contrary fortune: for that the countrey of Pisa, which is full of lakes and marishes betweene the next sea and the Citie, being in that season of the yeare subiect to ayres pestilent, and specially on that side towards the campe, there came vpon the armie in two dayes many diseases, which so wasted & weakened the body of the campe, that when Paule gaue order to prepare to the assault the fourte & twentieth of August, he found so many of his regiments made vnprofitable & vnable for seruice, that those that remained whole & disposed, sufficed not to maintaine the assault: which vnhappy accident, albeit the Florentins and he (who was also sicke) laboured to helpe by leauying new bands of footemen, yet, the influence of the ayre contending against their industrie, made the infection so vehement, that euery day the diminution was found greater then the supply. In so much that their long hope of victorie being now turned into another habit both doubtfull and desperat, and fearing harmes both more speciall and importing, he determined to leaue and breake vp the campe: A resolution much resisted by the Florentins, who aduised him that leauing garrison sufficient within the fortress of Stampace, he would reape with the armie about the confines of Pisa. But he, making this counsell no direction to him, abandoned the towre of Stampace, which he held not tenable, for that it had bin first shaken with his artilleries, and then battred with the great shot of the Pisans: And drawing the whole armie to the way of the sea the fourth of Septemb^r, and not able to traylor his artilleries by land to Cascina, for that the wayes were drowned with waters, he embarked them in the mouth of the riuer of Arne to conuey them to Ljuarne. But fortune striuing against him in this last action, many of the artilleries were sunk in the waters, & a litle after drawne vp againe by the Pisans, who at the same time recouered eftsoones the Towre that gardes the mouth of the riuer. By these occasions (the seruices yea and faith of men, are interpreted by opinion) the ill disposition conceiued alreadie by the people of Florence, was so redoubled with the Magistrates, that within few dayes being called to Cassina by the commissioners, vnder colour to consult into what places they should distribute the companies, he was made prisoner by commandement of the soueraigne Magistrate of the towne, and from thence sent to Florence: where the same night he arriued, being painefully examined by torments, he was executed by the head the day following by sentence of the Magistrate, his brother being almost taken in the same daunger and fortune: for that as the Commissioners sent to apprehend him in the same instant: so, being sicke of the disease he had taken in the Campe, he made semblance to obey them: and rising out of his bed, he conuerted the time that they gaue him to arraie him, into deuises and directions to steale away: In so much as beguiling with diligence, the securitie of the Florentyns, he was in one instant with the helpe of his seruantes, well mounted vpon a horse of speede, and flying to Pisa, he was receiued with generall gladnesse of the whole inhabitants. The principall pointes wherein they quarelled with the life of Pawle Vitelly, and condemned him, were these: That it proceeded of his will onely that Pisa was not taken, hauing good meane and oportunitie thereunto the same day that the rocke of Stampace was forced: That he onely did deferre to giue the assault: That he had many times giuen audience to men comming to him from Pisa, and neuer communicated with the Florentyns: That he had leuyed the Campe against the publike commadement, and with the like contempt had abandoned Stampace: That he had drawne diuerse others of the Captaines to occupie with him Cascina Vicopisan, and the artilleries, to the end that in payments and other conditions they might manage the Florentyns as they thought best: That in the countrey Casentyn, he had had secret intelligences with the Medicis, and at the same time treated and almost concluded with the Venetians, to serue them when the time of his pay with the Florentyns should be determined, which now was almost expired: That, in that respect he had giuen safe conduct to the Duke of Urbyn and to Iuhan de Medicis. He was straitely examined vpon all these pointes, and albeit he confessed nothing particularly, yet they cut off all further examinations, and fearing least the french king (now come to Myllan) would vrge his deliuerie, they proceeded to execute him speedily. Not one of his seruantes which after his death were examined at leasure, would confesse any thing, sauing that he was much discontented with the Florentyns, for that they had made the Count Riunccc concurant with him in authoritie, and for the difficulties they vsed in the expedition of prouisions which he demanded, and sometimes in his affaires particular, not forbearing at Florence to speake ordinarily to his dishonour: by which testimonies and confessions of his seruantes, albeit some remained possessed of this opinion, that he behaued himselfe not loyally in his charge, hauing a pretence to be Lord of Pisa, and to occupie some other part of the demaine of Florence, where he entertayned many intelligences and amities: yet the most part beleecued well of his innocencie, and were perswaded that he nourished a great desire to take Pisa, for the reputation and glory that would redound to him, the principall end and respect of euery great Captaine.

king being at Myllan compoundeth with the most parte of the Poten-tates of Italy.

The french king, being now arriued at Myllan, all the Potentates of Italy except king Federik, came to him, some in person, and some by Embassadors, some to congratulate his victorie, and some to iustifie themselves of the imputation to be more inclined to Lodowik Sforce then to him, and some to seeke suertie of him hereafter of their proper estates. The king receiued them all graciously, and compounded with them all, but diuersly according to the diuersitie of conditions, & according to the greatnesse of the profit which he might draw: he tooke the Marquis of Mantua into his protection, and endued him with a companie of an hundred Launces, with an honorable pension and the order of S. Michael: he receiued likewise into his protection the Duke of Ferrara (he and the Marquis were with his Maiestie in person) who pertaked not in that benefite without well paying for it, with other other difficulties, for that euer since he rendred the castle castile of Genes to Lodowick, he hath bin esteemed to beare a mind contrary to the french: he accepted also into his grace and protection (but vnder a great summe of mony) Iohn Bentiuole who had sent to him his sonne: But of all the residue, the Florentyns compounded with him most hardly and chargeably, for that (their merits all forgotten, and the harmes they had so long time endured during the late king, in following the friendships of Fraunce) all the court almost was against them, those reasons were not accepted that (not to stir vp Lodowick Sforce against them, for the matters of Pisa) had constrained them to remaine Newters: for that the impression which the frenchmen tooke when king Charles gaue libertie to the Pisans, remained yet firmly fixed in their affections, besides that the men of warre of the campe, iudged them (both by brute and experience) to be men of meir, valour, and reputation for seruice, which drew not a litle their dispositions to beare them fauour. Besides, the authoritie of Trinulce was no small impediment to the purposes of the Florentyns, for that aspiring ambitiously to the Lordship of Pisa, he fauoured wholly their cause, who desired to receiue for their Lord either him or any other in whom was abilitie to defend them against the Florentyns: who were generally blamed by the mouthes of the whole Court for the death of Paule Vitelly, as to execute without occasion, a Captaine of so great merit, and to whom the Crowne of Fraunce owed much in honour and friendship, for that his brother was killed and he made prisoner in the french seruice during the warres of Naples vnder the late king Charles. But in the end, the king inclining more to his proper profit then to things vaine, entred into composition, by the which his Maiestie receiuing them into his protection, bound himselfe to defend them against all men with sixe hundred Launces and foure thousand footmen, as also the Florentyns to defend his estates in Italy with foure hundred men at armes and three thousand footmen: That the king at their requests, should apply that ayde of Launces, and (if neede were) a strength of artillerie, for the recouering of Pisa & the places occupied by them of Sienna and Lus-gua, but not of those peeces which the Genoways held: And that, if these companies were not demaunded of him before, he should be bound, when he sent an armie to the enterprise of Naples, to conuert either the whole or part of it to this expedition: That the Florentyns, if they recouered Pisa, and not other wayes, should be bound to minister to him for the conquest of Naples siue hundred men at armes, and fiftie thousand Duckats to defraie the payes of the Swysers for three moneths: that they should restore to him thirtie thousand duckats which Lodowick Sforce had lent them, rebaring (according to the account which Iohn Iacques Tryvulce should make) so much as they had payd or dispended for him: Lastly, that they should take for Captaine generall of their men of warre, the Prefect of Rome, brother to the Cardinal S. P. ad Vincula, at whose instance it was demaunded. In so goodly an occasion, the ambition of the Pope slept not, who, soliciting earnestly to haue promise kept with him, the king gaue to the Duke Valentino (comming with him out of Fraunce) three hundred Launces defraied vpon the treasurs of the king, & guided by Yues D' Alegre, & foure thousand Swysers vnder the charge of the Bailiffe of Dyon, but paid of the Popes purse, which companies were for his ayde in the warre which he meant to make vpon the Vickaires of Romagna.

The townes of Romagna, vexed with others that are subiect to the Church with sundry accidents, haue bene for many yeares gouerned with a iurisdiction almost separate from the demaine of the Church: for that some of the Vickaires paid not their tributes as they ought in homage of superioritie, others payd them, but with difficultie and hardnesse, and for the most part out of season. But they all indifferently without licence of the Popes, put them selues in pay with other Princes: wherein much lesse that they made exceptions not to serue them against the Church, but of the contrary, they bound themselves to protect them euen against the authoritie and armes of the Popes, being so much the more plausible to those Princes, by how much they were conuenient for their seruice, both for the opportunity of their estates and forces, and withall to hinder that the power and pride of the Popes should not swell and rise aboue order. In that time the Venetians possessed in Romagna the cities of Rauenna and Ceruia, which they had (not many yeares before) taken from the familie of Polenta, a people who, of Citizens priuat of Remenna, were become Tyrants ouer their country, and afterwards had the inuastiture of Vickaires: Faenza, Furly, Imola, and Rimini, were in the power of Vickaires particular: Cesena, that had bene long commaunded by the familie of Malateste was estoones returned to the Church Dominick, the last Vickaire of the same city being dead without children certaine yeares before. (whose ambition was greater then his doctrine) pretending that those Cities for many respects were diuolued to the sea Apostolike, and that he would reestablishe & reduce them to their ancient iurisdiction, (but indeed had intention to appropriat them to Cesar his sonne) had contracted with the french king, that when he had accomplished his conquest of the Duchie of Millan, he should contribute and communicate with him for the recovery only of those townes which were possessed by the Vicaires, comprehending the City of Desera, whereof was Vicaire Iohn Sforce, aforetime his son in law: for, the greatnesse of the Venetians did not suffer, that those thoughts should stretch out against them, who did not aspire at that time to those little townes, which continuing vpon the riuer of Po, were holden by the Duke of Ferraria. In so much that the Duke Valentimo, as soone as he had obtained of the king the bands promised, and ioyned them to the regiments of the Church, he entred into Romagna, where he tooke with a speede & fortune aboue his expectation, the city of Imola by accord, & that about the latter end of the yeare a thousand foure hundred ninetie and nine, a yeare wherein Italy being afflicted with so many emotions, felt also a scourge by the Turkes armies: for, Baiazet Ottoman hauing assailed with a mightie armie by sea, the peeces which the Venetians held in Greece, sent by land an armie of sixe thousand horsemen to pray the countrey of Fryull, and finding it without gard, they ouerranne it, making pillage and burnings euen vntill Lyuence: and hauing taken an innumerable proportion of prisoners, when they came neare the riuer of Tagliamento (to returne with the more ease) they reserued such as they thought they might leade with them in safety, and made cruell murders of the others. And as it is a custome infallible with fortune, not to let happen one mischief vnaccompanied, so in Greece, the affaires of the Venetians trained no better successe, for that Anthonie Gryman Captaine Generall of the army which the Venetians opposed against the enterprise of the Turkes, was accused to haue let slip the occasion to vanquish the enemies that issued out of the port of Sapience, and another time at the mouth of the Gulphe of Lepanto: And after he was deposed and another preferred to his place, they cyted him to Venice, recommending the information of the cause to the counsell of the Pregati, where that cause was debated many moneths with no small expectation of the issue (his authoritie and greatnesse defending him on the one side, and on the other part, his accusers pursuing him with many arguments & testimonies. At length, standing in great likelihood to haue the vpper hand, either by his authoritie, or the great number of his parents, or lastly for that in that counsell compounded vpon many wise men, there should not be so much regard to the generall brutes & slaunders which were not well proued, as to a desire to vnderstand ripely the truth of the fact: the knowledge of the cause was transferred ouer to the iudgement of the great counsel, by the Magistrate of the aduocates of the communalitie, where fauours ceassing, or rather the lightnesse of the multitude carying more then the grauity of the Senators, he was in the end passed into exile perpetuall in the Ile of Espera.

Such & so great matters were brought to passe in the yeare 1499. But in the yeare 1500. were accomplished things of no lesse importace, nor lesse worthy of memory, specially for the full remission of that vaine & superstitious Iubiley, which being instituted in the beginning by the Popes to be celebrated the Iubiley from a hundred yeares to an hundred yeares, not for pleasure & pompe as the Romains did in their sports and feasts secular, but for an opinion (vaine and erroneous) of the health of soules, for that in the same (according to the fantastike beliefe of Christian people) were abolished wholly all the finnes of those, who acknowledging with true repentance their faultes committed, made visitation of the Churches of Rome dedicated to the Prince of the Apostles. It was afterwards ordained to be celebrated from fifty yeares to fifty, and in the end reduced to five and twenty. But for the more solemne memory of his primitive institution, the hundredth yeare was celebrated with a greater affluence of people then the others.

mistakes Furly.

In the beginning of this yeare, the Duke Valentimo, obtained without resistance the City of Furly, the Lady of the place hauing sent her children and riches most precious to Florence, and abandoned that which she could not defend, did determine to hold onely the Citadell and Rocks, of Furly refurnished with sufficient strength of men and artilleries. She had a valour aboue the property of that sex, and a resolution more resembling a man then a woman, wherewith entring the place, she studied to her great glory how to defend it. But the Duke Valentimo, after he had assaied in vaine to dispose her to yeld, began to batter the wall of the Citadell with a great furie of artillerie, the same bringing downe to the ground a great quantitie of the wall, with the which the earth of the Rampier which was behind being choked, filled almost the depth of the ditch or trench, and made the entrie more easie to his souldiers. By meane whereof, the defendants falling into feares and doubts, gaue place to their perils and abandoned the place, seeking to retire into the Rocke; whither the Ladie made also her retraite after she had performed all that could be required in the office of a defendant. But, as when things are in aduersitie, many occasions concur to aduance the end: so as she entred the Rocke, feare raised a tumult and confusion, and the Dukes souldiers comming fast vpon them, almost all her companies were cut in peeces, and the Victors entring with the same furie into the Rock, tooke it, & made slaughter of all such as were there for defence, except certaine of the chieft, which were retired with the Ladie into a Towre, who were made prisoners, & she also communicating in their fortune, whom the Duke (hauing more regard to her valour, thē to her kind) sent prisoner to Rome, where she was kept in the Castle of S. Ange, being notwithstanding deliuered a litle after at the request of Yue D'alegre.

After the Duke had obtained Ymola and Furly, he marched to the execution of other townes, but new accidents hapning vnlooked for, hindred his expedition: for, after the French king had established the things he had gotten, with orders conuenient, and hauing prolonged the truce with the king of Romanes, (comprehending therein the Duchie of Millan and all that he held in Italy) vntill the moneth of May next ensuing, he returned into France, leading with him the litle sonne of John Galeas giuen to him indiscreetly by the mother; he dedicated him to a monasticall life, & left John Iacques Triunlce gouernor generall of the Duchie of Millan, in whom he reposed much, as well for his valour & merits, as for the great enuie he bare to Lodowyk Sforce. But (the faith of men changing with the alteration of kingdomes) the peoples of that state kept not fidelity with the king: partly for that the customes and behauiours of the French were intolerable to many, and partly for that they had not found in the king that liberalitie in deposing all their tributes, which vnwisely they perswaded theselues to obtaine. And lastly it imported much, and was very grieuous to all the Gebelyn faction, which was mightie in the towne of Millan and confines, that Triunlce chiefe of the Guelfes should be preferred to the gouernment. This euill disposition was wonderfully augmented by him selfe, who, bearing a nature factious, and a spirit haucie and busie, fauored (vnder the authoritie of Magistrate) much more then was conuenient, those that were of his partie. Besides (he that is falling shal find many stumbling blocks) he estranged much frō him the minds of the communitie, for that in the open market place, he slue with his owne hand certaine Butchers, who, following the rashnesse of the other populars refusing to pay tributes, frō the which they were not exempted, resisted with force, the ministers deputed to gather the reuenues: for which tyrannous and bloudie reasons, most part of the nobilitie & communitie, naturally desirous of new things, wished the returne of Lodowike, & euen began to call vpon his name with words and voices plaine and to be vnderstood. But after many thoughts and cares traouelling commonly minds afflicted, and redoubled with a lamentable remembrance of his happinesse past, Lodowike with his brother Askanius presented himselfe to Maximilian, of whom they were receiued with an humanitie expressing both compassion and comfort, for that he did not onely perswade them to be resolute in their fortune, but also shewed many tokens to be much discontented with their calamities: he nourished them with continuall promises to descend in their aide in person, and with a strong armie to ioine with them for the recouerie of their estates, hauing thereunto good oportunitie, for that he was then at accord with the Swissers. But those hopes, both for the variation of his nature, and for that his intentions ill grounded, were easly confounded, appeared euery day to be more vaine; and that so much the rather, by how much being continually pressed with his accustomed necessities, he made them wearie with his importunate demaunds for money: in so much as Lodowik & Askanius making no foundation of his succours, and lesse certaintie in his hopes and promises, determined to make the enterprize of theselues, being continually solicited by many gentlemen of Millan, & did leauy for their better strength, eight thousand Swissers, & five hundred Burgonion men at armes: of which strong preparation Triunlce gathered many feares and doubts, & therefore, the better to encounter so great a danger, he sent immediatly to the Senat of Venice to cause their cōpanies to march along the riuier of Adda, signifying withall to Yues D'alegre, that it were necessary to leaue for a time the seruice of the Duke Valémois, & return with speed to Millā with the Frēch mē at armes & the Swissers. And as dangers hastie and sudden can suffer no delays of remedie, & where the fire beginneth first to kindle, there let water be speedily applied to preuent his further violence. So such was the pollicie of Trinulce, that to resist the first furie of the enemies, he sent one part of his souldiers to Coma, (the ieaousie he had of the people of Millan not suffering him to turne thither all his forces:) but the care and quicknesse of Sforce and his brother, preuailed aboue all diligence in others, for that not tarying for the whole armie they had leauied, but leauing order to march after them with speed according to the necessitie of their perill, they passed the mountaines, & with a diligence aboue all expectation being embarked in those vessels which were in the lake of Coma, they approched neare that towne, which they tooke without resistance (the French being retired for the knowledge they had of the ill disposition of the inhabitants. The brute of the losse of Coma (same flieth with swifter wings in cases of reuolt & change, then in any other matter) being come to Millan, so altered the minds of the people, and almost all the chieft of the faction Gebelyn, that they began to draw into manifest tumult, and rise into such insolent disposition, that Trinulce seeing no other remedie to the kings affaires, retired suddenly into the Castle, and the night following fled to Nonaro, together with the men at armes which were retired into the Parke ioyning to the Castle (the people in their retraite following them by heapes vntill the riuier of Tbesin): and leauing within Nonaro foure hundred Launces, he with the residue of his strength went to Mortaro, thinking (& the other Captaines also) that they should more easily recouer the Duchie of Millan with the new succors that were to come out of Fraunce, then be able to defend it being thus deuided: Such is the incertaintie of fortune, that she transferreth to one that which she takes from another, not regarding the equitie of causes, nor the merits of persons, but making her fancie the measure of her actions, she takes delight to shew variation of power vpon the Princes of the earth: for, as soone as the Frenchmen were gone from Millan, the Cardinall Askanius made his entrie first, and then Lodowike, who recouering it in as short time and litle difficultie as he lost it (except the Castle) was also made glad at his return with a more franke & general shew of affection and ioy of the people of Millan, then they expressed when he departed. The like disposition was found in other Cities & comunalties, as in Pavia & Parma, declaring immediatly for Lodowike, whose example Lody & Plaisance had followed, if the bands of the Venetians (marched afore towards the riuier of Ad-da) had not bene entred. Alexandria, and almost all the places beyond Po, being furthest from Millan and nearest to Ast which was french, stirred not, determining to take aduise what they should do vpon the issue and traine of things. Lodowike being thus repossessed of Millan, made speedy leauies of as many Italian footmen & men at armes as he could, labouring, by petition, by offers, and all maner of hopes, all those in whom he had anie reason to expect succours in so great necessitie. Therefore he aduertised the Emperour by Galeas S. Senerin of his happie beginning, beseeching him to supply him with men & artilleries. And because it stood not with his fortune, & also was farre from his desire, to haue the Senate of Venice his enemy, he gaue direction that the Cardinall Askanius should speedily send the Bishop of Cremona to Venice, to offer them the ready will and inclination of Lodowike, to accept such conditions as it pleased the to demaund: but the constancy of the Senat of Venice made vaine all that labour, for that they determined not to exchange their confederation with the French king, for the vncertain & newly reconciled friendships of Lodowike. The Genoways, notwithstanding the importunate solicitations of Lodowike, refused to returne vnder his obedience: and the Florentines wold not heare his request touching the repaiment of the mony which he had lent the: only the Marquis of Mantua sent to him his brother with a certaine proportion of men at armes: there came to him also the Lords of Mirandola, of Carpy, and Corege, and the Siennois relieued him with small summes of money: succours almost contemnible in so great dangers, as also did litle import the aids of Philip Rosse and of the Veminesques, whose fathers albeit had bin dispoiled by him of their ancient liuings: yet Philip, leauing without leaue the pay of the Venetians, wet thither to recouer his lands, & hauing obtained them, ioyned himself to the army of Lodowike: the famuly of Verma did the like, and they both to reenter into grace by that occasion. Lodowike ioyning diligence to his fortune, & not vsing the fauor of the time in vaine, after he had assembled a thousand five hundred men at armes, besides the Burgonian bands of horsemen, and layed to the regiments of Swissers many Italian footmen, he left the Cardinall before the Castle, and passed ouer Tbesin: & obtaining by accord the towne & Castle of Vigenena, he laid siege to Nonaro, chusing that enterprise afore the expugnation of Mortaro, either for that the french had made strong fortifications at Mortaro, or else for that he esteemed Nonaro (a towne renowned and plentifull with all things) so import more for the reputation and substance of the warre, or perhaps he imagined; that the recovery of that towne would breed want of victuals, and so constrain the French that were within Mortaro to abandon it: or at least he cast, that it would hinder Tue D'alegre from entering Nonaro, who was now marching from Remagna: for, as soone as he had receiued aduertisements from Trivulce (leaving the Duke Valentinus in the enterprise of Pesero) he departed speedily with all the horsemen and the Swissers: and vnderstanding neare to Parma, the rebellion of Milan, he accorded with those of Parma and Plaisance not to offend them, so that they would not hinder his passage: & being come neare Tortona, he entered the towne, where, at the instigation of the Guelfes of that Citie, burning in desire to be reuenged of the Gebelyns, who (returned to the deuotion of Lodowike) had expelled them, he put all to sacke and spoile, (the Guelfes crying out in vaine of his faith, for that their loyaltie was no better respected, but being the kings faithfull seruants, they were no otherwise vsed, then belonged to the deseruings of his most traiterous enemies: from Tortona he marched into Alexandria, where he stayed, for that the Swissers of his armie, either because they were not payed, or for some other secret reason, left him, and went to the Duke of Milans Campe, whose strength being now greater then his enemies, he prepared speedily to the battery of Nonaro, to the end to carrie it afore the french (expecting succours from the king) were strong enough to encounter him in the field; a matter which succeeded happily to him: for that the french bands that were within Nonaro, having no reason of hope, or possibilitie to defend it, agreed to deliuer vp the towne, receiuing the promise of his faith to depart in suertie with all their goods, which he kept iustly with them, protecting them with safeconduite to Verceil. And albeit he was perswaded by many, that the ouerthrowing of those bands was of great importance for his victorie, wherein they occupied these reasons; that if it were lawfull, according to the authoritie and examples of great men, to breake faith to conquer a Lordship of another, that it was more lawfull to straine both oth, faith, and all promises, to keepe that which was his owne: yet he abstained from all violation; having regard to the estate of his perils, and fraile condition of his fortune. After he had got Nonaro; he deuised how he might haue the Castle: but it was beleueed, that if he had aduanced to the enterprise of Mortaro, all the french bands had fled afore him ouer Po, (Trivulce and the Lord of Ligny not agreeing well together.)

Whilest Lodowike was in these expeditions, following the fortune that best led him to the reconquering of his estates, no lesse care and diligence occupied the french King, who, vnderstanding the rebellion of Milan, digested it with no small griefe and discontentment: and therefore (so deigne mischiefs requiring speedie remedies) he dispatched with a wonderfull speed into Italy, Marquis de Trumouille with sixe hundred Launces, and sent to leaue a great regiment of Swissers, (following an ancient and assured experience of warre, to repress with a strong force a rebellion in an estate newly conquered.) And lastly, to the end there might be an exact diligence in all prouisions; he created the Cardinall of Amboise his Lieutenant for Italy, and dispatched him immediatly to Ast: In so much as all things prepared with a quicke readinesse; there was mustred in Italy for the king in the beginning of Aprill, a strength of fiftene hundred Launces, ten thousand Swissers footmen, and sixe thousand of the kings subiects, vnder the leading of Trumouille, Trivulce, & Ligny: which companies being drawne into one Campe at Mortaro, marched to Nonaro, hauing no lesse confidence in treason, then in their forces: for that the Swissers Captaines which were with Lodowike, had secret intelligence and practise of conspiracie with them by the meanes of their countrey men which serued in the French armie (notwithstanding in the action of Nonaro they shewed faith, valour, and good stabilitie of affection.) whereof Lodowike being iealous by many apparant coniectures, laboured much (his necessities being violent) to ioine to him the foure hundred horsemen and eight thousand footmen which were leuied at Milan. But as a ruine determined runs to his end by a proportion of degrees and parts measured and limited: so at Nonaro the Swissers, stirred vp by their Captains, began to mutine, taking their occasion for that their payes were not performed at the iust dayes that were promised. And albeit the Duke ran to the stir in person, & besides his pitiful requests & prayers, retaining with them great occasion of compassion, gaue amongst the all his silver plate & vessel, desiring to rest contented but till the money came from Milan. Yet the Swissers Captaines fearing that if the bands which were leuied at Milan should be ioined to the

Campe, their treason would suffer either imperfection or preuention, wrought so that the french Campe being all put into armes and readinesse, approached the walles of Nouaro, and enuironing a great part of the towne, they dispatched certaine horsemen to occupie the wayes betwene the Citie and the riuer of Tbesin, to cut off from the Duke and all others, all meanes to fly to Millan. But as necessitie is mighty to make men resolute, so the Duke seeing more and more into his perils, and that almost the whole disposition of his Campe agreed with the state of his dangers, sought to issue out of Nouaro with his whole armie to fight with the enemy, hauing already sent out in order the light horsemen and the Burgonions to begin the skirmish: but he was apparantly resisted by the Swysser Captaines, who told him they would not come to blowes with their parents, brethren, and countrey men, without the leaue of their Lords, but made as though they would depart sodainly into their countrey. The Duke not able either by praiers, with teares, or infinit promises to practise any whit their barbarous disposition, made election of the best part of his aduersitie, and recommended himselfe wholly vnto them, at least that they would leade him to a place of suertie: a misery so much the more lamentable, by how much the condition of his affaires & perils, constrained him to seeke for his safety, where he saw nothing but apparant arguments of conspiracie against his life: wherein in this was hee most miserable and vnhappie, that being so neare the last action of recouerie of his estates, he was not only depriued of the glory of his vjctorie, but also (fortune is infinit in malice) passed ouer to a desolation irreparable, and a ruine whereunto remaineth no other consolation, hope, or mercy, then such as may be expected of an enemy ambitious, iniurious and reuengeful. But the Swyssers hauing contracted with the french Captaines to go their wayes, and not to leade him with them, albeit their crueltie would not suffer them to graunt to his full demaund, yet in compassion they consented that he should march away amongst them, taking the attire and furniture of one of their footemen; and so, if he were not knowne, to saue himselfe by the helpe of his fortune: which condition he was driuen to accept for a last necessitie, but yet it was not sufficient for his safetie: for that, they marching by direction through the midst of the french armie, he was vnhappily knowne by the diligent espiall of such as were assigned to that charge; or (more likely) disclosed by some secret instruction of the Swyssers, as he marched in a Squadron on foote, attired and armed and disguised in all points as a Swysser; and hasting to his last calamitie, he was by that meanes made prisoner. A spectacle so lamentable, that it brought teares into the eyes of many, yea euen of the very enemies, Galeas, S. Senerin, Frecaissa, and Anthony Marsa his brethren, communicated with his fortune, being betraied by the same disloyaltie of the Swyssers. After the Duke was taken, the army went dispersing, & no more resistance appearing, all things were seene full of feare and confusion: which made the Cardinal Askanius, who had already sent towards the Camp those bands that were leauied at Millan, to leaue the Castle, and seeke his suertie in some place of better trust. Many of the nobility of the Gebelyns folowed him, who being too apparantly declared for Lodowick, dispaired to find pardon with the french. But as it was set downe in destiny, that in the calamitie of the two brethren, treason should be mingled with euill fortune: so he had determined to reappose himselfe somewhat the night after at Riuolta in the countrey of Plaisance, which is a borough appertaining at that time to Conrard de Lande, a Gentleman of the Citie of Plaisance and his kinsman and auncient friend. The same Conrard, chaunging will with fortune, sent presently to Plaisance for Charles Vrsin and Sonzin Benzon then in the paye of the Venetians, to whom he deliuered the said Askanius & Hermes Sforce brother to the late Duke Iohn Galeas, with one part of the Gentlemen that came with him; the residue, being more happie or more wise, forbore their rest that night, and passing further, preuented their perill. Askanius was immediately led prisoner to Venice, but the french King, iudging it necessarie for the suretie of the Duchie of Millan to be possessed of him, sent for him to Venice, where finding some difficultie to deliuer him, he required him with protestations and threats, alleaging, that he appertained to him in due property and interest, for that he was taken in a countrey of his obedience: A request which albeit seemed very sharpe and vnworthie of the name of the Venetian State, yet, because the fury of his armies, it was graunted, more by compulsion then conscience; and not onely the person of the Cardinal deliuered, but also all those of Millan that were taken with him: and withal, Baptiste Viscount with other Nobles of Millan, which were withdrawne for the same occasion into the townes of Guaradadda vnder safe conduit to remaine there in suerty with expresse mention of the french King, were put into the Kings handes for feare of the french armie: so much

• so much did preuaile with the Senat of Venice the terror of the french forces, more then the regard to the dignitie of their common weale. The citie of Millan abandoned of all hope, yeelded to the generall calamitie, and sent speedie Embassadors to the Cardinall of Amboise to solicit for pardon: he receiued them into grace, and pardoned the rebellion in the name of the King, but vnder this bond, to pay three hundred thousand duckats, of the which the King acquitted them afterwarde of a great part. He pardoned also other townes that had rebelled, which he taxed according to their qualitie, making the victorie profitabie, and the transgressions of the offenders an increafe of the Kings treasure.

The enterprise thus happily succeeding, and the regiments of men of war dissolued & licensed, the footmen of the foure Cantons of Swissers which be more neare then the others to the Towne of Bellizona situated within the mountaines, tooke the Towne as they returned to their countrey: a place which the french King might haue drawne from them in the beginning, for a verie small portion of mony. But as he lost oftentimes by the propertie of his nature, occasions of great things, by sparing small proportions of expences: so times & accidents came so about afterwards, that many times, and by many solicitations, he would haue purchased it of them with a verie great price, for that it is a straite very conuenient to hinder the descending of the Swissers into the Duchie of Millan. Lodowike Sforce was caried to Lyon where the King was, and entring the towne at noone dayes, many multitudes of people flocked to see a Prince, who, from such a greatnesse & maiestie, and for his felicitie enuied of many, was fallen into so great a miserie: and not able to obtaine leaue to be brought to the Kings presence, which he much desired, he was conueyed within two dayes after to the Towre of Loches, wherein he remained prisoner ten yeares, euen to the end of his life, being now inclosed in one strait prison the thoughts & ambition of him, which earst could scarcely be contained within the limits and termes of all Italy: A Prince, certainly most excellent for his eloquence and industrie, and for many gifts of nature and spirit, a creature of verie rare perfection: and lastly not vnworthy of the name of myld and merciful, if the death of his Nephew had not defiled him with bloudie infamie. But on the other side, he caried a mind vaine and full of thoughts busie and ambitious, and nourishing alwayes intentions dissembled, he kept no reckening of his promises and faith. He alwayes presumed so much of him selfe, that seeming to be discontented, when praises were giuen to the wisdom and counsels of others, he perswaded himself to be able by his Art and industrie to alter and turne the conceptions of euery one to what purpose he listed. The Cardinal Askanius followed him a litle after, but he was both receiued with more honor and humanitie, and graciously visited by the Cardinall of Amboise, by whose intercession he was sent to the great Towre of Bourges, a prison more honorable, wherein the King that sent him, had bin restrained two yeares in captiuitie: So variable and miserable is the destinie of man, and so incertaine to euery one what will be his condition in time to come.

THE FIFT BOOKE OF THE

THE ARGUMENT.

THe warre of Pisa continueth: The Duke Valentino pursueth his enterprise of Romagna: The Kings of Spaine and France innade ioyntly the kingdome of Naples, they occupie it and deuide it betweene them, and afterwarde make warre one vpon another: The Duke Valentino putteth to death the Vrsins: The Swissers descend into the Duchie of Millan: The Spaniards remaine victors ouer the French at Corignolo, and take Naples.

Such is the disposition of minds occupied with ambition, that who are desirous of glorie, are easily stirred to do things contrarie to reason, counsell and experience: Ambition is an humour that carieth men into weenings farre aboue the possibilitie of their proper power, & ouerruleth their thoughts without regard to the oportunitie of times, places, or occasions: as is expressed in the inclination of the French king, in whom the absolute and happy conquest of the Duchie of Myllan, had nourished such spirits of will and courage, that the selfe same sommer he would haue proceeded to the enterprise of the kingdome of Naples; had not the feare which he had of the descending of the Almains, restrayned his rashnesse, and made him wise against the proprietie and working of his will: For, notwithstanding he had (the yere before) obteyned a contract of truce of Maximilian Caesar, wherein the Duchie of Myllan was comprehended: yet, Maximilian debating with better consideration, how much the maiestie of the Empire would be diminished by the alienation of so principall a Chiefe, and what dishonour would follow him for suffering to be deuested from it Lodowike Sforce, who not onely had put himselfe vnder his protection, and reapposed wholly in the hopes which he gaue him: But also, had bound himselfe to his succours by receiuing his money at sundry times, and in great quantities: He would no more heare the Embassadours of the French, and refused also all audience to the Agents of the Venetians, as vsurpers of certaine places appertaining to the Empire. And lastly, ioyning to the memorie of auncient ielousies & iniuries done to him and his predecessors in diuers seasons by the house of France, the inflamed compassion which he had of the miserable calamities of the two brethren: he held many generall diots and assemblies, to stirre vp the electors and other Princes of Germany to ioyne in the quarrell and reuenge of so high wrongs committed no lesse against him then the whole nation of Germany, to whom the imperiall dignity was proper. And to giue better operation to his purpose in the minds of the Germane Princes, he laid before them considerations of dangers that might happen, if the French king, presuming more and more by so great a patience of the Princes of the Empire, and rising into pride by so many fauours of victory and fortune, would so farre aspire, as to let the crowne Imperiall vpon the heads of french kings, and incorporate the soueraigne estate in that forreine familie as had bene done afore times: whereunto the Pope would consent easily, partly by necessitie (not able to resist his power) and partly for the respect of his sonne, whom he studied to make to excell in greatnesse & dignity, not remembring that those authorities are vniust, whose meanes be vnlawfull, and that the vertuous man should not obtrude into rule, but receiue it as if he were thereto compelled.

This was the cause why the king (not knowing to what end the race and course of his plottes might runne, tooke truce with his enterprises, and deferred till an other time the execution of his thoughts touching the warre of Naples. By reason & meane whereof, his men of warre being not intangled with other enterprise, he was contented to giue to the Florentines those bands & regiments which they did demand for the recouering of Pisa & Pietrasanta: And yet not without many doubts & difficulties, for that both the Pisans, the Genowayes, the Siennoyes, and they of Lucqua, made great instance to the contrary, offering to giue the king presently an hundred thousand crowns vpon condition that Pisa, Pietrasanta, and Mont Pulcian might be protected from the harmes and ambition of the Florentines, and to make to him a perpetuall payment of fiftie thousand duckats yearly, if the Pisans by his meanes obtained the fortresses of the port of Lsuorne, with all the region of Pisa. To these offers it seemed that the mind of the king was much inclined, by a couetous desire of money: notwithstanding (as was his familiar custome in things of importance), he referred the counsell and deliberation of all things, to the Cardinall of Amboyse, who was then at Millan: afore whom, notwithstanding the importunities & labours of the states afore named, did negociat with great diligence I. Iacques Tryuulce, and I. Lowyes de Fie/que they both nourishing an equall desire to manage the iurisdiction of Pisa, & in that respect offred to pay to the king for the graunt, a great proportion of money, alleaging withall that (the oportunitie & occasion concurring) it was an action meete for his suretie to hold vnder the Florentines, & keepe in weaknesse the other Potentates of Italy. But the Cardinall preferring integrity afore particular fauor, ioyned to the faith & promise giuen by the king, the consideration of the late merites of the Florentines, who, expressing a liberall and ready ayde to his enterprise & conquest of Millan, conuerted at his request into bands and strength of men, the payments of money which they were bound to pay in that case: and therefore it was resolved to refurbish the Florentines for the recouery of Pisa (besides the restitution of Pietrasanta and Matron) with a regiment of sixe hundred Launces paid by the king, and fise thousand Smyssers vnder the Bailiefe of Dyon with a proportion of Gascons at their owne charges, together with all such sorts of Artilleries and Munitions as should be necessaie for that enterprise. They had also against the kings will, and their meanings a strength of two thousand Swysers more (such is the custome of that nation) of all which cōpanies Monfr Beaumont had the charge, for that the Florentines, retayning a memorie of his auncient readinesse to render to them Lyorne, reapposed more in him then in any other, and in that humor demanded him for their Generall, not considering, that in matters of enterprise, authoritie & knowledge in things of warre, is no lesse necessarie in a leader of an army, then faith: for that in warre, neither the multitude of souldiers, nor the puissance vnskilfull, can so much auaille to the victory, as knowledge and exercise. The king with a more sound and better counsell, had determined to giue them M. D'alegre, a Captaine farre more experienced in warre, and to whom, for his noblenesse of blood, and reputation of vertue the army would haue giuen a more readie and willing obedience: but the troubles and difficulties which accompanied the succours of the French, beganne euen now to appeare: for that the payment of the footmen beginning from the first day of May; they had spent all that moneth in Lombardie, in the seruice of the king, who desired by meane of that marching to draw money from the Marquesse of Manua, and the Lords of Carpy, of Correge, and Myrandola, to punish them for that they had ministred ayde to Lodowike Sforce. In so much that albeit the Florentines holding for suspected their slow proceeding, & that the intermission & discontinuance gaue oportunitie to the Pysans to prepare & prouide, were at a resolution to abandon the enterprise: yet, looking better into the necessity of their affaires, they held it lesse hurtfull to refurnish a second pay, & so make them march on, then to let money suppress so faire an occasion. At length the L. of Carpy, of Myrandola, & of Correge (for whom the Duke of Ferrara made intercession (cōpounded for 20000. duckats, & the labour being vaine to stay to force the Marquisse of Manua, who, on the one side fortified himselfe, & on the other side alleaged his poertie & want of money, and sending withall his Embassadors to the king to sollicite his pardon: the armie marched & encamped at Montchiarnicola, a village in the countrey of Parma appertaining to the family of the Torelli, who had succoured Lodowike Sforce: not so much for any desire the armie had to punish them, as to threaten Iohn Bentiuole by drawing vpon the limits of Bologna, hauing (amongst the residue) borne fauours to the cause of Lodowike. The perill of his condition, considered with the ill inclination of the time, made him to compound, paying the king forty thousand duckats, for the which his maiesty tooke him of new into his protection, together with the citie of Bologna, but with this expresse limitation, not to preiudice the prerogatiues or rights which the church had there. After the contract of Bologna, and Montchiarnicola taken by force, the armie returned backe to passe ouer the Appenin by the way of Pontremo: and as they entred the countrey of Lunigiana, following more their profits & appetites, then honour or equity, they ranne into many insolencies, and at the instance of the Fregoses, tooke the borough of Massa and other lands, frō Aubry Malespina being vnder the protection of the Florentines. Passing further in this course of behaiour, they of Lucqua (notwithstāding they were in great strife for the matter, the communitie much impugning it) deliuered ouer Pietra Santa to Monfr Beaumont in the kings name, who leauing garrison in the Castle, tooke not away their officers of the towne, for that the Cardinall of Amboise, in whom remained small reckoning of the promises made to the Florentines, for that he had receiued a certaine proportion of money of the Lucquoys, had receiued them into the protection of the king, with cōuention that his maiesty shold hold Pietra Santa in deputation vntill he had declared to whom the right did appertaine. But in these seasons, the Pisans seeing many intentions disclosed to their harmes & ruine, became the more resolute & obstinate in their defence, & had by the helpe of Visellozze (with whom they were ented into great coniunction, being also enemies to the Florentines) certaine enginists to dresse their fortifications, wherein might be discerned a wonderfull trauell both of men and women in great concourse and emulation who should labour most to set forward the workes. And yet (it is ordinary with men in faction & enterprise to dissemble) they forgot not to entertaine the french, submitting generall cōsent, their whole towne to the king, and in that regard sent instruments Autentike not onely to Monfr Beaumont, but also to Philip Rabestin gouernor for the king at Genes, who, with a singular rashnes accepted it in the kings name. And M. Beaumont, sending a Herald to Pisa to demand the towne, they made answer with many humilities, that they desired nothing with greater affection the to liue vnder the kings obediēce, & in that estate of loue & well meaning they were ready to giue themselves vp to his deuotion, so that his maiesty would assure them vnder his honour and word of a Prince, that he would not put the vnder the power of the Florentines: which protestatiō they followed with the teares and weepings of the Ladies, with all other sorts of meanes wherein they thought was vertue to perswade the Herald, that their harts, wils and affections were wholly dedicated to the Crowne of France which had first put them in libertie. These petitions were vaine to M. Beaumont, who looking further into their weaknesse and necessities, then bearing any compassion to their calamities, denied to accept the offers of their Embassadors sent to him, and encamped before the towne the last day sauing one of Iune, betweene the gate of Plages, and the gate Calcesana right ouer against the quarter called Barbagianni: he battered all that night with great furie, & continued the action the most part of the day following, in which time, the artillery, both good of it selfe, and planted to all conueniencie, had made euen with the earth threescore cubites of the wall: and as soone as the batterie ceased to shoote, the horsemen and footmen entremedled together, ran without order or discipline to giue the assault, not considering in what sort they might passe a deepe trench which the Pisans had made betweene the wall that was battered, and the rampier that was within: In so much as when they had discouered the greatnesse of it, & wondered much at his depth, they consumed the residue of the day rather as beholders of the difficultie then disposed to make good the assault. The fortune of this day, ioyned to the consideration of the impediments disclosed, made diminish more and more the hopes of the frenchmen to carrie Pisa: partly for that they fainted in courage, as well for the qualitie of the rampiers, as resolution of those in the towne: and partly, for that the Pisans renewing the practises and meanes which they were wont to vse, the ancient inclination of the french began to take new life and nourish new fauours towards them: in so much as the frenchmen, beginning to entertaine meetings and familiarities with those that were within the towne, communicating together with a friendship & libertie not suspected: and they for their parts recontinuing the same offers to resigne them selues wholly to the kings deuotion, vpon condition not to be eftsouenes passed ouer to the oppression of the Florentines. The cause of the Pisans was fauored through the whole Campe, and oftentimes defended with such declarations of good meaning euen afore the Captaines, that the greatest part of the Campe gaue them courage to maintaine their defence, wherein (besides the incitation of the frenchmen) they were specially encouraged by Francis Trunulce Lieutenant of the regiment of Iohn Iacques, and by Galeas Paluoyfin, which led a band in the french Campe. By the oportunitie of these disorders and sufferance of the Campe, Tarlaryn (of the towne of Castello) entred into Pisa on that side towards the sea, with certaine old soldiers which Vstellozze sent to the succours of Pisa: a man at that time but darke and vnknowne, but aspiring afterwarde to the place of Captaine, he continued and followed the defence of that Citie to the end, to his great honour. To this common inclination, many bands of horsemen and footmen, added many other insolencies, for that, desiring that the siege might be leuiued, they began to sacke and spoile the victuals that were brought to the Campe: and so farre multiplied they in all disorders (the authoritie of the Generall being not sufficient to restraine them) that the footbands of the Gascoines abandoned the army in maner of tumult, (their example breeding the like mutinie in all the residue:) and at parting, certaine footbandes of the Swissers which were come from Rome, according to the kings direction, stayed as prisoner Luke d'Albisse Commissarie for Florence. The occasion (as they alledged) was, for that their payes were detained which were due for a seruice they had bene at afore time within Linorne. The Campe disperfed by degrees, for that the regiment of Swissers and other footbands went away forthwith: onely the men at armes stayed somewhat neare about Pisa, where they had not spent many dayes in reposing themselves, but they returned into Lombardy without tarrying till they knew the kings will and direction; leauing the affaires of the Florentines in great disorder, for that they had dismissed all their footebands, to be more able to furnish the payes of the Swissers. The Pisans turned these confusions into an occasion of exploit and enterprise, and with an expedition agreeable to the consent and oportunitie of the time, they went & planted a Camp afore Librafatta, which they tooke easily, no lesse by the indiscretion of the enemye, then by their proper strength. The maner of that successe was this: Whilest the assault was in charging, all the footmen that were within running to the breach, some of those of the Cape by scaling ladders entred by the highest lawme of the Castle which was not guarded. Which surprise both sudden and terrible so astonished the footmen, that they yeelded themselves: And linking still their fortune with their victorie, they drew their Campe with a present speede afore the Bastillion Ventura, and whilest the assault was in action, the footmen yeelded, either by faintnesse of courage, or by treason

Captaine S. Brandano, Constable of the Florentines, of nation a Lucquoys, and there remaining in garrison. But as the conquest of these places was verie profitable to the Pisans, for that it had opened to them a larger scope on that side towards the Lucquoys, and given elsewhere almost a generall libertie: so yet, such successe of the things of Pisa troubled not a litle the mind of the french King, who saw how much it would diminish the reputation of his armie; besides that he bare very impatiently that one particular Citie, supported onely by her inhabitants, & wherein was not only one Captaine of name, should resist the armies of France, which had run through all Italy to the generall terrour and feare euen of the chiefe Potentates: wherein as men in things that be grievous to them, do oftentimes beguile themselves, he occupied in himselfe this perswasion, that the aduersities of Pisa happened by this default, that the Florentines had not made due provisions of victuals, Pioners, and Munitions as his people assured him for their discharge, beleueing that all other things had rather fayled in the Armie then valour; he complained also that fauoring too much the importunities of the Florentines, he yeelded to commit so great an Armie rather to A. Beaumont then to M. D'Aligre, by which indiscretion those disorders were happened. And of the other part, desiring to recouer the reputation lost, he sent to Florence M. de Corou his Chamberlaine, not so much to be informed if the reports of his Captaines were true, as to practise with the Florentines, that not loosing hope to haue hereafter a better successe; they would consent that his men at armes might returne to sojourne in the countrey of Pisa, the better to keepe that Citie for the winter following, in continuall feare and bridle, with intention; in the spring time to recontinue the siege with an Armie more reasonable, compounded of Captaines better experienced, & souldiers more obedient. This offer was refused of the Florentines, as despairing of anie better issue by the aide of the French armies, a matter which made worse their conditions, for that, a brute running in all places that the King had left them, the Genoways, the Lucquoys, and the Siennois began to minister openly to the Pisans both men and money. And at Florence, the diuisions so increased amongst the Citizéns, that they were not onely in disability to recouer the things lost, but also they provided not in anie sort for the disorders that were in their iurisdiction: for, some particular factions, falling into open armes and priuate force, there were done betweene them aswell in the towne as fields, many hostilities and burnings, proceeding sometimes with forreine aide, euen as if it were a warre ordained and set. To these insolent disorders, they applied no order, to the great reproch of their common weale.

In this time Cesar Borgia omitted no oportunitie to aduance his affaires: and albeit the King was much discontented with the Pope, for not aiding him to recouer his Duchie of Milan, the same being the cause why his Maiestie had deferred to send him bands of men to prosecute the enterprise begun against the Vicars of Romagnia: yet the desire he had to keepe amitie with him, made him change opinion, for the feare he had of the descending of the Almaines, hauing no meane to establish an accord with the Emperour. But much more was concurrant in that desire the authoritie of the Cardinall of Amboise, for the ambition he had to obtaine the Legation for the Realme of France. The Cardinall in this aspiring desire, had litle remembrance to the counsell of S. Gregory, that he that seeketh authoritie; let him consider how he cometh to it, and comming well to it, how he ought to lue well in it, and liuing well in it, how he must gouerne, and gouerning wisely, he must oft call to memory his owne infirmitie. Ambition is an humour verie vaneet for Church men, for that it hindreth to their humilitie and charitie, and generally altereth the whole vertue of their profession. It is hurtfull to raise a mind ambitious into high authoritie, for that he that is desirous of glorie; is soone stirred to do things against equitie: and to him that seeketh to be aboue all men, it is hard to keepe alwayes equitie; which is the chiefe part of iustice. The Pope estoones promised the King to aide him with men and with the person of his sonne, when soeuer he would aduance the enterprise of Naples, and to endue the Cardinall of Amboise with the Legation of the realme of France for eightene moneths, which was esteemed a great matter, aswell for that it was new and rare, as for that it diminished much the doings and profites of the Court of Rome. The King for his part, sent to him vnder the leading of Adonfr d'Aligre, three hundred Launces & two thousand footmen, making knowne to euerie one, that what soule soeuer would oppose against the enterprise of the Pope, he would take it to heart, as if the iniurie were done to his proper person. With which reputation, ioyned to his proper forces, containing fixe hundred men at armes and fixe thousand footmen, the Duke Valentinus entred already into Romagnia, tooke without resistance, the Cities of Peferà and Rimini whose Lordes and owners fled. Afterwards he turned his force to Faenza, which had no other defence then of the people of the place: for, nor onely John Bentiuole, vncle by the mother side to Astor a litle child, was made contented, as wel for feare to stirre vp the armes of the Pope and his sonne, as to obey a commaundement he had receiued from the King: (the Flórentines and Duke of Ferrara doing the like for the same occasions;) but also the Venetians, who were bound to defend him, signified to him (observing the request the King made to them) that they had renounced the protection of him; a thing which they had likewise done afore for the same occasiō to Pandolfe Malateste Lord of Rimini. And which more is, to expresse with greater apparāce that they fauored the Pope, they created at the same time the Duke Valentinois Gentleman of their Towne, an action not accustomed to that common weale, but for recompence of benefices receiued, or in token of deare and straite amitie. The Duke Valentinois entertained in his pay Dennis de Nalda natieue of Brisquolle a mā of great opinion in the Vale of Lamona: by his meānes he tooke the towne of Brisquolle without danger, and with the same fortune brought vnder his commandement almost the whole valley: he tooke the old Citadell by force, and caried the new Castle by accord made with the keeper. He had also hope to enter into the Castle of Faenza by meane of a practise entertained by the said Dennis with the Castle keeper, who was of the same Valley, and had long time gouerned the estates of Astor: but the intelligence being discouered, he was made prisoner by the Faentines; who making their fortune no feare to them, shewed no signes of faint courage for that they were abandoned of euery one, and much lesse stood discomforted for the losse of the Valley which was of great importance: but as people resoluēd to vanquish their aduersities with their proper vertues, they determined to passe vnder all perils to continue their subiection to the familie of the Manfredis, vnder whose obedience as they had liued in easie gouernment a long time, so doubting the worst that might come by chaunge of Lords, they stood resolute in their faith and loyaltie, and carefully strengthened their Citie against the present dangers. From which disposition, the Duke Valentinois being not able to turne them, neither by promises nor threatnings, he encamped neare the wals of their City betweene the riuers of Lamona and Maršana, and planted his artillerie on that side that is towardes Farly, which albeit is incompassed with wals, yet commonly it is called the Suburbs, where the Faentines had erected a strong Bastillion: he battred it with great furie, together with that lawine or corner that is betweene the Suburbs and the towne, and the fift day he gaue the assault. But finding the resistance of the towne aboue his expectation, he sounded the retraite, (his souldiers bringing away many wounds and maines, & Honorius Samella a principall man slaine in the action.) The Campe suffered litle rest all the residue of the dayes it remained there, as well by a continuall affliction of the artillerie from the towne, as also by the vallour of the inhabitants, who, notwithstanding they had a verie slender strength by forreigne souldiers, yet they made many issues and sallies, and skirmished with no lesse fortune then courage. But aboue all other perplexities, (albeit the moneth of Nouember was not yet finished) the time, which was more extreme then agreed with the custome and nature of that season, troubled him much, both for the snowes that fell, and the frosts that were intollerable (griuous impediments to the trauels of warre) and also for that his lodging was naked and open to the ayre, (the Faentines afore the Campe came neare their wals, hauing burned all their houses, and cut downe all such wood and trees as might giue succours to their enemies. These difficulties pressed so much the Duke Valentinois, that he leauied his Camp the tenth day, and dispersing his regiments to winter in places thereabouts, he bare his fortune with manifest impatience, specially for that besides his french forces, he had an armie flourishing with Captaines and souldiers Italians, wherein were John Paule, and Iulso Vrsins Vitellozze & John Paule Bailon with many men of choise: and hauing promised to himselfe in his ambitious conceits, that neither the seas nor the mountaines had power to resist him, he could not endure without perturbation of mind, that the reputation of his first exploits should be darkened, by a people that had long liued in peace, and at that time, had no other commaunder then a litle child: wherein he gaue such libertie to his passion, that he swore, and that with many sighes and vehement protestations, that as soone as the season of the yeare would giue leaue to his desire, he would returne to the siege, & recontinue the enterprise with a resolution of a man determined either to carrie the victorie, or to die in the action.

In which time his father the Pope, to the end there might be societie in their doings, hauing regard regard to one end, created the same yeare to his great infamie twelue Cardinals, not off such as deſerued beſt, but of thoſe that offered moſt. And to omit no meanes to heape treaſures and money, he ſent out and ſowed thorough all Italy, and ſtrange prouinces, the Lubile; which being celebrated at Rome with great concourſe of people, was ſent with no leſſe deuotion beyond the mountes, giuing power that who could not come to Rome to obtaine it, ſhould communicate in the grace and benediction for certaine ſummes of money; the which, together with all other treaſures he could draw in what ſort ſoeuer, as well of the ſpiritual frutes, as treaſures temporall of the Church, he ſent to the Duke of Valentinoss, who ſtaying at Furly, made ſtrong preparation to recontinue the ſiege of Faenza; againſt whole intentions the Faentins provided by fortifications and other remedies conuenient to reſiſt an enemy ſo apparantly profeſſed. Theſe things were done in the yeare 1500. But matters of farre greater importance were ordained by the french king for the yeare following; and to haue the more liberty to execute them, he had ſought by continuall ſolicitation, to haue vnitie with the king of Romaines, wherby obtaining the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan, he might haue ſufferance to aſſaile the realme of Naples: to which ends he vſed the meane & inclination of the Archduke his ſonne, who declared a readie diſpoſition to peace, for that his peoples, fearing the entercourſe of marchandiſe would ceaſe, brooked vnwillingly all perſwaſions to leaue warre againſt the French: but the thing that moſt ſupported this inclination, was, that the French king hauing no iſſue male, offered to giue in mariage his daughter Madam Clawde, to Charles ſonne of the Archduke, and to endue her with the Duchie of Millan for a dowrie when they had abilitie to conſummate the mariage, for neither of them had not yet three yeares of age. By theſe offers, and his interceſſion, (for that many difficulties hapning in the practiſe and negociation of the peace abſolute, could not ſo ſoone be reſolued) the french king obtained in the yeare following of Maximilian, a truce for many moneths, but not without the price of certaine proportions of money. This truce was voyd of all mention of the King of Naples, notwithstanding that Maximilian, in conſideration of fortie thouſand Duckats, with bond, to miniſter to him monethly fifteene thouſand Duckats (his neceſſities ſo requiring,) he had promiſed to make no accord without cōprehending him in it, and to vex the Duchie of Millan with inuaſions and warre when neede were to turne away the powers of the French king. Thus the king dwelling aſſured that the Almaines would not ſtirre, and hoping in ſhort time to make the peace perfect and abſolute, and to obtain the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan, by meane of the ſame Archduke, turned all his thoughts to the enterpriſe of Naples; againſt the which, fearing leaſt the king of Spaine would make ſome obiection, and that both the Pope and Venetians (iealous ouer his greatneſſe) would ioine with him, he renued eſtſoones the practiſes that had bene begun in the time of king Charles for deuiding of the ſame realme, whereunto indeed Ferdinand king of Spaine pretended to haue right: for albeit Alphonſo king of Aragon had conquered it with rights & titles ſeparate from the Crowne of Aragon, and therefore had diſpoſed it to the perſon of Ferdinand his baſtard ſonne as his owne; yet, Iohn his brother which ſucceeded him in the kingdom of Aragon, and Ferdinand the ſonne of Iohn, had alwayes ſecretly quarelled that title as lawfully appertaining to the Crown of Aragon, for that Alphonſo had conquered it with the armes and treaſures of the ſame realme. Which quarell Ferdinand had couered with a ſuttletie & patience of a Spaniard, forgetting nothing, not onely of the dutie of a parent towards Ferdinand king of Naples, and the others, but alſo more aſſuring and augmenting them with bondes of newe affinitie, for that he gaue to Ferdinand for wife, Iane his ſiſter, and conſented afterwarde that Iane the daughter of her, ſhould be married to young Ferdinand, wherein yet he could not worke in ſuch clouds, but the vaile of his couetouſneſſe was long time before made open to the kings of Naples. In ſo much as the french king and Ferdinand concurring in one inclination, the one to remoue all impediments & difficulties, the other to obtaine part of that he had long deſired, ſeeing there was no oportunitie to obtaine the whole, they made an agreement to inuade at one time the kingdome of Naples, and to deuide it betweene them, in this ſort: That the French king ſhould haue the Citie of Naples, with all the land of Lanoro, and the prouince of Abruzzo; and to *Ferdinand*s part ſhould fall the prouinces of Pomylia and Calabria: That either one ſhould conquer his owne part by himſelfe, the other not being bound to helpe him, but onely not to empeach or hinder him: but ſpecially it was agreed, that this contract ſhould be holden verie ſecret vntill the armie which the French king should send to execute that enterprife, were arrived at Rome: at what time the Embassadors of them both, alledging this contract to be made for the benefit of Christendome, & to invade the Infidels, should require the Pope with a ioynt voyce, to graunt the inuestiture according to the diuision that had bin made betweene them, receiuing Ferismand into faith & homage, vnder the title of Duke of Pomylla & Calabria, and the French king no more king of Cicilia, but king of Ierusalem & Naples: which title of king of Ierusalē, being once come to the Emperour Federik the second, who was king of Naples, by his wife which was daughter of Iohn king of Ierusalem (but in name not in effect) was alwayes kept by the kings following, notwithstanding that at one time, the kings of Cipres, being of the house of Lusignan, who likewise pretended to it, would appropriate it to them with a couetousnesse as apparant & great as the rest: So violent are the desires of Princes to embrace colours by the which they may with any honest couerture (albeit most often against all law and reason) torment and invade the estates that are in the possession of another, not considering what a world of calamities, vniust warre and oppression do draw with them, & much lesse remembring that right may be troden downe, but not troden out, but hath her secret meanes to support her, and her seasons appointed to reuiue and reuert. This capitulation was no sooner established betweene the two kings, then the French king began immediatly and openly to prepare his armie.

But whilest these practises were in working to their execution, the Duke of Valentinois, returning by night in the first dayes of the new yeare to the Suburbs of Faenza, and working by conspiracie and intelligence, made an vse of a number of skaling ladders: but that labour and triall resolving into smoke and vanitie, & reposing no more hope in treason, he tooke in few dayes after Ruffi, with the other places of that countrey, and lastly returned eftsoones with his Camp to Faenza in the beginning of the Spring: and incamping before the Castle, he battred the wall on that side, and followed the assault Pellemelle with the French & Spanish that were in his pay: who going to the seruice in disorder, retired without honor or profit. But three dayes after (obstinacie notwithstanding) he recharged it with another assault with the strength of the whole Camp: The first charge fell to Vitellozze and the Vrsins, who, culling out the flower and choise men of their bands, marched to the breach with a wonderful boldnesse, & very well assured order, their valours giuing great hope at that time to carie the victorie: but those that were within fighting for their liues and libertie, were no lesse resolute to defend, then the others were valiant to assault: They had so intrenched and fortified the place, that their industrie made amazed their enemies, who finding afore them a great ditch for depth & largenesse, & being beaten in the flanks with the furie of the artillerie, were constrained to retire, Ferdinand of Farnesa remaining dead with many other men of marke, without reckening the great numbers whose bodies smarted in the wounds they receiued: The chaunces in warre are diuers, and haue in them many hidden fortunes, which neither the wisdom of the leaders can foresee, nor the vertue of the souldiers resist, nor any counsell of man assure, but running gouerned by certaine swift destinies, seeme to communicate in the qualitie of the wind which no humane wit can make settled, but is caried by incomprehensible motions from one quarter to another in a moment. For notwithstanding the resolution of the Faentines to fight it out to the last man, committing their liues and liberties to one perill, yet hauing receiued great harmes by this assault, they began to take such counsell of their present condition, that seeing on all sides generall apparance of daunger, and no expectation of succours in a state so abandoned, their confidence began to turne into feare: and as there was no possibilitie, that their proper valours only without fresh succours, could make long resistance against so great an army alwayes renewed: so they saw that with increase of more harmes & worse conditions, they should in the end either be taken by force, or constrained as a last necessitie, to put them selues vnder the power of the victors: And therefore their fortune making these feares reasonable in them, they yeelded to the Duke vpon couenant to haue their goods & liues saved, & that Asfor their Lord should remaine in his libertie, and to enioy wholly the reuenue of his proper possessions. These couenants the Duke kept faithfully on the behalfe of the people of Faenza: But Asfor, a young man of xviij. yeares and of an excellent beautie, his age and innocencie yeelding to the disloyaltie and crueltie of the victors, was retained by the Duke with very honorable demonstrations, vnder colour that he should remaine in his Court: but within few dayes after being sent to Rome, after (so went the bruite) some had satisfied their vile vnna-turall lust on him, he was secretly put to death, together with his bastard brother.

After the victorie of Faenza, the Duke marched towards Bologna, laying his plot not only to occupie that Citie, but also to molest the Florentines which were now become much vnderfoot, hauing added to the first discontentment of the French king, new occasions of disliking : for, being wearie of the huge expences which they had made, continuing still for the furnishing of the warre with Pisa, & hauing suspicion of the forces of the Pope and Duke Valentinois, they payed not to the king (notwithstanding his great instance) the residue of the moneys which had bin lent them by the Duke of Millan, nor yet those sums which he pretended to be due to him for the Swissers who he had sent against Pisa. The Florentines (contrary to their contract established with the Cardinal of Amboise) refused to furnish one pay for them to returne into their country, for that they departed, long afore the terme of the seruice, for the which they had receiued pay, was expired. But the king, to entertaine alwayes that nation in good friendship, made good their pay of his proper treasure, which he redemaunded of the Florentines with sharpe words, not admitting the excuse of their inabilitie, which was made greater by the ciuill discords that tooke their beginning of the disorders which were in the gouernment popular : wherein no man hauing a sound care of the affaires, and many of the principall Citizens being suspected either for friends to the Medices, or as men desiring another forme of gouernment, things were ouerruled more with confusion then with counsel. By occasion of these troubles ciuill, they made no prouision to satisfie the demaunds of the king, but letting passe without effect, the respits and delayes which he had giuen them, they had made him much discontented : & increasing his anger by the occasion of their weaknesse, he required them to prepare to contribute to him the moneys and other aides, which they promised for the expedition of Naples. He said, that albeit they owed him none according to the couenants that were made between them (vnlesse they had recouered Pisa) yet, as touching him, they ought to hold it for recouered, seeing it was through their owne fault, that their victorie agreed not with their expectation. Of this was the cause, either the desire of money, which of his owne nature he loued much, or the discontentment that they had not obserued the respites he had graunted them, or rather the opinion he had, that for the disorders in their gouernment, and the great number of friends the Medices had in Florence, he was able to make no foundation in the occurrence of affaires : and to bring them by sharpnesse to that, which his authoritie could not leade them vnto, he deliuered publicly very angrie termes to their Embassador resident about his person, whom he assured, that he was no more bound to their protection, for that, they failing to accomplish the capitulation made at Millan, in not making him satisfied at the time appointed of the moneys promised in the same, he was at libertie from all right or lawes of obseruation. By meanes wherof, Julian de Medicis, being gone to his court with the priuite and recommendation of the Pope, to beseech his maiestie in his name, and in compassion of his brethren, to be restored to their countrey, promising him great quantities of moneys ; he heard him willingly, and deuised continually with him of the meanes for their returne. And on the other side the Duke Valentinois vsing the oportunitie of these occasions, & pushed forward withall by Vitellozzo and the Frsins, then in his seruice & pay, and who were iust enemies to the Florentynes, the one for the death of his brother, & the other for the coniunction he had with the Medices, had, for that cause sent afore to the succors of Pisa, Lymerot de Ferme with an hundred light horsemen, & since the conquest of Faenza stood determined to molest them, notwithstanding that neither his father nor he, had receiued of the no hannes, but rather pleasures and commodities, seeing at their requests, they had renounced the protection of them of Risara, whereunto they were bound, and consented to libertie and passage of victuals thorough their lands to his Campe : being then departed out of Romania in this deliberation, & since the conquest of Faenza, being declared by the Pope, with the iustification of the consistory, Duke of Romania, & enjoying also the inuestiture of the same, he entred with his armie into the territories of Bologna, with great hope to occupie it : but the same day that he lodged in the borough of S. Peter, standing almost vpon the confines between Imola & Bologna, he receiued comandement from the French king to proceed no further in the subduing of Bologna, nor to chase out of it Iohn Bentinolle, for that he had taken aswell him as the Citie into his protection. His maiestie alleaged, that the expresse exception which he had made, not to preiudice the rights of the Church, ought to be vnderstood of those rights and preheminences which the Church did then enioy, for that being construed without distinction, and not according as the words sounded, as the Pope pretended, it had bin a thing vaine & of no moment, for the Bolonois & for the Bentiuoleis, to receiue them into his protection. Therefore the Duke leauing for that time, with no smal complaints of the Pope and the king, the ambitious hopes he had conceiued, made a couenant with Bentiuolle by the meane of Pawle Vrsin, which bare these articles: That they of Bologna should giue him liberty of passage and victuals: That he should pay to him yearly nine thousand dukats: That he should serue him with a certaine proportiō of men at armes & footmen for his expedition into Tuskane: And to leaue him Castelbologna, a place betweene Imola & Faenza, And of the iurisdiction of Bologna, which he gaue to Pawle Vrsin. When this accord was made, Bentiuolle, either for a fearefull suspitiō he had of himselfe, or for that Duke Valentinois (as the saying was) to make him more hatefull in that City, had told him that the famuly of the Mariscotties (a faction puissant and of great fauours, and for that reason, and for his insolency much suspected of him) had desired him to make the enterprise of Bologna: he caused present slaughter to be made of almost all that famuly that were within Bologna, vsing for ministers in that cruelty, together with his sonne Hermes, many Noble young Gentlemen, to the end that for the memory to haue defiled their hands in the blood of that faction, and by that meanes become enemies to that famuly, they should be the more assuredly bound to the preferuation of his estate: weake surety, whose foundation is builded vpon the blood of innocents, and a lamentable example, to purge surmised suspition, by vnlawfull slaughter.

The French bands folowed no further the Duke Valentinois, hauing assignment to ioine with the army of the king, which contained a thousand Launces & ten thousand footmen marching vnder M.^r Aaubigny to the enterprise of Naples: but the Duke Valentinois tooke his way through the countrey of Bologna, to the lands of the Florentyns, with an army of feuen hundred men at armes & fiue thousand footmē of choise, & with fiue hundred mē at armes & two thousand footmē, which Bentiuolle gaue him vnder the leading of his sonne the Pronotory. He sent to demaund of the Florentyns passage and victuals through all their lands, & marching on without tarying their aunswere, he entertained with gracious words the Embassadors which they had sent to him, vntill he was past the Appennyn: but alioone as he was arriued at Barbarina (his sweet words turned into sowre meanings) he required that they would make confederation with him: And that they wold take him into their pay with such regiments of men at armes & other cōditions as agreed with the greatnesse he held: And that chaunging the present gouernment, they wold establishe another, such one as he might repose more in. The thing that gaue him this boldnesse, to demaund these things, was not so much his power or strength (for he had no great army or artilleries to batter wals) as the ill estate of the Florentyns, who had very few men at armes, or other footmē then they of the countrey whom they cōmaunded dayly: he was also much furthered in this actiō, by the feare, suspitiō, & great disagreements that were in Florence, for that he had in his army Vstellozze & the Vrsins, & for that by his directiō, Peter de Medicis was abiding at Loiana in the countrey of Bologna: And lastly, for that the people were ful of oficialosies by an opiniō they had cōceiued, that the greatest citizens had procured his cōming, to the end to erect a gouernmēt according to their fancies. Notwithstanding the Duke Valentinois had no great desire to reestablishe or set vp againe Peter de Medicis, for that he esteemed not the greatnesse of the Vrsins & Vstellozze conuenient for his enterprise, with whom he knew that Peter had great affinity, & being repossessed of his countrey, wold minister no smal strength to them. Jointly to this, I haue vnderstood by men worthy of faith & credit, that he kept fixed in his mind, the remembrance of an auncient grudge against him, whē being Archbishop of Pampeluna, & his father not yet Pope, he studied the cōmon lawes in the schooles of Pisa, for that he went to Florēce to cōplaine to him of a certaine crime cōmitted against him by one of his familiars; & waiting in vaine many houres to haue accesse to him (being occupied either in his affaires or pleasures) he returned to Pisa not so much as speaking with him, esteeming himself much disgraced & iniured: and yet he made other semblance to the Vstelly & Vrsins, rather to entertaine them in deuotion, thē that his thoughts were simple, or his intentions not dissembled: but much more to augmēt the mutinies & disagreements of the Florēns, by the which he hoped either to range thē to better cōditiōs, or to be able to occupy some place of importāce in their iurisdiction: but finding by many tokēs apparant, that the French king brooked not his entry in that sort into their countrey, when he came to Campy six miles from Florence, he accorded with them in this sort: That betweene the common weale of Florence & him there should be a confederation indifferent for the defence of their estates, with prohibition to ayde rebelles either, of the one or other other part, and chiefly that the Duke should not succor the Pisans: That the Florentines should pardon to whosoever, all faults committed by his coming, and should not oppose themselves against him for the defence of the Lord of Plombyn, who was vnder their protection: That they should entertaine him for three yeares with three hundred men at armes, and pay of fixe & thirty thousand duckats for every yeare, & he to send that ayd to them as often as they should haue need, either for their owne defence, or to offend another. After this accord was ratified, he went to Sigüna, marching by easie iournies, and remaining certaine dayes in euery reposing place; did great harmes in the countie by fire and robberies, no otherwise then if he had bin an enemy professed. He demaunded besides (according to the custome in the paies of men at armes) the fourth part of the money due for one yeare, and that they should prepare for him artilleries for the enterprise of Plombyn. The one of which demaundes the Florentines denied him flatly, as being not bound vnto it, the other they deferred, for that they had not taken counsell to obserue that, which he went about to make them promise by force. By the aduertisements of their Embassador with the French king, they hoped to be deliuered from those oppressions by his authority, a hope which they had not altogether vaine, for that it nothing displeased the king that the Duke should threaten them, but not assaile them: as well for that the change of the present gouernment would haue bin to his discontentment, as also, albeit he could haue wished another form of gouernment, yet, it wold haue greatly displeased him, if it had bene introduced with other forces, or other authority then his. In which regard, as soone as he vnderstood that the Duke was entred vpon the dominions of the Florentines, he ministred to him a sharpe direction to depart with speed, & commaunded M. d'Anbigny who was in Lombardy with the army, that in case of the Dukes disobedience, he should oppose against him by compulsion & force of the whole army. This directio of the king brought the Duke into alteration of intention & purpose, and not tarying so much as for a quarters pay, nor any furniture of artillery, he tooke his way towards Plombyn, & gaue order that the Pisans, who by meane of Nitellozzo, whom he had sent thither for artillery, were intamped before a borough of the Florentines, should withdraw and leauy their siege.

Being entred into the territories of Plombyn, he tooke Superetta, Scatella, and the Iles of Elba and Pianosa, and furnishing euery peece with sufficient garrison, as well for the defence of the places already occupied, as to entertaine continuall vexatio vpon them of Plombyn, he returned to Rome with the residue of his regiments, to follow the kings army that marched to the enterprise of Naples: whereof one part led by M. d'Anbigny was entred into Tuscanie by the way of Castrocaro, and the other folowed by the countrey Lunigiana. The whole army assembled in one strength, contained a thousand Launces, foure thousand Swissers, and fixe thousand footmen, of nation French and Gascoynes, to whom was ioyned (according to their manner) a great quantity of artilleries. About the same time also, the army by sea departed out of Provence for the same expedition, vnder the leading of the Lord of Ranastyn gouernour of Genes, wherein were three Caracks of Genes, & sixteene other ships, together with many other small vessels fraught with bands of footmen. Against these mouings & preparations of warre, king Federik (ignorant that the Spanish armies vnder shadow of friendship were prepared against him) solicited Consaluo (abiding in Sicilia with the regiments of Spaniards, & making semblance to succour him) to come to Caserta, after he had put into his hands certaine places of Calabria which he demaunded, to the end to make more easie the conquest he intended, but vnder colour that it was for the suretie of his people. King Federik made his reckening, that Consaluo being ioyned to the army, his strength in particular wold containe seuen hundred men at armes, fixe hundred light horsemen, & fixe thousand footmen, compounded vpon bodies, partly entertained already by him, and partly of such as the Colonnos leauied at Marina: a force which he supposed sufficient to resist the French men, without being constrained to inclose himselfe in townes, notwithstanding he nourished no great hope in the ayde from the Prince of the Turkes, of whom he had required succours with no smal instance, shewing him that he had more reaso to feare peril by the victory of the present king, then of the late king his predecessor. And to make cleare way to an actio of so great importace (it is a chiefe surety to Princes to cut off treasures in the beginning) he apprehended & put in prison, the Prince of Bisignā & the Count of Meloste, accused afore him to haue had secret intelligēce with the Count Caiasse who was in the French army. With these hopes (hauing also sent Ferdinād his eldest son being very yong to Tarēta more for his surety if things succeeded ill, then to defend the city) he encāped with his army at S. Germain: where attending the succours of Consaluo and the bandes which the Colonna leuied, he hoped to accomplish a more happie action in the defence of the entrie into the kingdome, then Ferdinand his nephew had done against the enterprise of king Charles.

The Pope giueth the inue-stiture of the kingdome of Naples to the French and Spaniard indifferently.

In this estate & disposition of affaires, all the regions of Italy were replenished with incredible doubts & perplexities, euery one iudging that this enterprise would be a beginning of inost great calamities: for that as the preparations of the French king seemed not so mightie, as to be able to surmount the ioynt forces of king Federike and Consaluo, so wise men occupied this opinion, that the spirits of so mightie kings beginning once to waxe angrie, both the one & other partie would continue the war with far greater forces, which would sit vp easily through all Italy both great & dangerous motions, for the diuerse inclinations of the other Potentates. But as soone as the French army was ariued at Rome, the world saw easily into the vanitie of those discourfes: for that the Em-bassadours of France & Spaine, entring together into the Consistorie, made publication afore the Pope & Cardinals, of the league made betwene their kings, intending chiefly (as they said) to an expedition to be made against the enemies to Christian religion: and demanding the inuestiture of the kingdome according to the tenor of the conuentio made, it was agreed vnto by the Pope with the same speed it was required, thinking it but reasonable to performe that which he made no difficulty to graunt. In so much as no man doubting now what wold be the end of this war, the feares of men were conuerted into admiration, euery one wondring at the doings of the French king, who, by suffering the moytie of the realme to fall rather into the hands of the king of Spaine, did as it were leade by the hand into Italy (where before he only was the Arbitrator of all things) another king, to whom such as might be discontented with him, might haue recourse, & was also straightly allied to the king of Romans by many bonds of affinitie, then to endure that king Federike might remaine Lord of the whole, acknowledging to hold it of him, and yeeld him tribute for it; as by sundrie meanes he had sought to obtaine it. But the vniuersal conceptions of men were no lesse de-uided touching the integritie and faith of Ferdinand, who, by an ambitious lust to occupie one part of the kingdome, had conspired against a king of his blood; & to draw him the more easily to his ruine, he had alwayes entertained him with false promises to succour him; wherein he had not only defaced the reputation of the title of king Catholike, which he & Queene Elizabeth his wife had obtained certaine yeares before of the Pope: but also had stained that renowme and glorie which held their names raised vp to the heavens, for driuing the Moares out of the realme of Granado, no lesse for the zeale they bare to religiõ, then for regard of their proper interest. To these imputations, or rather reproches imposed vpon both the one and other king, there was answered no other thing for the French king, but that his power was sufficient to remedie all those disorders in conuenient season, not remembring that where things are deuided, the suretie is intricate, & where there be competitors to one thing, & they no lesse equall in strength, then all one in ambition, there distrustes are nourished, and no part free from suspition, but all things intangled with confusions.
For Ferdinand, it was sayd, that albeit king Federike had giuen him iust occasion to be moued against him, as knowing that he had long time before practised secretly with the French king to his preiudice: yet that had not stirred him, but the consideration of the kings pretence, determining in what sort soeuer it were, to performe an enterprise vpon the realme of Naples, brought him to this necessitie either to defend it, or abandon it. In taking vpon him the defence, he should kindle so great a fire, that it could not but send daungerous sparkes ouer all the common weale of Chri-stendome, chiefly the Turkes armies being so strong and mightie against the Venetians both by sea and land, and if he should abandon it, he knew his realme of Sicilia stood in manifest perill; and besides, it was a thing that wrought too much to his detriment, that the French king should occupie the realme of Naples, which of right belõged to him, & might eftsoones reuert to him by new rights, if the lyne of Federike should faile: & therefore amyed so many difficulties he had chosen the way of deuiding, with hope that by the ill gouernment of the French, their moytie might also descend to him in time: and that in this case, as the regard of publike vtilitie counselled him, which he had alwayes more highly esteemed then his proper profite: so he might either keepe it in himselfe, or restore it to Federike, or rather leaue it to his issue and children, holding his name almost in horrore, for that he knew, that afore the French king did any action vpon the Duchy of Millan, he had practised with the Turkes. These were the reasons generall alledged on the behalfs of both the kings, supporting their actions more by strained colour, then equitie of title, & applying

applying to the aduersitie of the king of Naples, their vniust ambitioⁿ, they made litle care to keep their particular moities, that had no conscience to euiet the iust owner out of the whole.

The league of the two kings brought such astonishment to Federike; that notwithstanding Consaluo, seeming to reiect that which was published at Rome, promised him with one constancie to come to his succours: yet, he chaunged his first counsels, and retired from S. Germain towards Capua, where he expected the effect of his direction for the bands leauied by the Colonnos: who, leauing garrison within Amilian, abādoned all the residue which they held in the territorie of Rome, for that the Pope by the cōsent of the Frēch king, had takē armes to occupy their estates. In which difficulties, Consaluo, being well aduertised that the French armie was passed Rome, discouered at last his commissions, & sending to Naples six gallies to bring away the two old Queenes, the one sister, & the other neece to his king, Prosper Colonne aduised king Federike to retaine the gallies, & drawing all his power into one strēgth, to make resistance to the enemies in the field: for that in making a triall of fortune, there would be some hope of victorie, the issues of battels being farre more incertaine, then all other humaine actions: Otherwise he saw nothing but manifest perill, two so mightie kings ioyning against him, and he nothing strengthened from the forreine, and lesse assured amid the treasons of his owne people: he told him, that in a daunger so present, celeritie was more necessarie then counsell; and against enemies so neare approaching, his greatest suretie stood in the expedition of the battell, hauing no other meane to make head against two so mightie kings inuading him in diuerse parts of his kingdome. But Federike, whose minde was wholly ouerruled with feares and doubts, found litle hope in this counsell; & therefore determined to looke to the garde of his townes, remembring that lesse in any other humane action, then in the successe of battell, the innocencie of the cause getteth the vpper hand. Therefore, S. Germain with other peeces neare about it, being already drawne into rebellion, yea euen before M. d' Aubigny marched from Rome: he determined to make the first defence in the towne of Capua, wherein he bestowed Fabricio Colonne with three hundred men at armes, certaine light horsemen, and three thousand footmen, and ioyned with him Riunco de Marciano, whom he had newly taken into his pay. He left Prosper Colonne for the garde of Naples, and him selfe, with the residue of his companies, entred Auerso. But as open warre ministreth many occasions to reuenge particular wrongs: so Monsieur d' Aubigny in his marching from Rome, burned Marma, & Caua, with certaine other peeces of the Colonnos, being angry that Fabricio had put to executioⁿ in Rome, the messengers of certaine Barons of the realme holding with the French, which were gone thither to cōtra^{ct} with him. Afterwards he tooke his way to Mōtfortin, where he thought Iulio Colonne would make resistance: but hauing left it abandoned with verie litle honour, M. d' Aubigny passing further, commaunded all the places which be along the way to Capua vntill the riuer of Vulturno neare Capua, which being too deepe for the armie to passe ouer without perill, the vertue of their Generall found out a way to passe, by marching vp more high towards the mountaine: wherof Federike being aduertised, retired to Naples, & abādoned Auerso, which with Nola & many other places gaue theselues to the Frēch, whose whole strēgth was now brought into the cōfines of Capua, where they cāped, some on this side, & some beyōd the riuer, on the vpper side where the riuer beginneth to run neare the towne: and putting force to their fortune, they battred it on all parts, & charged it afterwards with a furious assault, which albeit was not pleasant to them, but were constrained to retire from the wals with their many harmes: yet imparting no lesse terrour and daunger to the defendants, the mindes of the Captaines and souldiers began to incline to accord, the people of the Citie beginning to draw into mutinie, together with the regiments of Peasants withdrawne thither in great numbers. But as in warres there be some insolencies which the Captaines cannot bridle, and many negligences which befall instruments and occasions of perill: so Fabricio Colonne, the eight day after the Camp was planted, hauing begun to parley with the Count Caiarze vpon a Bastillioⁿ, the negligent garde of those that were within (as often hapneth when men be nearest accord) gaue occasion to the enemies to enter: and they, vsing the law of victors, tooke libertie to turne all things to the reward of their aduenture: in so much as what for the greedinesse of pillage, and desire to reuenge the harmes receiued at the first assault, they put the whole towne to sacke, and made a wonderfull slaughter, retaining onely for prisoners, such as remained free from their crueltie. The licentiousnesse of the victors was such, that their crueltie raged vpoⁿ all ages, sexes, & qualities of creatures, not sparing the virgins in religion, whose bodies were a miserable pray to the lust of the souldiers: and as many of them were sold afterwards at Rome for a verie small price, so some of them esteeming it agreeable to their vertue, to feare death lesse then the losse of honor, threw themselves into wels, & offered vp in riuers an oblation of their vndeified bodies. It is said, that besides other abominations worthie of perpetuall infamie, many of the womē which had escaped the first furie, being withdrawne into a Tower vnder none other confidence then such as follow creatures in miserie, the Duke of Valentinois, who followed the army as the kings Lieutenāt, went to take a view of them, accompanied onely with the Gentlemen of his house and his guard; and after he had considered, not of their estates, but of their beauties, the cōpassion he shewed, was, that he retained for his owne vie fortie of the most fairest of them. Fabricio Colonne, Dom Hugo of Cardona, and all the other Captaines and men of condition were made prisoners, amongst whom Rinuccio Mariano, who at the assault had receiued a wound with a crosbow shot, being in the keeping of the souldiers of the Duke, died within two dayes, not without suspicion of poison. The losse of Capua cut off all hopes to king Federike to be able hence forward to defend any thing. Caietta yeelded with a speed according to the felicitie of the victors. And M. d' Aubigny being come with his armie to Auerse, and the Citie of Naples left abandoned, which made composition for threescore thousand Duckats, Federike retired into the new Castle, and immediatly after (hauing onely regard to his life in such extremitie of fortune) made couenant with Monfr d' Aubigny to deliuer vp within fixe dayes all the townes and forts, which he held appertaining to that moytie of the diuision, which should descend to the French king: reseruing onely for fixe moneths the Ile of Yschia, during which time it should be lawful for him to go whither he wold, except in the realme of Naples: and to send an hundred men at armes to Tarenta: that he might take out of the new Castle and the egge Castle what he would, except the artilleries of king Charles which remained there: that free pardon should be giuen to all faults committed since the late king Charles conquered the realme of Naples: and that the Cardinals Colonne and Aragon should still enioy those ecclesiasticall reuenues which they had in the kingdome. But within the rocke of Yschia might be seene drawne into one shew, a true resemblance and figure of all the infelicities of the line of the old Ferdinand (which was a spectacle verie pitifull:) for that besides the aspect of Federike newly diuested of so noble a realme, the consideration of his litle children, ioyned to the lamentable condition of Beatrice his sister, redoubled his sorowes. To the calamitie of his sister, this increase of miserie happened; that after the death of her late husband Matthias that renowned king of Hungary, she receiuing promise of mariage of Launcelot king of Bohemia, inducing her to ayde him in the conquest of the same realme: she was refused by him with great ingratitude, after he had filled his delights with the sweete fruites of her bodie, and afterwards married another by the dispensation of Pope Alexander. To this infelicitie was also ioyned, Isabell afore time honored with the titles and dignities of Duchesse of Millan, but now no lesse wretched then the others, for that almost at one time, she suffered priuation of her husband, of her estate, and of her onely sonne. Amongst these tragicall accidents, I may not forget this notable example of the affection of a sonne to his father, a matter so much the more strange, by how much in those times the loue of children was rare towards their fathers. One of the sonnes of the L. G. Montpensier being gone to Pozzuolo to visite the sepulcher of his father, suffred him selfe to be so much ouerruled with passion, that after he had washed all parts of the monument with his lamentable teares, he fainted, and fell downe dead vpon the sepulcher of his father, who had as litle sence of those his latest sorowes, as he had feeling of so great a fault, to giue such libertie to the rage of nature.

mind to commit himselfe to the honour and clemency of the French king.

“ To men afflicted this is one consolation, to know the vttermost of their mishaps, and when “ the perils be past that nourished their feares, they returne to a comfort, not to consider what they “ haue suffered, but to remember that no worse can happen. Euen so king Federike making the extremest reckening of his aduersities, was resolued (bearing a settled hate to the king of Spaine,) to recommit him selfe wholly to the honour and clemency of the French king, to whom he sent to demanda safe conduct; and hauing obtained it, he left all the residue in the rocke of Yschia, where remained also Prosper and Fabricio Colonne: and the Ile remaining as it did before vnder the gouernment of the Marquis of Gnast and the Countesse of Francqueuille, after he had sent part of his people to the defence of Tarenta, he went into Fraunce with fise Galleys: a counsell

euill taken (sauiug that men in aduersitie haue no libertie of election) for that if he had bene in a place of libertie, seeing to what termes the warres grew afterwards betweene those two kings, he might happily haue bene holpen with many occasions afterwards to returne into his kingdom: but chusing rather to sit downe with the sweete frutes of a quiet life, then to follow the bitter trauels of a kingdom broken, his fortune brought him to this humilitie, to accept such conditions as were offered him by the king, who gaue him, to the end he might remaine in Fraunce, the Duchy of Anjou, with so liberall a pension, that it amounted euery yeare to thirtie thousand Duckats. At his departure he sent order to those in whose confidence he had left the gouernement of Tschin, that they should deliuer it vp to the French king, & shewing no lesse readinesse to render it then they were vnable to keepe it, he told them that the way to desie their fortune, was, not to giue her leaue to exercise her malice to their vttermoſt ruine.

Consaluo was marched at the same time into Calabria, where albeit was a generall inclination and desire to liue rather vnder the rule and Lordship of the French, yet their aduersities ouerruling their dispositions, he found almost no resistance, but with affections compelled, was receiued into euery towne, except Manfredonia and Tarenta. But the destinie of the countrey running with his fortune, after he had forced Manfredonia and the Castle, he incamped with his armie in the confines of Tarenta, where albeit he found greatest difficulties, yet in the end he had it by accord, for that the Count Potensò, to whose garde the young Duke of Calabria had bene recommended by his father) & Frier Leonard of Naples, Knight of Rodes, and gouernour of Tarenta, seeing no hope or possibilitie of further defence, compounded to giue vp the Citie and Castle, if within foure moneths they were not succoured. In which composition they receiued of him a solemne oath vpon the Sacrament, that he would leaue in libertie the Duke of Calabria, who had secret commandement from his father to come to him into Fraunce when he could no more resist his fortune: but neither the feare of God, nor regard to his honor, had more force, then the interest of the estate: for Consaluo, iudging what a matter of importance it would be in time to come, if the person of the Duke were not in the power of the king of Spaine: thinking it lesse sinne to dispense with his oath, thē to loose that oportunitie, would not suffer him to depart, but as soone as he could, sent him well accompanied into Spaine, where the king receiued him, and reteined him neare about him in high familiaritie and honours due to his greatnesse.

The eldest son of king Federick sent into Spaine.

In these seasons the affaires of the Pope proceeded with a prosperitie accustomed, for that he had easily got all the estates which the Colonniois and Sauelles held in the confines of Rome, of the which he disposed one part to the Ursins. And the Duke Valentinois continuing his enterprise against Plombyn, sent thither Uitellozze and Iohn Paule Baillon with new regiments: for whose coming, and the ill disposition of his businesse, Iacques Appyan the naturall Lord, leauing the towne and Castle manned with garrisons according to his fortune, went with speede into Fraunce, to see if he might obtaine of the king (who long afore had receiued him into his protection) that for the regard of his owne honour he would not suffer him to perishe. The king, without couering his infamie by art, answered him roundly, that hauing promised the Pope not to oppose against him, he could not minister to his distresse without doing wrong to the league sworne. But as nothing is more swift then aduersitie, which keepes his course by the violent motion that driues him: so, whilst the miserable Lord of Plombyn was in vaine soliciting for succours, Pandolfe Petrucci rendered the towne to the Duke of Valentinois, and within few dayes after, the Castle, (his industrie no lesse thē his fortune, turning all things to his discomfort). In this course of the Popes felicities, he married his daughter Lucrecia (wife afore to three husbands, and now widow by the death of Gismon Prince of Viselle, bastard sonne to Alphonso king of Naples, whom the Duke Valentinois had slaine) to Alphonso eldest sonne to Hercules D'Este, with a portion of an hundred thousand Duckats in ready money, and many other giftes of great value. To this mariage so vnworthy for the house of Este which was wont to seeke societie with the families most noble, Hercules and Alphonso consented, partly for that the French king desiring to satisfie the Pope in all things, was an importunate procurer of it; but chiefly they thought by this meane (if against so great a disloyaltie there be any suretie sufficiēt) to assure thēselues of the armes and ambition of the Duke Valentinois; who bearing a great power by the treasure & authoritie of the Sea Apostolike ioyned to the fauours which the French king bare him, was the only man that was feared throughout the greatest part of Italie, euery one knowing that his ambition was infinite, & his couetousnesse without limite. The French king continued with great diligence the negotiation of peace with Maximilian Caesar, not only for the hopes he had to shake off by that meane, expences and suspitions, & to obtaine of him the inuestiture of the Duchie of Millan which he desired much: but also to haue oportunitie to offend the Venetians, as being perswaded that his prosperities were griuousto them, and with all nourishing this opinion, that they laboured secretly to breake the peace betweene Cesar and him. But that which most stirred him to this inclination, was a couetous desire (as well for himselfe as at the perswasions of the Millanois) to recouer Cremona and Gusaradadda, townes which himselfe had accorded to them a litle before: and also to get againe Bresse, Bergame, and Creme, auncient apertenaunces of the Duchie of Millan, and lately possessed by the Venetians in the warres which they had with Philip Maria Visconte. To debate these things to better effect, & to ordaine the prouisions necessary for the expedition of Naples, he had long time before sent to Millan, the Cardinall of Ambosse, the tongue and authoritie of whom, were the proper tongue and authoritie of the king, and who had remained there many moneths, being not able, for the ordinarie variatōs of the king of Romains, to establish any thing with him. About this time, the Florentins solicited by meane of the Cardinall, to be receiued of new into the kings protection: but they made a vaine labour of it, for that the king propounded hard conditions, and declared a great alienation and estrauing of minde from them. Wherein pretending to be no further bound to the couenants made at Millan, he caused to be assigned ouer to the Lucquois (receiued of new into his protectiō) Pietrasanta and Mutron, as being auncient members of that Citie: but not without the summe of foure and twentie thousand Duckats, which he receiued of them as Lord of Genes, for that the Lucquois anciēt owners of Pietrasanta, had by reason of some necessities, engaged it for the like summe to the Genoways, from whom it was discēded afterwarde to the Florentins by force of armes. Besides, the Cardinall treated with them of Sienna, Lucqua, & Pisa, to knit them altogether for the reestablishing of Peter de Medicis in Florence: wherein as the Cardinall cast his plot, that the king should obtaine by this action a round summe of money of euery of them, so his intention tooke such proceeding, that they were almost at accord, and yet the deuise dissolved without effect, for that there was no agreement amongst them to satisfie the proportion of money that was demanded.

At length the Cardinall, winning by litle & litle vpon the inclination of the king of Romains, had a more certaine hope then before to contract some accord: and in that regard he went to Trent, to communicate with him, where they treated of many things concerning the establishment of Madame Claude the kings daughter, with Charles the eldest sonne to the Archduke, with concession of the inuestiture of the Duchie of Millan to both the one and other of them: they treated also to leaue war against the Venetians, to recouer those places which either of them pretended to be vsurped vpon them: and lastly, they consulted to call a generall Councell to reforme the Church, not onely (as they protested) in her members, but also in her head. Which motion the king of Romains seemed to entertaine with a semblance of consent, to nourish the hopes of the Cardinall of Ambosse to obtaine the Popedom, whereunto he aspired with manifest ambition, the king his maister being a speciall furtherer of the action for the interest of his proper greatnesse: Such a raging humour is ambition, that it tempteth those men to sollicite high honors, who for their proper vertues, are vnworthy of them: It makes them blind in their desires, and impudent to hope to compasse euē things that are without their reach. On the behalfe of the French king, it was accorded in that contract, that what confederation or alliance he had made, it should bee vnderstood with this clause, sauing the rites of the Empire, by meane whereof it should be lawfull to the Emperour to challenge it aswel for those that should be now named by the king, as for such as he had afore taken into his protection. There rested onely the principall difficulty touching the inuestiture, for that Cesar refused to graunt it to the issue males if the king should haue any. They stood also vpon termes for restitution of the exiles of the Duchie of Millan, which being instantly demanded by Cesar, the king refused flatly to graunt; for that besides they were many in number, there were also personages of importance and authoritie. At last by compulsiō of the kings importunities, he was content to giue libertie to Cardinall Ascanius, & hope of the like grace to Lodowik Sforce, with assignation of pension of twentie thousand Duckats by yeare to furnish his countenance in the Realme of France. By reason of these difficulties, ties, they fell not otherwise to accord, then with hopes to be able to introduce some conuenient forme, & therefore the truce being eftsfoones prolonged, the Cardinall returned into France, holding almost for certaine, that the matters which they had debated, would with speede diuolue to their perfectiō: which opinion was augmented by this occasion, that a litle after, the Archduke, before he went into Spaine to receiue in his person, & the person of Lane his wife eldest daughter of the king there, the oath of fidelitie of the peoples, as ordained to that successiō: he made his way by lād accompanied with his wife, & met at Blois with the French king, who receiuing him with many honors, they rested agreed touching the mariage of their children. In this yeare dyed Augustin Barbarin Duke of Venice, who managed his principality with such happinesse & authority, that in many actiōs it seemed that he ouercame the degree of his predecessors: therefore the power of his successors being limited by new lawes, Leonard Loredan was elected in his place, the common weale feeling no change in publike things, neither by the death of the Prince, nor for the election of a new: so excellent was the forme of his gouernement.

In this yeare, the Florentins and the Pisans (contrary to the customes of the yeares before) brought forth no great actions one against the other: for that the Florentins, being no more vnder the protection of the French, and standing in continuall suspition of the Pope and the Duke Valeuinois, studied more to keepe that was their owne, then to offend others: and the Pisans not hauing of themselues any power to vex them, had lesse possibilitie to do it by the ayde of others, for that there were none that stirred otherwise in their fauours, but onely to sustaine them when they were in perill of ruine. But in the yeare 1502. might be scene a recontinuatiō of their actions accustomed, for that the Florentins, almost in the beginning of the yeare, contracted of new with the French king, after they had ouercome all difficulties, more by the benefit of fortune, then by the disposition of the king or other occasions: seeing the king of Romains (since the Cardinall of Amboise departed) being possessed of new thoughts & purposes, & refusing to accomplishe to the French king the inuestiture of the Duchie, yea euen to his daughters married, sent as his Embassadours into Italie, Hermes Sforce, whom the king had acquitted of his imprisonment, and the Prouost of Bessina, to deale with the Pope and the other Potentates touching his descending into Italie, to take the Crowne of the Empire. These Embassadours, omitting no oportunitie wherein occasion was giuen, as they sojourned certaine dayes in Florence, obtained promise of the same Citie to contribute to his ayde with a hundred men at armes and thirtiethousand Duckats, as soone as he was entered into Italie. In which respect, the French king (Princes are iealous one ouer another touching amities & forreine confidences) who feared least the Florentins dispairing of his friendship, would turne their fauours to Maximilian, was content to qualifie the immoderate demands he had made to them, & contracted an accord vnder conditions more tollerable: the generall parts wherof were these: That the king receiuing them into his protectiō, should be bound for three yeare following, to defend them with armes at his proper expēces, against who so euer would directly or indirectly molest the touching the state and dominions which at that time they possessed: That the Florentins should pay to him within the said three yeares, six score thousand Duckats, euery yeare a third part: That all other capitulations made betweene them, with all bondes and promises depending on the same, should be made dissolued and voyde: That it should be lawfull to the Florentins to proceede with armes against the Pisans, and all others that occupie their lands.

Accord betweene the French king and the Florentines.

In regard of which confederation, the Florentins recomforted and taking a new hart, determined to giue the spoyle to the cornes and graines of the countrey of Pisa, to the end that by time and famine, they might reduce the towne of Pisa to their obedience, seeing they had so vnluckily trauelled to force them by siege. This counsell was propounded in the first yeare of their rebellion by a certaine well experienced Citizen, alledging that by those meanes, more certaine, but further off, they should afflict and consume the Pisans, with litle expences and lesse danger: he told the that in regard of the present cōditions of Italy, much troubled & molested, if they would make store of their treasures, they might make them serue their turnes in many occasions: but if, with the wast of their money, they would range them by force & cōpulsion, they should find the enterprise both doubtful & dangerous, for that the suretie of that Citie was great by the situation & strength of the walles, and full of inhabitants well resolute to defend it: besides also, as often as there should be perill to lose it, it would be rescued by all those that to the enuie of our well doing, haue ioyned a settled disposition to see it preferred: in so much as the expences being greater then the hopes, we should alwayes nourish our proper daungers, and cut out occasions to stirre vp new trauels: All violent attempts being set forth without counsell, at the beginning seeme mightie, but in continuance they are found insufficient, since in the field, armor and weapons are to small purpose, if at home a sound counsell set not downe a good direction. The counsel of this gracie Citizen being rejected in the beginning for hurtful, after the course of many yeres, was found profitable, but in a time wherein they had wasted huge expences & treasures, & attempted the victory with many intollerable dangers. After they had ouerrun their corne, hoping that the authority of the kings protection wold defend all me from rising in the succours of the Pisans, they planted their siege before Licopisan, for that not many dayes before, the Pisans had taken it from them by treason of certaine souldiers that were within: and the Captaine of the Castell not abiding for the succours which should haue arrived within few houres, did render it to them with great cowardise. They made no doubt to cary it, by the penury of prouision and victuals, which they knew could not suffice for fifteene dayes, and they had good confidence to let that none should enter, for that by the benefite of their Bastillions, which they had builded separate vpon the mountaines, they commaunded all the passages: and in the same season being aduertised, that Fracasse but poore and without pay, was going with a few horsemen to enter Pisa, in the name and with letters of Maximilian, they gaue direction that he should be charged on the way, where his fortune being no lesse enuious then his condition was poore, he was made prisoner, seeking his safetie in a Church within the iurisdiction of the Duke of Ferrara. These accidents fell in Tuscan, no man as yet perceiuing what would happen by them contrary to the expectation of euery one.

The French & the Spaniards do disagree vpon the deuiding of Naples.

But farre more, great and daungerous motions, and of the which were to descend in time to come, effects of right great importance, beganne to be disclosed in the kingdome of Naples, by the discords which hapned the yere passed betweene the French and Spanish Captaines. They tooke their beginning, for that in the diuision made betweene both the kings, the countrie of Lanoro and Abruzzo being adiudged to the one; and to the other, Powilla and Calabria, the confines and limites of the prouinces were not well expressed in the diuision, in so much as either one began to pretend, that that part which is called Capitainato did distantly and particularly appertaine to him. To this controuersie gaue a great occasion, the alteration and chaunge made by Alphonso, of Aragon King of Naples, first of that name, touching the auncient denomination and diuision of the prouinces: He, looking to make easie the exactions of the reuenues, deuided all the kingdome into these fixe principall prouinces, Lanoro, Principato, Basilicato, Calabria, Powilla, and Abruzzo: Of these Powilla was distinguished into these three members, Otranto, Bary, and Capitainato, which Capitainato adioyning to Abruzzo, and diuided from the residue of Powilla by the Riuer Lofanto, aunciently called Ausido, the Frenchmen, taking rather the aduantage of the auncient diuision, then ruled by the late denomination, pretended, that either Capitainato was not comprehended vnder any one of the foure prouinces deuided, or else that it was rather part of Abruzzo then of Powilla. In this contention, the importance of the countrey ledde them not so much, as the consideratiō of these two infirmities; the one, for that not possessing Capitainato, they had no part in the reuenue which was drawne of the tribute of cattell, a reuenue of greatest profit in all the Realme of Naples: the other, for that Abruzzo and Lanoro being naked of graines and corne which came to Capitainato, whose prouinces in times of sterilitie might be easilie reduced into great extremities, as often as the Spanish would make restraint that none should be fetched out of Powilla and Sicilia. But it was alleaged on the contrary, that Capitainato could not appertaine to the French, for that Abruzzo which is ended in the high places, stretcheth not so farre as the plaines: and for that also in cases of difference of the names and limits of prouinces, the vsage present is alwayes considered. Notwithstanding these controuersies suspending, they were content for the yere present to deuide equally the reuenue of the cattell: but in the yere following, falling from that obseruation, either partie tooke as much as he could get, whereunto were added afterwards new quarrels, nourished til that time (as the bruite went) more by the wils of the Captaines, then of the consent of their Lords and Kings. For the Spaniards pretended that Principato and Basilicato were included in Calabria, which is deuided into two parts, Calabria Cyra and Calabria Ultra, that is, the one higher and the other lower: and also that the valley of the Beneuent which the French held, was part of Powilla, and therefore sent officers to keepe

Courts

Courtes of iustice at Tripaldo within two miles of Anelino, where were resident the French magistrates. These beginnings of open dissention being troublesome to the principall Barons of the realme, they interposed betweene Consaluo and Lewys d'Arminack, Duke of Nemours, Viceroy for the French king, and by their intercession, Lewys being come to Melfe, and Consaluo to Atele a towne of the Prince of Melfe, after the trauell of certaine moneths (in which time the two Captaines spake together) finding in them no conformitie to any forme of accord, they brought them to agree to expect such resolution as their kings should set downe of the controuerse, and that in the meane time they should forbear to innouate any thing. But the Viceroy for the French, presuming much that he was the mightier in power and force, within few dayes after, published another declaration, protesting to make warre vpon Consaluo, if he would not vpon the sight leaue Capitinato: and with a speede as swift as his counsell was rash, he made his souldiers runne vpon euen to Tripaldo, of which inuasion the warre tooke his beginning, wherein the French perseuering with actions of hostility, they folowed their purpose without regard, to occupy by force in Capitinato and other quarters, the townes which the Spanish held. Which outrages were not onely not redressed by the French king, but being aduertised that the Spanish meant not to yeeld him Capitinato, he conuerted himselfe wholly to the warre, and sending by sea for the strength of his people, two thousand Swizzers, he kept still entertained in his pay the Princes of Salerno and Bisignian, and other of the principall Barons: besides, the kings person came to Lyon, to the end in his owne presence to furnish more conueniently the prouisions necessary for the conquest of the whole kingdome, whereunto (the places in question were lesse then to satisfie his ambition) he aspired manifestly, with intention to passe into Italy if neede require: a voyage which he was constrained to performe with a speede aboute his expectation, to suppress the new tumults hapned in Turkane, to the which Vittellozze gaue beginning with the priuity and consent of I. P. Baillon, and the Yrmins, but epecially by the counsell & authority of Pandolfe Petrucci, who all ioyned in one desire, that Peter de Medicis might be re-established in the estate of Florence.

The beginning of warres in Naples vnder K. Lewis the twelfth.

Of this begunne the mutiny: William Pazzi Agent for the Florentyns in Aretze, being aduertised that certaine of the Citizens had conspired with Vittellozze to stirre the City to rebellion against the Florentyns, beleued that in such a commualty of wise Citizens, the mind of euery one was not corrupted, nor remembring that to fauour the suspicion, makes the treason more dangerous. And occupying with himselfe this perswasion, that the authority of the name publike, would supply the want of forces, he omitted to areare a sufficient strength to oppresse the conspirators and such as had power to resist him, and onely apprehended for prisoners, two of the accessaries and competitors to the treason: a dealing too milde in so great perill, for that he gaue opportunity to the residue of the conspirators, to raise the people, by whom (according to the ill affection they bare the Florentyns) the prisoners were easily reskued, and the Agent apprehended, together with the residue of the officers, suffering this danger more by their owne credulity and negligence, then any prowesse or vertue of their aduersaries. The whole City forthwith published the name of liberty, and made manifest declaration of rebellion, the Citadell onely remaining in the deuotion of the Florentyns, to the which, in the beginning of the tumult, was retired Cosma Bishop of the same place, and sonne to the Agent, seeking his safety where either his feare or fortune would leade him. After this beginning, the men of Aretze sent speedily to Vittellozze, who was not well content that the matter was burst out afore the time he had agreed with the conspirators, for that it was to intercept him in his pollicy, as hauing not yet set downe sufficient direction for the prouisions he meant to make to resist the bands of the Florentyns, if (as was very likely) they made any attempt to enter Aretze by the Citadell: For feare whereof, and to satisfie with his presence the minds of the Citizens, he went from Citta de Castello to Aretze, accompanied with his men at armes and a choyse strength of footmen, and leauing order that they should looke diligently to hold those in the Citadell straitly inclosed, to the end that through it there might be no action against the Citie, he returned estsoones to Citta de Castello, promising to come againe with the same speede, but with a greater strength: In all humane actions, there is nothing which with lesse perill may not temporise and expect, then rebellion, in the oppression whereof there is no greater vertue then expedition of action: For that, by how much it is suffered, by so much it riseth into degrees of worse nature, euen as a soare that, is lingred, breedeth a cure doubtfull. They of Florence to whom appertained to provide for this mischief, considered not well in the beginning, of what importance it was: for, the principall Citizens, by whose counsell the waighthy affaires of the City had wont to passe, giuing this direction, that the regiments which were incamped before Vicopisan (a number so sufficient, that marching with diligence they might haue vanquished all resistance (should be conuerted to Aretze. Many others which occupied the greatest romthes and offices (their knowledge being lesse then their authority, and their ignorance slaunderous to the places they occupied) maintained that it was a matter but of small moment, and that they might redresse it with the forces of their other subiects, neighbors to the same city. Their ignorance made the suspect the soundnesse of the other counsell, and according to their wilfull credulity, they beleueed that those good Citizens, bearing minds estranged from the present gouernment, made the daunger farre greater then it was, for a desire they had to hinder the action of Vicopisan, and by that meane to take away the oportunity to recouer Pisa. By which variation & wandering in counsel, they deferred so long to send strength thither, that Vitellozze taking courage of their delayes, returned to Aretze with an increase of forces, drawing thither after him with other bands I. P. Baillon, and Fabio the sonne of P. Vrsin, Peter de Medicis and the Cardinall: who hauing receiued munitions from Sienna, they began to batter the Citadell, wherein (according to the custome of many which are more craefull to erect new fortifications, the diligent to preferue the forts already builded) was no lesse want of victuals, then of all other prouisions necessary to defence. And to adde the last discomfort to men in extremity, they enuironed it so straightly with trenches and mounts on the out side to giue impediment to the succours that might enter, that they made them naked of all comfort, other then such as men in misery may hope for: and therefore, waighing with their wants within the Castell, the weaknesse of the Florentyns to minister sufficient succours, and in due season (being come but to Quarata, and durst not passe further) they rendred by necessity, that which they could not hold by their vertue, making only this agreemēt, that the residue remaining in liberty, the Bishop with eight others which they of Aretze would chuse, should abide prisoners, to exchange them for some of their Citizens which were prisoners at Florence. The cōmons of Aretze dismantled the Citadell, & the army of the Florentins, fearing least Vitellozze & Iohn Pawle, who were farre stronger then they, would charge them, retired to Montemarcho, leauing to the discretion of the enemies, all the places there about. It was beleueed, that this enterprise was made without the priuity or knowledge of the Pope and Duke Valentinois, in whom was no contentment that Peter de Medicis should returne to Florence, for that he was straightly allied with Vitellozze and the Vrsins, whom they had secretly determined to oppresse: and yet hauing alwayes giuen them hope of the contrary, they consented that Vitellozze, Iohn Pawle and Fabio, mercenary in their pay, should prosecute the enterprise: Yea they did not dissemble that they were very glad, of the rebellion of Aretze, hoping, that by those displeasures done to the Florentyns, it might happen, that either they might get some part of their dominion, or at least constraime them, for their profit, to some hard condition. But the Florentyns not beleueing but that they were the authours of the whole mischief, were so much the more terrified, and therefore reposing litle in the remedies which of themselues they were able to apply, for that, by the ill disposition of the City, they had in their pay but a very small proportion of men at armes, & not able to refurbish their power so soone as the necessity of their danger required: they had speedy recourse to the French King, laying afore him not only that which they could challenge by his honour, binding himselfe so lately to their defence, but also the apparent daunger to the Duchy of Mullan, if the Pope and Duke Valentinois (against whom was no litle suspicion to be the kindlers of this commotion) became Lords ouer Tuskane. They debated with him by liuely reasons, that the Pope and the Duke were mighty in armes, hauing an army compounded vpon excellent Captaines and souldiers of choise, and that by the declarations they made, neither Romania nor Tuskane would suffice their infinite ambition, aspiring into matters more ample and immoderate. And lastly, seeing they had offended the honour of the King, by inuading such as were in his protection, necessity now constrained them, to thinke no lesse vpon their owne suretie, then to take from him the meane to be reuenged of so great an iniurie.

haue recourse to the French
king.

These reasons moued not a litle the King, who had already begunne to mislike with the infolency and ambition of the Pope and his sonne: and considering that the warre was begun in the kingdom:

kingdome of Naples betweene him and the Spanish, and the negotiation of accord with Maximilian broken, and lastly that he was not (for many reasons) to trust the Venetians, he began to doubt least the inuasion of Tuskane (supported by some secret counsell of others) turned not to his great disadvantage. In which opinion he was confirmed greatly by certaine aduertisements from Charles d'Amboise the Cardinals Nephew, and Lieutenant to the King in all the Duchie of Millan, who suspecting such innouations, perswaded the King to provide carefully for his proper daunger: and therefore with a counsell resolved, and direction equall to the importunity of the businesse, determining to make march into Italy with all speede his army, and to succour readily the Florentins, he gaue charge in the meane while to the sayd Lord Charles, to send forthwith to their rescues, foure hundred Launces, and dispatched an Herald in post to commaund not onely Vitellozzo, John Pawle, Pandolfe, and the Vrsins, but also the Duke Valentino, to forbear to offend any more the Florentins; whetein himselfe made great instance to the Popes Embassador, and threatned with very sharpe words Julian de Medicis, and the agents of Pandolfe and Vitellozzo which were in his Court.

But in this time, the Duke Valentino, who since the accident of Aretze, was come out of Rome with his army, making semblance to take Camerin, whither he had sent before the Duke of Grassino and Liuero de Ferme with part of his bands, to make spoyle and hold it besieged, but in true meaning to surprize vnder that semblance the Duchy of Vrbino. After he had reassembled his armie vpon the confines of Perousa, he demaunded of Guidobaldo Duke of Vrbino, money and artillery: which was easily agreed to him, for that it was neither for his surety to refuse a Prince who had his strength so neare, and also hauing a little before compounded with the Pope touching the controuersie of a tribute, he had no occasion to feare. The Duke Valentino, hauing by this meane made the other lesse sufficient for his owne defence, departing sodainely from Nocero, and marching with a diligence so well disposed as he would giue his men no leasure to repose or bayte, he arriued the same day at Cagly a towne of the Duchy. The suddenesse of whose coming, and against a people vnprovided, brought such a generall amaze, that the Duke and Francis Maria Romero Prefect of Rome, his nephew, had scarce leasure to find safety in flying: such a passion is sudden feare, that it makes men runne, not whither counsell directs them, but whither their fortune will leade them, not suffering them to consider of their perill, but makes them oftentimes to throw away their weapons, and refuse the thing that should be their safeguard, but the Duke Valentino, putting diligence to the disposition of his fortune, obtained in very few hours, a victory of all that state, except the Roocke of Saint Leon, and Manniola; to the great displeasure and feare of Pandolfe, Vitellozzo, and the Vrsins, who now began to discern their proper perils, by the harmes of another.

After the conquest of the Duchie of Vrbino, the Duke Valentino, who iudged all aduentures inferior to his fortune, was raised into diuerse thoughts: somtimes he determined to make an end of the enterprise of Camerin, and somtimes he resolved to inuade openly the Florentins. In which counsell he had stood settled, if the commaundement he receiued from the French king, had not bridled his ambition, hauing assured knowledge, that notwithstanding the Popes trauell to alter him, his maiestie had sent men at armes in fauour of the Florentins, & was resolutely determined to defend them, and in that inclination he prepared to passe in person into Italy. These doubts drawing diuerse reasons; with no lesse variation touching the ende of things, so incombered his thoughts, that he staid within Vrbino to consider what he had to do, and what would be the successe of things, during which time the Pope & he solicited many matters with the Florentins, hoping to bring them somewhat to condescend to their desires: & on the other side, he suffered many of his souldiers to go continually to the Campe of Vitellozzo: who hauing assembled an army of eight thousand horsemen and three thousand footmen, and for the better reputation of his doings, calling his army the Camp Ecclesiasticall, had, since the fending of the Citadell of Aretze, occupied Mount S. Souny, Chastillon d'Aretze, and the city of Cortono with all the other townes and boroughs of Valdichiano: of the which not one of them taried an assault, both for that they saw the succours of the Florentins not in readinesse, & also, the time seruing them to gather the fruits, it stood not with their abilities to lose the profit of their reuenues, alledging that in that respect they were not rebels to the Florentins seeing Peter de Medicis was in the army, for whose restoring it was sayd that enterprise was made: and it is not to be doubted, that if Vitellozze, after the taking of Cortona, had suddenly entred the countrey Casentin, but it had bene in his power to haue marched euen to the wallés of Florence, both for that the French bandes were not yet come, and also the most part of the Florentine footmen were disperfed, for that almost (the townes being loft) the occasion of seruice ceased: and they were returned to their houses. But as it hapneth oftentimes that verie small impedimentes hinder the execution of many high enterprises, so the desire hee had to winne for him selfe the borough of S. Sepulcher (a place neare to Citta de Castello) hindred the better counsell, notwithstanding (to couer his couetousnesse) he alledged that it was not sure to leaue behinde his backe any place that was enemye: therefore hee turned towards Anguiano, which place, albeit it onely had this constancie to abide till the artilleries were planted, being too weake to resist so strong an enemye, yeelded to discretion without excepting any thing. From thence he marched to the borough S. Sepulcher which he took by accord, hauing no better abilitie of resistance then the rest, and so drawing towards Casentin, and arriuing at the village of Rassina, he sent to summon the towne of Poppie, of strong situation, but wherein were verie few souldiers: but the reputation of the French armes supplied their weaknesse & want of fortres, for that two hundred Launces arriued alreadie neare Florence vnder Captaine Imbault, and not daring for lacke of footmen, to affront the enemye, were marched to S. Iohn d'Arno, with intention to reassemble in that place all the bands. Which being knowne to Vitellozze, and fearing least his absence would be inconuenient for them of Aretze, hee retired with diligence from Lanernia within two miles of Quaratta, and from thence drawing on to declare that he feared not the enemye, & to assure Rhondina with other places there abouts, he encaped in a strong place on that side to Rhondina hauing left certaine bands of footmen for the gard of Cimitella and Gargonse, which were the ports or gates by the which the Florentin bands might enter into the countrey. These companies (being also arriued two hundred Launces more vnder Captaine La Hire) assembled betwene Momenuarche & Laterina, with intention, that as soone as they had gathered a strength of three hundred footmen, to go incampe neare Vitellozze vpon some high hill: A resolution against his suretie, and therefore neither able to keepe that place, nor leaue his Camp without great daunger, he retired neare to the wallés of Aretze: but the French taking the field with their whole armie, and incamping right ouer against Quaratta, he was driuen to retire within Aretze. Where albeit he had sayd to many, that hee would performe a notable defence in the same Citie, yet new accidents hapning, he was constrained to turne to new thoughts. For, Iohn Paule Baillon was come to Perouse with his regiment, fearing (by that that was done to the Duke of Urbino) least he should fall into daunger of the like oppression. By reason of which examples, and no lesse for that which hapned in Camerin, Vitellozze, Pandolfe Petrucci, & the Ursins, fell into great confusion of minde: For in the verie time that the Duke Valentinois communed of accord with Iules de Varana Lord of Camerin, hee surprised the Citie by suttile meanes, and hauing Iules in his power with two of his sonnes, he caused them to be strangled with the same inhumanitie which he vsed against others. But that which most amazed Vitellozze, was, that the French king, alreadie come to Ast, sent Louys Trimonille into Tuscan with two hundred Launces, & great strength of artilleries: who marching to Parma, expected there three thousand Swysers: which the king sent for the recouerie of Aretze, at the charges of the Florētins. The king being greatly kindled against the Pope, had an intentiō to despoile the Duke Valentinois of Romania with other estates occupied by him, and for that effect, had sent for all those that either feared his power, or had bene offended by him, whom he assured that he would execute that intention in person, and protested publicly with great affection, that it was an enterprise no lesse full of pietie and deuotion, then if the action were dressed against the Turks. He layd also his plot, at that time to chase out of Sienna Pandolfe Petrucci, for that he had sent mony to Lodowike Sforce when he returned to Millan, and alwayes had made open profession to be Imperiall. But the Pope and Duke Valentinois knowing that they were not able to resist so great a storme and rage of anger of the French king, had recourse to their suttleties and well experienced craftes, with the which they forged excuses, that the actions against Aretze were done by Vitellozze without their knowledge, & that their authority sufficed not to restrain him, & much lesse to keepe fro aiding him, the Ursins, and I. P. Baillon, who albeit were in his pay, yet they were ouerruled with the regard to their proper interests: & the better to bring the mind of the king to moderatiō, Duke Valent. sent to tell Vitellozze, that if he restored not Aretze and the other places of the Florentins, he would come with his whole army, and compell him to render that, which he had vniustly gotten. Which summons ioyed to the consideration of the present estate of the affaires, bred no litle astonishment in the mind of Vitellozze, fearing least (as hapneth for the most part) that the strongest being reconciled, the indignation of the king would turne against him, which was the weaker in strength, and farre inferior in all other meanes: and therefore to auoyd his peril so apparant, he called into Aretze the Captaine Imbault (contrary notwithstanding to the wils of the Florentins, who desired that the townes lost might be redeliuered freely in the field) who compounded that Vitellozze departing immediatly with all his companies, should consigne Aretze with all the other places to the French Captaines to hold them in the kings name, vntill the Cardinall Vrsin, who went to the king, had spoken with his maiesty: and that in the meane while, there should not enter into Aretze other companies then of the French Captains with forty horsemen: for whose surety, & no lesse for obseruation of the articles promised, he should giue two of his Nephewes in ostage to Captaine Imbault. As soone as the accord was passed, he went with all his companies and artillery from Aretze, leauing to the French men, the whole possession of all the other places, which forthwith were deliuered ouer to the Florentins by the kings commission. Whilest the Parley of the accord continuèd, Captaine Imbault answered in scorn to the complaints, which the Florentins made, that he could not discerne wherein consisted that great celebration of spirit and wisdom in the Florentins, seeing they knew not, that the sooner to assure the victory without difficulty and expences, and to auoide peril of other disorders, how to desire that Aretze might fall into the hands of the king, who was not bound to beare regard (but in sort as he thought good) to the promises made by his Captaines to Vitellozze. But the Florentins more by their fortune then their vertue, being deliuered with great facility, but not without huge expences, of so terrible & vnlooked for assault, began to looke to the reordaining and redressing of the pollicy of their common weale, by the confusion and disorders of which, experience had made them find out, yea euen to the estate of the communalty, that they were falne into so great and sundry daungers, for that by the often chaunge of magistrates, and for the name of a few that were suspected to the people, there was not one whether he were publike or a priuat person, in whom rested a perpetuall care of the affaires. But for that tyrannie was abhorred almost of the whole city, & the authority of personages most honest was suspected of the multitude, and for that by the president of times past, they held it not possible to ordaine with common deliberation, a perfect forme of government, the ignorant sort and incapable being not able to be conuincèd with reasons only: it was determined to introduce for the time, this only new thing, that the Gonfalonier of iustice chiefe of the dominion, & whose creatiō (together with it) was for the time of two moneths, should be chosen hereafter for his whole life: so might he keepe a continuall study ouer the affaires publike, that through negligence they might not fall effsoones into so great daungers. It was hoped, that with the authority which the quality of his person would giue him, and for that he was to remaine perpetually in so great dignity, he should winne such opinion of faith & credit with the people, that with time he might easily reestablish the other parts of the gouernment, & withall, placing Citizens of greatest condition in some degrees honourable, he might constitute a meane betweene himselfe & the communalty, by the which the ignorance and liberty popular being tempered, and all such bridled as should succeede him in the same dignity, if they would aspire or rise too high, he might leaue established a wise and honourable gouernment, with many good circumstances to containe the City in peace. After this deliberation was well debated and resoluèd, there was chosen for Gonfalonier, by the great Councell with a concourse and consent of almost all the Citizens, Peter Soderin, a man for his age very ripe in counsell and experience, for his countenance, of very great wealth and furnishings for his house, noble aboue most of the residue of Citizens; for his credit, mightie in opinion & affection with the people; and bearing a reputation of integrity, continencie, and to haue alwayes nourished great cares of the publike businesse. Lastly, he was without children, a point not of the least consideration, for that they might breede occasions to lift vp his thoughts to ambitious purposes.

But now to returne to the affaires common and generall: As soone as the French king was come to Aff, all the Princes and free Cities of Italy (according to their custome) ranne to him: some in person, & some by Embassadors: amongst whom was Baptistum Vrsin Cardinall, who went thither against the Popes will, to iustifie his brethren and Vitellozzo touching the action of Arezzo, and withall to stirre vp the king against the Pope and Duke Valentinois, against whom, by the consideration of the vehemencie shewed afore by the king, all Italy expected with great desire, that the French forces might be opposed. But experience declareth this to be true, that that which many desire, succeedeth rarely, for that the effects of humaine actions depending ordinarily of few, and the intentions and ends of them differing from the meanings and ends of many, hardly can things succcede otherwayes then according to the intention of those that giue their first motion: euen so it hapned in this case, for that interelts and ends particular induced the king to make deliberations contrary to the desire vniuersall. Wherein the thing that moued the king, was not so much the diligence of the Pope, who ceased not by the negociation of men speciall, to labour to appease him, as the suttile counsell of the Cardinall Amboise, nourishing a perpetuall desire to enter amity betweene the Pope and the king, induced perhaps thereunto (besides the weale & vtility of his king) for his owne profit and purpose particular: both for the Pope recontinued his legation ouer the realme of Fraunce for eightene moneths, and also studying carefully to lay foundations to raise him to the Popedom, he sought to be able to obtaine of him, the promotion of his parents and dependences whilest he was in the Cardinalship, and withall he iudged that to haue the name and reputation, to be a louer and protector of the estate Ecclesiastike, was a thing that might do much to serue to his intention. Touching these deuises, the conditions of the time present were very conuenient to draw the king to fauour his counsels, for that as he was in suspition with the Emperour, who could not be appeased; so hauing of new sent to Trent many bands of horsemen with a certaine proportion of footmen, he made also great offers to the Pope to ayde him to passe into Italy to take the Crowne imperiall.

Amid these doubts, euery enterprise of the Emperour fell into more great consideration, for that the king knew that it stood not with the liking of the Venetians, that the Duchy of Millan and realme of Naples, should be ornaments of his Crowne. To these was added the controuersie which he had with the foure Cantons Swissers, who required him to giue y^e to them the rights he had to Bellinzane, and withall to redeliuer to their possession the Vale Veltolino, Schafonse, with other things immoderate, threatning him that his deniall to these demaunds would drie them to enter confederation with Maximilian: difficulties which seemed to the king so much the more great and desperate, by how much he was out of all hope at that time to accord with the king of Spaine: For, albeit the French king had made motions to haue Federyk restored to the kingdom of Naples, for which occasion he offered to bring him with him into Italy, and that the negotiation still continued to establish a truce for a time, euery one reteining that he possessed: yet both in the one and other practise, there concurred so many obiections and impediments, that the French king with melancholy moodes and discontentments tooke occasion to dismisle from his Court the Spanish Embassadors. The Pope ioyning himselfe to these occasions, and no lesse he then the Duke Valentinois, watching the aduantages of times and accidents, had sent eftsloones to his maiestie, one Troccio, Chamberleyne to the Pope, and of his secret credence, promising to ayde him with all their power in the warre of Naples. In which respects, he determined to recontinue in the amitie of the Pope: and therefore vpon the returne of Troccio to Rome, the Duke Valentinois following the aunswere he brought, went secretly in post to find the king arriued then at Millan, of whom, contrary to the common expectation, & no lesse to the displeasure of euery one in particular, he was welcomed with honours and demonstrations fatte greater then was the kings custome. The king vpon reconcilment with the Duke, holding it now no more necessary to keepe his army in Tuskane, sent a countermaund to haue them come into Lombardy, hauing afore receiued into his protection the Siemois, and Pandolfo Petrucci, with condition to pay him forty thousand Duckats at dayes limited. After these chaunges and contracts of amities, the stirres of Maximilian began to grow cold and dissolue, insomuch as the kings thoughts had now no other exercise, then to deuise vpon the things of Naples, which, if till then seemed to haue succeded happily to him, he nourished for time to come hopes of greater prosperity: For, he was no sooner come into Italy, then he dispatched thither by sea two thousand Swissers, and more then two thousand Gascois, who ioyning to the strength of the Viceroy (occupying already all Campaniat except Manfredonia and S. Ange) encamped before Canosa which Peter of Nauarra kept with sixe hundred Spaniards: who, after he had made a valiant resistance for many dayes, and and receiuing direction from Consaluo not to abide the extremity of daungers, for feare to lose so many well trained & resolute bodies, rendred the towne to the French, their goods & liues failed. By reason of this accident, and the Spaniards holding now no more place neither in Powylla, Calabria, nor Capitinaso, except, besides the peeces afore named, Barletta, Andria, Galipoli, Tarente, Cosenze, Quierace, Semmare, and a few others by the sea, and being farre inferior in strength and numbers: Consaluo retired with the army to Barletto, without m oney, with scarcity of victuals, & with no lesse want of munitions (aduersities intollerable to an army.) But touching the last want, he was somewhat recomforted by a secret consent of the Venetians, who did not restraine him to buy at Venice a great quantity of saltpeter. The French king making this suffrance an occasion of complaint against the Senat, was answered, that it was an action without their knowledge done only by certaine marchants particular, & that at Venice, which is a City free, it was neuer defended to any to exercise their negotiation and traffike for marchandise. When Canoza was taken; the French Captaines (debating the present difficulties, but chiefly that for want of water the whole army could not continue incamped about Barletta, an opinion maintained against the counsels and protestations of M. d'Aubigny) determined that one part of their people, which they sayd were in number a thousand and two hundred Launces, and ten thousand footmen of all natures, should remaine still to continue a forme of a siege about the confines of Barlette, and the other part shold be employed to recouer the residue of the realme. A deliberation (in the coniectures of wise men) which ioyned to the ordinary negligence of the French nation, brought great hurt to their enterprife. The Viceroy immediatly vpon this resolution, made himselfe Lord of all Powylla, except Tarenta, Otrante, and Galipoly. After which successe he returned to the siege of Barlette. M. d'Aubigny at the same time (communicating in the fortune of the others) entring into Calabria with the other part of the army, sacked the City of Cosenze, the Rocke remaining still in the power of the Spanish, who, being all drawne into one strength that were in that province, and ioyning the other bands that were come from Cicilia, were afterwards broken by M. d'Aubigny in one encounter. These prosperities being all happened, or vppon the point to succeed whilest the French King was in Italy, made him not only negligent in the continuation of necessary prouisions (by the benefit whereof he might easily haue chased the enemies out of the whole kingdome) but also brought him into this opinion of security, that he had no doubt to returne into Fraunce, & that so much the more, by how much he hoped to obtaine (which hope was not in vaine) a long prorogation of truce with the king of Romains.

But at his departure out of Italy, men began to discern to their great maruell, what had bene treated vpon with the Duke Valentinois, whom (accepting his iustification touching the action of Aretze) he had not only receiued againe into grace, but also in recompence of the oath and promise made by the Pope and him, to ayde his maiesty in the warre of Naples when neede should be, he had for his part, giuen them promise to support the Duke with three hundred Launces to conquer Bologna in the name of the Church, and to oppresse Iohn Pawle Baillon and Vitellozze. He was drawne to beare such immoderate fauours to the greatnesse of the Pope, either for the ill aduised opinion he had to make him his whole and true friend by so great benefits, which would be a meane that not one durst offer to attempt any thing against him in Italy: or else for that he did not so much assure himselfe of his friendship, as he feared his ill will. To these respects were adioyned, the particular disdaine which he bare against Iohn Pawle, Vitellozze, and the Vrsins, for that they made no reckening of the authority of his commandements to forbear to offend the Florentins: and Vitellozze in particular, had refused to restore the artilleries he tooke at Aretze, and also to come to the kings presence, hauing obtained safe conduct for his safety. Besides all these, the king held it a thing not vnprofitable to the course of his affaires, to hold the Italian Captaines oppressed, beginning to feare least they and the Vrsins (in mercenary souldiers constancie is the least vertue) might in the end embrace the faction of the Spanish king, and enter into his pay. The Duke Valentinois, hauing leaue of the king, returned with no little contentment into Romana, notwithstanding the king afore had giuen hopes to such as feared his ambition, that for the common suretie, he would take him with him into Fraunce. His returning touched not only the minds of those against whom were kindled his former indignations, but also it disordered the cogitations of many others, for that the same feare occupied Pandolfe Petrucci & the Vrsins, who were conioyned almost in one selfe cause with Vitellozze and Iohn Pawle Baillon: The Duke of

Ferrara, by how much more he held for suspected his infidelitie and the ambition of his father, by so much lesse made he reckening of any assurance in regard of parentage or other cause conductible. And touching the Florentins, notwithstanding they had recouered their places by the kings fauour, yet they had no lesse feare then the others (being ill prouided of men at armes) for that the king, reposing not wholly in the Marquis of Montana, for the intelligences he had with the Emperour, at such time as he had feare of his armes, and albeit at Millan he receiued him to reconciliation and grace, yet wold he neuer consent that they should entertaine him as their Captaine generall: knowing withall by many signes, that the Pope and Duke Valentino continued in the same will and inclination which they had against them, and specially, for that (to keepe them in perpetuall suspicion) they reassembled and gathered together all the exiles of Aretze and the other townes. And as feare brings into the cogitation of the minde all things that may either be doubted or suspected, so it increased so much the more in these seuerall estates and men, by how much they considered how mightie were such enemies, in armes, in money, and in authoritie, how much in all actions they had bene supported by the fauours of fortune, and lastly, that notwithstanding the glory, riches, and greatnesse they had gotten by their victories, yet their ambition was neuer the more satisfied, but their desires the lesse moderate, according to the propertie of a fire, whose rage becomes more infinite by the increase of matter wherewith it is nourished and fed. Besides, it was feared least they abusing the respect the king bare them, would rise into boldnesse to attempt all things euen against his will, wherein both the father and the sonne, forgot not to publish with open mouth, that it repented them too much of the great regard and doubt they had vsed touching the action of Aretze, being assured that the king, according to the French nature, and by the many fauours and meanes they had in his Court, would yeeld tolleration to the things they should doe, notwithstanding they were to his disliking. And to those that were occupied with these feares, this was one increase of calamitie, that they were not assured vnder the warrantie of the kings protection, for that of very late and fresh memorie, notwithstanding his word and promise of a Prince, he had suffered the Lord Plomby to be dispoyled, and much lesse tooke to reuenge the outrage that was done to the Duke of Vrbino, whom he had taken into his defence, with fiftie men at armes which he deliuered to his armie for his seruice in the warres against Naples. But the exāple of Iohn Bentinolle, being much more present, was so much more agreeable to their terrours and feares: for, notwithstanding his maiestie in the yeares before, had commaunded Valentino not to molest those of Bologna, alledging that the bonds and couenants which he had with the Pope, were not to be vnderstood but touching the preheminance and authoritie which the Church had there at that time that the confederation was made betweene them: yet in that very season, Bentinolle hauing recourse to his maiestie for succours, fearing the great preparations that were made against him, the king chaunged the interpretation of the wordes according to the diuersitie of his endes & intentions, and making gloses vpon the capitulations past, rather like a Lawyer then as a king, he answered, that the protection by the which he was bound to defend him, hindred not the Popes enterprise, but touching his person and goodes particular: for that notwithstanding the wordes were generall, yet they were expresse with this relation, not to preiudice the rightes of the Church, to the which it could not be denied that the Citie of Bologna did not appertaine: and for that also, in the confederation he had made with the Pope, which was the first which he contracted in Italie, he was bound that what couenants so euer hee should make with others, they should be without construction of preiudice to the rightes of the Church. He was so impudent in this deliberation, seduced onely by the Cardinall Amboise, contrary to all the residue of his counsell, that hee sent an expresse messenger to signifie at Bologna, that that Citie appertaining to the Church, he could not, nor would not desist from fauouring the enterprise of the Pope: and that in vertue of his protection, it should be suffered to the Bentinolles to remaine at Bologna as persons priuate, enioying their particular goods in libertie and peace.

 “ their wordes, and keeping their intentions dissembled: an order much derogating the reputation “ and maiesty of a Prince, whose honour and conscience are so much the more guiltie and burdened, “ by how much their protections are but baits to bring priuate men into perill, and vnder a disguise “ sed assurance of their faith, to betray the innocency of their friends & subiects, euen to the extreme “ danger of their life. But this full prosperity of Valentino, was not only suspected to those men, but

but euen the Venetians began to enter into ieaiousie ouer his ambition,ioyning to their indignity this occasion,that not many moneths afore, he had rauished the wife of Iohn Baptista Caraciolla the Generall of their footmen,as she passed through Romania to seeke her husband. Therefore, to induce occasiō to the King to proceede more moderately in his fauour, shewing that the respect that led them, was the amity they bare him, and the ieaiousie of his honour, they put him in remembrance by their Embassadors with words worthy of the grauity of such a common weale: That he ought to consider how deeply he was charged to fauour so greatly Valentinois, & how ill it became the Noblenesse of the house of Fraunce and the glorious title of Christian King, to support such a tirant, seeking the ruine of peoples and prouinces, & thirsting so strongly after mans bloud, that he stood to all the world an example of most horrible cruelty and infidelity, vnder whose faith as by a publike theefe, had bene slaughtered so many Lords and Gentlemen. And not abstaining from the bloud of his brethren and nearest kindred, sometimes by the sword, and sometimes with poison, he had stretched forth his cruelty euen ouer such ages and qualities of persons, as would haue moued the most barbarous harts of the Turkes to conscience and compassion. To which words (the intercession of the Venetians making him perhaps more firme in his opinion) the king answered, that he neither wold, nor could restrain the Pope to dispose according to his will, of the places that appertained to the Church. In so much as where others abstained in his regard, to oppose against the armes of the Duke Valentinois, such as were nearest the daunger determined to prouide for themselues: therefore the Vrsins, Vitellozze, Iohn Pawle Bailion, & Lyneros de Ferme, who albeit as souldiers of the Duke, had newly receiued money of him, yet they retired seuerally their cōpanies into places of suerty, with intention to knit together for a cōmon defence: to which deuce gaue a speedy furtherance, the losse of the Castle S. Leo, which reuerted into the power of the Duke of Vrbyn, by the meane of a peasant hauing the gard of a certaine wall. After which beginning, their naturall Duke being called home by all the voyces and peoples of that estate, he recouered with a swift fortune all the Duchy except the fortresses. And to confederate more strongly against Valentinois, the Cardinall Ursin, Pawle Vrsin, Vitellozze, Iohn Pawle Bailion, Lyneros de Ferme, Hermer the sonne of Iohn Bentiuolle, and in the name of the Signor, Anthony de Venafre, in whom Pand. Petrucci reposed much, drew together, and made an assembly in the countrey Perousa, where, after they had discoursed of their generall daungers, and considered what oportunitie they had by the rebellion of the state of Vrbyn; and lastly, the weakness of Valentinois (whom they had now abandoned) by his want of men, they made a confederation for their common defence against Valentinois, and for the succours of the Duke of Vrbyn, binding themselues one to another, to put into the field seuen hundred men at armes, & nine thousand footmen, with couenant that Bentiuolle should make warre in the territories of Tmola, and the others with a greater strength shold draw towards Ryminy and towards Pesero. In this league the confederates, hauing great care, not to incense the mind of the French King, & yet hoping that it would not much displease him, that Valentinois were vexed by the armes of others, they declared vnder an expresse article, that they both meant, & would be bound to rise readily in their proper persons and with their ioynt forces, to obey any commaundement or request of his against all men. And for that occasion, they did not admit into that vnion, the family of the Colonnys, notwithstanding they were great enemies of the Pope, who had alwayes tormented them. Besides all these, they sought to haue the fauour of the Venetians and Florentyns, offering to Florence to procure restitution of Pisa, which they sayd was in the ability and deuotion of Pand. Petrucci, for the authority he had with the inhabitants. But the Venetians remained in suspence, as awaiting what would be first the inclination of the French King: which also the Florentyns did, both for the same occasion, and also holding both the one and other party as enemy, they feared the victory of either of them. This accident vnlooked for, hapned to the Duke of Valentinois, in a time wherein he being vpon the point to vsurpe the estates of others, he thought nothing lesse then that others would make inuasions vpon him. But yeelding nothing to the greatnesse of his perill, he lost neither courage nor counsell, and reposing much for himselfe in his good fortune, he looked with great industry and wisdom into the remedies that were conuenient, as the good Phisition

Pope and him, then of his enemies, & how fraille was the confidence of Vitellozza & Pádolfe, who, besides they were the chiefest counsellours & inducers of the residue, had in times past, giuen many demonstrations of an ill minde to his maiestie, as in ministring aide to the Duke of Mullan, and entertaining intelligēces with the king of Romans. And as he negociated in this sort with the king, so he forgot not also to make leauies of new companies, & to ioyne with his father in the practise of their old sutleties and ambushments: for the Pope for his part, sometimes excusing things that were too apparant, and sometimes denying such as might be doubted, laboured with great study, to appease the minde of Cardinall Vrsin by the trauell of his brother Iulius: and the Duke Valentinois with disguised apparances and faire promises, sought to entertaine and ioyntly and seuerally assure them, as well to hold them negligent in making their prouisions, as in hope that those counsels and practises separate, would in the end breed betweene them some suspition and disagreement, keeping alwayes this resolution, that much lesse that he would depart from Ymola, afore he were furnished with a mightie armie, seeing (of the contrary) hee was resolved to keepe it and the other places of Romagnia, without giuing succours to the Duchie of Vrbain in which determination he gaue direction to Dom Hugues de Cardona, and Dom Michel, (who were for him in those quarters with a hundred men at armes, two hundred light horsemen, and five hundred footemen) to retire to Rimini, a commaundement which they refused to obey, folowing another occasion presented to them to recouer and sacke Pergola and Fossambrona, whereunto they were induced by the Castle keepers of those places: but, as in matters of warre it is a daungerous errour to transgresse direction, and hunting after fortune, to preferre a light occasion, afore a counsell well debated: so it was easily discerned by effect, how much better it had bene to them to haue folowed the deliberation of the Duke, for that as they marched towardes Cagli, they encountred neare Fossambrona, Paule and the Duke of Granina (both of the familie of the Vrsins) and reposing much in the valour of their companies, which were six hundred footemen of Vitellozza well trayned & resolute, they gaue the charge, and finding fortune to fauour their vertue, they brake and disordered the troupes of the Duke Valentinois, of whom many remained slaine, as Barth. Caprauigno Capitaine of three score and ten men at armes, and many were led away prisoners, as Dom Hugues de Cardona, both men of chiefe place about Valentinois: Dom Michell fled to Fano, but by the commaundement of Valentinois he retired eftsouones to Pesero, leauing Fano as a place most faithfull in the power of the people, for that his strength was not sufficient to minister defence to both the places. In the selfe same seasons, the regiments of the Bolonnois which were incamped in the borough of S. Peter, made incursions to Doccio neare to Ymola; and truely the affaires of Valentinois had bene brought into hard straites and perils, if the vertue and expedition of the confederates had bene equal to the oportunities that were offered: but whilest they stood in expectation one of another, either for that the regiments of men agreed vpon at the dyot, were not yet ready, or else that the practises of accord held them in suspence: the occasion, which at the beginning shone with a fauourable light towardes them, was vanished and turned into a cloud: for that the French king had giuen direction to Monsieur Chaumont, to send foure hundred Launces to the Duke Valentinois, and to aduance besides, all his other meanes to redresse and reduce his affaires to reputation which being knowne to the confederates, and they not a litle confused and amazed with it, euery one began to looke to his proper businesse. In which respect the Cardinall Vrsin continued the practises he had begun with the Pope, and Anthony de Venafra, (sent by Pandolfe Petrucci) went to Ymola to solicit with Valentinois: with whom likewise treated Iohn Bentiuolle, hauing at the same time sent an Embassadour to the Pope, and made to be restored the things that were robbed at Doccio. These practises were nourished with a wonderfull art by the Duke Valentinois, who, judging that Paule Vrsin would be a good meane to dispose the residue, he made as though he reposed great confidence in him, in which affection, he sent for him to come to Ymola, and for his suretie, the Cardinall Borgia went to the lands of the Vrsins: The Duke Valentinois vsed very gracious wordes of Court Paule, wherein, to giue a better shadow to the treason he intended, he complained not so much of him & the residue, (who hauing serued him long with so great fidelitie, were of late estranged from him for some vaine suspitions) as of his owne indiscretion, being himselfe the very occasion of their iust iealousies, and the onely instrument of that distrust that hath bene nourished betweene them: but he hoped that this contention and alienation of affection, growing by no other occasion, would turne it selfe into another habite, and in place of grudge and ill will, would would breede betweene them and him, a perpetuall and dissoluble friendship, since amongst vertuous men reconcilment hath this property, to knit with greater surety of faith and constancy, the harts that haue liued in separation. For himselfe, as he referred them to consider how farre it was from their power to oppress him, seeing the French king was so well determined to support his greatnesse: so, on the other side being made wiser by the experience of harmes past, he confessed frankly that all his felicities and reputation proceeded of their counsels and vertue: and therefore desiring much to returne to that auncient communion of faith which had beene so familiar betweene them, he was ready for his part, not only to assure them in what sort they would, but also to make them iudges (so that there were regard had to his dignity) of the quarels that were betweene him & the Bolonnois. To these words appertaining generally to them all, he added particular demonstrations of the great confidence he had in Pawle, whom he filled so full of hopes and peculiar promises, that his art and subtlety carying shewes of innocency and true meaning, he betrayed the simplicitie of Pawle, who beleued that words so vehemently pronounced, could not draw with them intentions dissembled. A thing easie to the Duke by the property of his nature, and no lesse familiar, by the quicknesse and custome of his wit, but most ready by the forwardnesse of his passion, which nourished nothing with more sweete delight, then the deuice that might betray the liues of them to whom he offered his faith. But whilest these things were in solicitation, the people of Cameryn called home againe Iohn Maria de Varana sonne of the late Lord of Cameryn who was in Quilea: And Vistellozze, with the great complaint of Valentinois and Pawle Vrsin, tooke the Rocke of Fossambrona: in so much as the Castell of Vrbis being likewise lost with the fortresses of Cadly and Agobia, there remained no more to him in that state, but Saint Agatha, hauing also lost all the countrey of Fano: and yet notwithstanding, Pawle continuing the practise begun, after he had gone many times from Imola to Bologna, to establish some forme to the affaires of the Bentiuoles who were his parents (for his slaughter was married to Hermes the sonne of Iohn) he contracted with Valentinois in this sort: but with this relation: That the contract should be approued by the Cardinall Vrsin, by whose aduise all the residue were governed: That all old hates and grudges should be defaced, together with the memory of all iniuries past: That the auncient payes should be confirmed to the confederates, with further obligation to go as soldiers to Duke Valentinois to the recouering of the Duchie of Vrbis, and other estates which were rebelled: but for their surety they should not be bound to serue in person, otherwise then one at a time, nor the Cardinall Vrsin to remaine in the Court of Rome: That touching the matters of Bologna, there should be made a compromise in the persons of the Duke, Cardinall Vrsin, and Pandolfo Petrucci. With this conclusion, Pawle Vrsin (assuring himselfe euery day more and more of the good intencion of Valentinois) went to find the residue, to induce them to ratifie the articles. But Bentiuole, holding it neither honourable, assured, nor reasonable, that the arbitration of his affaires should be passed quer to another, sent the Pronotary his sonne to Imola, and receiuing hostages from Valentinois, he made an accord with him and the Pope, whereunto they condescended so much the more easily, by how much they considered that the French king, comming better to consider either what an infamie it would be to him, or how much it would import him that the City of Bologna were in their deuotion, wold alter his first deliberation, & not suffer them to obtaine it. These were the conditions of the accord: That there should be a perpetuall confederation betweene the Duke Valentinois on the one part, & the Bentiuoles with the comunalty of Bologna on the other part: That the Duke should haue of the Bolonnois, appointment of an hundred men at armes for eight yeares, which should be conuerted into the pay of twelue thousand ducats by yeare: That the Bolonnois should be bound to serue him with a hundred men at armes, and a hundred Crosbowshot on horsebacke, only for the yeare to come: That the French king and the Florentyns should promise obseruation for both the one & other parties: That for the better assurance of the peace, the Bishops sister of Luna (who was Nephew to the Pope) should be married to the sonne of Amball Bentiuole.

But for all these, Valentinois ceased not to sollicite the comming of the French bands, and the three thousand Swissers which he had taken into his pay, vnder shadow that he would employ them, not for the confederates, but for the recouery of the Duchy of Vrbis and Cameryn, for that the confederates were already at a point to ratifie the accord past. The Cardinall Vrsin being then in Sienna, was bucguled by the perswasions of Pawle, much helping the reasons and authority of

P. Petrucci and after long contradiction consented also Vitellozza, and John P. Baillon, who (notwithstanding) held the faith of Valentinois much suspected. After the ratification of these men, the Pope hauing likewise ratified: the Duke of Urbino, notwithstanding the importunities of his people (promising to dye at his feete) not to go from thence; yet hauing more feare of his enemies, then confidence in their popular voyces, he returned to Venice, and gaue place to the furie of the enemies, hauing first dismantled all the fortresses of the state, except Leox Mainola: the people (Anthony Sanzonin who was afterwarde Cardinall, going thither with commission and power from Valentinois to pardon them) agreed to returne vnder his obedience: the Citie of Camerino did the like, for that their Lord was fled to Naples, his feares being no lesse then his astonishments, for that Vitellozza and the others, hauing sent for their bandes which were in the countrey of Fano, prepared to go against him as souldiers to Valentinois. In which times as the Pope made the Campe march to Palombaro, which the Sanelles had recouered together with Senzana and other places appertaining to them, and that by the occasion of the armies leauied by the confederates: so, Duke Valentinois, who had no greater desires then to execute his most secret thoughtes, went from Imola to Cesena, where he was no sooner arriued, then the French men at armes who were come thither a litle before, & eftsoones reappealed by Monsieur Chaumont, departed from thence with the same speed they came: not by commission from the king, but (as was supposed) for a particular indignation hapned betweene him and Valentinois, or perhaps at his request, to the end he might be lesse fearefull to those, whom he desired greatly to assure. At Cesena, he looked to redresse his bandes, which were stronger then the report that went of them, for that expressly he had made xxy few great leauies of men, but well payd, and entertained continually many Launceknights and particular Gentlemen: a strength though not mighty in numbers, yet well assured by the vertue of the persons, who are so much the more worthy then men mercenarie, for that the one go armed with honour and reputation, and the other haue no regard but to their pay: the one forward for his credit sake, the other subiect alwayes to compulsion: the one following seruice with a voluble libertie of minde, where the other hauing a courage no lesse vile and abiect, then his intentions are corrupt, followeth warres for rauine and spoyle, the basest respect that can be in the mind of a souldier. At the same time Vitellozza and the Vrsins, being sent by his direction to encamp afore Sini Galle, tooke the towne and Castle, from whence the widow of the Prefect being sister to the Duke of Urbino, fled when she was left abandoned and desolate, notwithstanding her little sonne was vnder the protection of the French king, who excused himselfe, for that she was a competitor to the league made at Maisons. After the taking of Sini Galle, Valentinois went to Fano, where after hee had stayed certaine dayes, to reassemble all his companies together, he aduertised Vitellozza and the Vrsins, that the day following, he would come to lodge at Sini Galle, and that in that regard they should bestow the souldiers that were with them within the towne, abroad in the plaines: which was executed according to his direction, the footemen being lodged in the suburbs of the towne, and the men at armes dispersed seuerally in the countrey. The same day that the Duke appointed to be at Sini Galle, there went to meete him, Paulo Vrsin, the Duke of Gratiana, Vitellozza, and Lyuerot de Ferme, who being receiued by him with great honour and many graces of Court, accompanied him to the gate of the towne, afore the which all the bandes of Valentinois were bestowed in order: a maner of dealing, which albeit they could not but suspect, specially to behold a strength greater then they looked for: yet, offering to take their leaue to withdraw to their lodgings which were without the towne, they were desired to enter with him into the towne, seeming to haue neede to communicate with them in some priuate matter. They were driuen to yeeld to that willingly, which they were not able to refuse by any resistance: and as in matters of perill, the minde hath a certaine sence & coniecture of the ill that is to happen; so the tokens that appeared made them deuine rightly of the mischiefe that was prepared; and yet as men without remedie in their fortunes, they followed him by whom they saw their ruine intended. When he was come to his lodging, he withdrew the with him alone into a chamber a part, where, after he had left them vnder colour, to go shift his apparell, he sent men armed into the chamber to apprehend them all prisoners, & at the same instant appointed other companies to strip their souldiers. The day following being the last of December, to the ende that that yeare might determine with this tragedie, hee retained the other prisoners, and made to be strangled in a chamber, Vitellozza and Lyuerot de Ferme, whereof the one had no power to escape the destinie of his house, to dye dye by violent death, as did all his other bretheren after they had won great experience and reputation in armes, the mischiefe hapning to oue after another according to the succession and measure of their ages. But touching Lyneros no man could denie, that he had not an end worthy of his wickednesse, being but iust and reasonable, that he should die by treason, who a litle before had killed by treason (to make himselfe great in the Citie of Ferrara) his owne Vncle, together with many of the principall Citizens, whom he had inuited to come banquet with him.

That yeare brought forth no other thing worthy of memorie; sauing that Lodowyk and Federyk Counts of Mirandola; who were of the familie of the Piques, being chased afore by Iohn Francisque their brother, and pretending (notwithstanding his prerogatiue of yeares and age) that they had the same rights that he had, expelled him by force by the helps of the Duke of Ferrara, and Iohn Iacques Trisnulle father in law to Lodowyk: a matter not so much worthy of memory for it selfe in perticular, as for that in times after, the quarrels of his brethren ingendred effects of some consequence.

The yeare following was farre more full of things notable and accidents daungerous, then any of the former yeares: to the which the disloyalty and impiety of the supposed Prince of Christian religion, gaue an unhappie beginning, not knowing what was to happen that yeare aswell to his person as to his affaires. For the Duke Valentinois having aduertised his father (according to a private resolution betweene them) how well his ambushes had succeeded with him at Simi Galle: the Pope for his part, holding secret aswell the conspiracy, as the aduertisement, called to the Pallace of Vatican vnder colour of speciall occasions, the Cardinall Vrsin, who, trusting in the surety of the accord, and no lesse in the faith of him, who all the world knew neuer to keepe faith with any man, but much more driuen by his destinie, then by reason, was a litle afore gone to Rome: he was no sooner entred the Pallace, then he was made prisoner, feeling in his owne person, the very calamity which his brother and friends suffred. At the same time were also taken in their houses, Re. Vrsin Archbishop of Florence, the Pronotory Vrsin, the Abbot Aluiano, and Iacques de S. Croix a Romaine Gentleman, one of the principallest of that faction: and after they were led to the Castell S. Ange, the Pope sent his sonne the Prince of Squillace to take possession of the lands of Paulle and the others, and with him went the Pronotory, and Iacques de S. Croix to make deliury of them, who afterwards were returned vnder the same guard that kept them before. The Pope vaunting with a Spanish suttlety at the traine which his sonne had made, scoffed and sayd; that Paulle Vrsin & the others being the first that had falsified their faith to him (for that they were bound to go to him but one at once, and came notwithstanding altogether) it was no lesse lawfull to him to breake his promise with them: a manner of dealing very slaundersous to the reuerence of his profession, but not vnaccustomed to those that haue sit in his place; with whom nothing hath bene more familiar then conspiracies, nor any thing lesse esteemed then to protect innocency, hauing their hats as full of crueltie, as their mouthes were full of blasphemy: It had bene a crime sufficient against his habit & conscience, to prostitute his faith against the ruine of men, and not with a mind preiudiciall, to vaunt of the offence, seeing by the scripture, the sinne is so much the more accursed, by how much it is aggrauated with glory and vaunting. The Cardinall remained prisoner about twenty dayes, the Pope alledging that he had imprisoned a Cardinall so ancient in place, in age, and in authoriey, for many reasons: but he did not expresse them, condemning himselfe by his proper silence, or at least fearing his infamy would be the greater, if his reasons were disclosed: but at length the bruite bearing that the Cardinall was sicke, he died in the Pallace, of poyson as is assuredly beleueed: And the Pope, to take away the opinion (but not the imputation of the act) albeit it was his custome not to care for infamies, caused the dead body to be caried to his graue in the broad day and all bare, accompanied with the kindred of his house, and all the other Cardinals. The other prisoners were deliuered a litle after, vpon surety to be eftsoons represented when they were called.

The Duke Valentinois, seeking to ioyne recompence to his wickednesse, departed immediately from Simi Galle, and addressed himselfe to the towne of Castello, where finding that such as yet remained of the family of Vitelly, had abandoned the City, he continued his way to Perouza, from whence Iohn Pawle fled, who was competitor in the miserable destinies of the others, his punishment being greater, though the time and manner were slower, being by suspicion made wiser then the residue touching his going to Simi Galle. The Duke left both the one and other Cities vnder the name of the Church, hauing reestablished within Peroufa, Charles Baillon, the Oddies, and all the other enemies of Iohn Paule. And as it is one chiefe vertue in men of enterprife to imbrace occasions, so, he forgot not to applie to his fortune, the oportunitie and fauour of the time, by the benefite whereof, his ambition made him assay to make himselfe Lord ouer Sienna, being followed with certaine exiles of the same Citie: and drawing with the whole armie (wherein were newlie arrived the aydes promised by Beniuolle) towards the Borough of Piena, where knowing that the Cardinall Vrsin was prisoner, he made strangle the Duke of Gratina and Paule Vrsin, and sent Embassadors to Sienna to warne them of the towne to chase out Pandolfe Petrucci, as his enemy in particular; and the common troubler of the tranquillitie of Tuscan: he ioyned to the message this condition and promise, that as soone as they had expulsed him, hee would esloones retorne to Rome with his armie, forbearing to do anie other oppression to their frontiers. And on the other side, the Pope & he, burning in one bloudie desire, that as Pandolfe had bene a companion to the others in life and actions, so also hee might communicate with their last extreame fortune and death: they studied to lull him asleepe with the same charme, wherewith they had enchanted the others to their destruction, writing to him, billets and letters full of office and humanitie, and solliciting him by messengers expresse, promising no lesse assurance of faith, good meaning and affection. But the suspicion that occupied the people of Sienna, that the Dukes intention was to vsurpe that citie, made his enterprife against Pandolfe more hard, for that albeit many of the Citizens were oftentimes ill contented with the gouernment of Pandolfe, yet, they held it better to temporize vnder the tyranny of one Citizen, then to fall into the seruitude of a straunger. In so much that as at the beginning, he could obtaine no answer by the which might be hoped the expulsion of Pandolfe: so for all that, continuing vnder the same semblance, that he desired no other thing, he wonne dayly on them, hauing passed Pienza, Chiusa, with other places neare to Sienna, which yielded to him by composition. By which advantages, wonne vpon them, as it were by stealth and suttletie, the feares increased so in Sienna, that not only the people, but also some euen of the chiefeest, began to murmur, that it was not reasonable, that to support one Citizen, the whole Citie should suffer so great a danger: which made Pandolfe determine to do that which the good liking & fauour of euerie one, which he feared to be constrained to do in the end with the vniuersall hatred of the Citie, and his owne danger; and therefore by his consent it was signified to Valentyn, in the publike name of the Citie, that they were content to gratifie his demands, so that he would retire, with his armie from their frontiers. This resolution was accepted (notwithstanding the Pope and he were fixed vpon an enterprife of greater importance) for that they knew how hard a matter it would be to take Sienna, both for the greatnesse & strong seat of the town, and also for the vertue of Iohn Paule Baillon commaunding within it, who with the souldiers & naturall people of the place, would ioyn in one strength to resist him, if they were once assured that his intentions were contrarie to the publication of his promises. To this were added the feares of the Pope, who held it necessarie, that for his proper suerty, his sonne should retire his armie to Rome, where he was iealous of some conspiracie, for that Iulio and others of the Vrsins with manie horsemen were withdrawne into Peskhano and Fabio, and Organtyn Vrsin into Cernetra: Mutso Collonno also newlie come from the realme of Naples, was entred Palombara to succour the Sauelleis, who were newly entred into alliance with the Vrsins, and had intelligence with them. But that which tooke from the one and the other, the hope to occupie Sienna, was, that it was now manifestly perceiued, that the enterprife was directly displeasing to the French king: for albeit he could haue wished (and it was for his good pollicy) that Vuellozza and the other confederates should be kept vnder, yet hee sawe that their whole ruine ioyned to the conquest of so great estates, made the Pope and Valentinois too mighty. And withall the citie of Sienna, together with the life and whole estate of Pandolfe, being vnder his protection, & no member of the Church, but an appertenance of the Empire, he thought he might with good equitie and reason, oppose himselfe against the conquest: a consideration necessarie to the vertue of the French king, hauing by the mouth and word of a Prince, assured the protection of the Citie: but far more agreeable to the policie of his affaires, which could not without perill, suffer such an aspiring ambition in the Pope and his sonne: he began to see that the mind which he meant should climbe no higher then his shoulders, had intentions to aspire aboue the crowne of his

his head, & therefore he held it a lesse transgression of honour & promise to reſtraine his ſupportation from one whom his authoritie & countenance only had aduanced, then to leaue to perill ſuch as reposed altogether in his faith, honour, & reputation of his promiſes. The Pope and his ſon had hope that the removing of Pandolfe would cauſe ſome conſuſion in the gouernment of that City, & that by that meane, time would breed occaſion to giue ſome colour to their enterpriſe: but Pandolfe ſeeing more into their ſuttleties, then able to turne away his owne calamities, departed ſo out of Sienna, as he left the ſame guard & the ſame authoritie to his friends & dependants, in ſo much as it ſeemed that nothing was changed of the gouernment, & lesse expectation of their enterpriſe by his expulſion. Valentino (according to the direction of the Pope) tooke his way to Rome, to make deſtruction of the Vrſins, who, with the Sanelyes, had won the bridge Lamentano, & run ouer the whole country: but they ſtaied fro further action, by the arriual of the Duke Valentino, who expreſſed his firſt power & malice vpon the eſtates of Iohn Iordan, without any regard that he was not declared againſt him: that he had the order of S. Michael: that he was in the protection of the French king, & at that time in the kingdome of Naples in his ſeruiſe. Which oppreſſion vniuſt & vnreaſonable, the Pope ſeeeking to abuſe the king with his iuſtifications, alleadged that he was not moued by any deſire to deſpoile him of his eſtates, but only for that he could not account him his aſſured neighbour ſo neare, the great quarels and offences continuing betweene him & the familie of the Vrſins, & that therefore in recompence & conſideration of his harmes, he was content to giue him the principallitie of Squillace, with other lands of the ſame value and reue[nue]. But the French king not taking theſe reaſons for painment, retained a ſpeciall memorie of that inuaſion, not for that the regard to his protection preuailed more with him then of cuſtome, but becauſe his affaires in the kingdome of Naples not drawing the ſame fortune and ſucceſſe they had wont to do, he began to hold for ſuſpected the pride and inſolency of the Pope and his ſonne, ioyning to this coniecture the remembrance of their oppreſſions in the yeare paſt, both how they had aſſailed Tuſkane, and afterwards aſſayed to inuade Sienna, notwithstanding he had promiſed to protect it. Wherein conſidering that by how much they had already obtained of him, and for time to come ſhould obtaine: by ſo much more was their ambition growne great, and hereafter their pride would be redoubled, he ſent to commaund Valentino with a ſharpe meſſage to forbear to moleſt the ſtate of Iohn Iordan, who was come to Bracciano by wayes vnknowne, and not without his perill. Beſides this, he conſidering how neceſſarie it were to be aſſured that there ſhould riſe no commotion in Tuſkane, ſpeciallie for that he vnderſtood that in Sienna there was ſome beginning of ciuill diſcords: he ioyned himſelfe to the counſell of the Florentins, to ſollicite that Pandolfe Petrucci (who was retired to Piſa) might returne eſtſoon to Sienna: that betweene the Florentins, Siennois, and Bolonnois, might be contracted an vnitie for their common defence, rendering Mont Palcian to the Florentins, to take away all occaſion of diſſention. And laſtly, that euerie one of them, according to his power, ſhould make prouiſion of men at armes for their common defence, the better to cut off from the Pope and his ſonne, all meanes to ſtretch further their iuriſdiction into Tuſkane.

In this meane while the Duke Valentino, with one part of his armie, tooke Viconaro where in were fixe hundred men for Iohn Iordan: but hauing receiued commandement fro the French king, he left, to the great diſpleaſing of the Pope and him) the enterpriſe of Bracciano, and went to incampe afore Cery, where, with Iohn Vrſin Lord of the place, were Raſe his ſonne, with Luſo and Frauncis of the ſame familie. And to ioine to the actions of the ſonne, the authoritie of the father, the Pope proceeded at the ſame time by way iudiciall againſt all the houſe of Vrſins, except Iohn Iordan, & the Count Perillano, againſt who the Venetians would not endure any ſuch vniuſt violence. Cery is a towne verie auncient, & no leſſe notable for the ſtrong ſituation, for that it is ſeated vpon a litle rocke hewed out of one ſtone only, whither the ancient Romaines in their perils againſt the French men, ſent all their virgins veſtals, and the moſt ſecret and celebrate images of their goddeſſes, with many other things ſacred and religious, as into a place of ſpeciall ſuretie: and for the ſame reaſon in the times following, it was free from violation in the rage of the Barbarians, at ſuch time as by the declination of the Romaine Empire, they hauockt all Italie with wonderfull furies. By meane whereof, as well by his naturall ſtrength, as for that it was manned with companies reſolute, the enterpriſe ſeemed hard to Valentino, who, to aduance his vertue aboue their ſtrength & power, forgot no diligēce nor induſtry to win it, vſing, beſides the ordinary engines of warre, certaine instruments of wood to surmount the height of the walles : but whilest he was busie in that action, Francis Nardy (sent to Sienna by the French king,) published his Maiesties intencion, that Pandolfe should eistsoones returne, hauing receiued his promise before to continue in his deuotion, & for his suretie, to send his eldest son into Fraunce, to pay to him that which was due of the residue of the fortie thousand Duckats which had bene accorded; and to restore Mont Pulcian to the Florentins: a resolution plausible to them of Sienna, who, because there should be no impediment to the comming of Pandolfe, ioyned to the reputation of the kings name, the open fauours of the Florentins, & the disposition of those in the towne that were his friends; who drawing into armes and strength the night before he should come, held suppressed, or at least kept in a compelled quietnesse all such as supported the contrarie opinion. This hapned to the great displeasure of the Pope, whose affaires in other places ranne in a happie course, for that Palombaro with other peeces of the Sauelleis, were rendred to him: as also those that were within Cery, suffering many and continuall afflictions of warre, after the furie of fundrie assaults, offered restitution, with couenant that the Pope should pay a certaine proportion of money to Iohn, who was Lord of the place, and to leaue in libertie, suretie, and safetie of life all the residue within Petillane, which was sincerely obserued, contrarie to the custome of the Pope, and expectation of euerie one.

“ Fortune hath a free will to come and go when she list, not regarding times, persons or causes, “ but making her prerogatiue absolute, she takes authority to make her will a law ouer the Prin“ ces of the earth: & as in no humaine thing, she is either certaine or resolute, so chieflie in the ad“ on of warre she sheweth most mutability and variation, not giuing successe to such as deserue “ best, but to those that she fauoureth most, her iustice not regarding the vertues & merits of men, “ but guiding things to their successe according to the inclination of her fauour and liking. For, the “ affaires of the Frenchmen, which followed the seruice of Naples, proceeded not in such full felici“ ty, being incobred with many difficulties euen from the beginning of the yeare: For, the Count de Millete being encamped at Villeneuve with the regiments of the Princes of Falerno & Bisignan, Don Hugues de Cardona, passing from Messina into Calabria with eight hundred footmen Spanish, an hundred horsmen, with eight hundred other footmen aswel Calabrians as Sicilians, marched towards Villeneuve to rescue it: which assoone as the Count Millete vnderstood, he leaued his siege from before Villeneuve, and went to meete him. The Spaniards drew all along a plaine strait and narrow betweene the mountaine and a riuer, where was not much water, but is ioyned to the way with a litle rising: and the French men who were the greater number, marched right to them beneath the riuer, desiring to draw them into a large place: but seeing how they marched close and in firme order, & fearing that if they cut not off their way, they would get in safetie into Villeneuve, they passed ouer to the other side of the riuer to charge them: in which encounter they were broken, the valor of the Spanish footmen no lesse then the aduantage of the place, helping indifferently to the victorie. Soone after arriued by sea out of Spaine at Messina, two hundred men at armes, two hundred horsmen mounted vpon Iennets, & two thousand footmen, all led by Manuel de Benauide, with who came into Italy at that time Anthony de Lena, who, of a meane souldier, rising by all degrees of war, to the estate of a Captaine General, made his vertue notable in Italy by the reputation of many goodly victories. These companies passed from Messina to Regge in Calabria, which the Spanish had taken before (M. d' Aubigny being then in the other part of Calabria) and from thence encaped at Lofarna, within fiue miles of Calimere: into which place Abricourt was entred two daies before with thirtie Launces, & the Count de Millete with a thousand footmen, & presenting themselues the morning following before the walles of the towne, wherein were no gates but barres onely, they forced it at the second assault, the ver-tue and resolution of the defendants being lesse then the fortune & felicity of the assaillants, Captaine Esprit remained dead, & Abricourt made prisoner: but the Count de Millete in flying to the rocke, found safetie of life and honour, (the victors retiring forthwith to Villeneuve for feare of M. d' Aubigny, who came on marching with three hundred Launces, three thousand footmen strangers, and two thousand of the countrey. After which accident, M. d' Aubigny encamping at Pollistrina within two miles of them, & their perill encreasing by necessity of victuals, they dis-caped secretly to go to Quiercy: & albeit they made the oportunitie of the night proper for their safetie, yet their fortune vāquishing all clokes of shadow & darknes, they were chased by bands of

• Monsieur d'Aubigny vntill the rising of a crabbéd mountaine, where they lost threescore men at armes and manie footmen: and of the French (opinion and rashnesse carying them beyond discretion and experience) was slaine Capitaine Gruyn, whom they esteemed much, leading the regiment that was to Comte Casazze who died by naturall death a litle afore the taking of Capua. At the same time came out of Spaine into Cicilie these new bands, two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horsmen, and two thousand footmen, gouerned by Capitaine Porto Carrera, who dying at Regge as he passed with his regiment, the charge remained to Ferrand d'Andria his Lieutenant: for the arriual of these supplies, the Spaniards (lately retyred to Quiercy) took new courage and comfort, and returned to Villenensue, where they fortified in that part of the towne which they held ioyning to the Castle, which was the entrie of a valley, wherunto is conioyned the residue of the towne: a fortification not in vaine, for the feare they had of M. d'Aubigny, who being come from Polestrina with a diligence far aboue their expectation, was engaged in that part which was not holden by the Spanish, euery one planting barres and fortifications requisite for their proper safetie. But as in M. d'Aubigny no vertue was more familiar the circumspection, which he vsed alwaies to resist suddaine perils, so as soone as he vnderstood that the Spanish regiments that were descended to Regge, drew neare to make one strength with the other bands, he altered purpose with the necessitie of the occasion, & retiring to Lozano, the enemies following the commoditie of victuals, put themselues altogether within Seminaro. Whilist things went in this course in Calabria, the Viceroy for the French returning towards Barletto, encamped at Materno, and dispersing his bands in seuerall places thereabouts, he lay to giue impediments that no victuall nor succours should enter, hoping that what by the plague, whose furie began to breed feare, & scaritie of victuals, which was vniuersall in Barletto, the Spanish could not by any reason or possibilitie remaine there long, and much lesse rescue theselues within Trany, where faced the same difficulties: neuerthelesse amid so manie incommodities and daungers their resolution and constancie was wonderfull, confirmed also by the vertue and diligence of Consaluo, who sometimes giuing them hopes of a readie arriual of two thousand Almaine footmen, which he had sent Ottavian Colonna to leaue, and sometimes promising present succours by other meanes, and lastly causing a bruite to bee published that he should go to Tarento by sea: he entertained them in their courage and vertue, but much more with his own expable, suffering in his person all their perplexities & trauels, ioyned to the want of victuals and miserable scaritie of all things necessary: Occasion dorth much to induce the minds of souldiers, but example is it that confirmeth their vertue, making them oftentimes resolute aboue their naturall inclination.

The warre suffering this alteration, & being false as you see into this estate of fortune & chage, those that till that day had bene inferiours, & as it were kept suppressed, began now by the negligent & insolent dealing of the French, to make their light shine & become superiours. For the men of Castellanetto (a place neare to Barletto) despairing, for the oppressions & wrongs which fiftie men at armes of the French, & garrisoned there, did them, drew into armes by common assent, and stripped them. And not many dayes after, Consaluo being aduertised by espyall that M. de la Palisse remaining with a hundred Launces & three hundred footmen in the towne of Rubos, twelue miles from Barletto, stood negligently vpon his guard, marched one night to Rubos, & drawing with him a wonderfull diligence & facilitie of the way, being plaine & hard, certaine peeces of great artillerie: he assaulted the towne with such a furie, that the French (to whom all other daungers had bene more tollerable) being so much more confused in their perill, by how much the assault was suddaine, made a certaine weak resistance, & in the end redred the place, Palisse with the residue remaining prisoners. The same day Consaluo returned to Barletto, without danger to receiue in retyring any damage of M. de Nemours, who a litle before was come to Canosa: his safety haply was by this occasion, that the French companies being disposed into seuerall places to keep Barletto besieged on many sides, could not be reassembled in sufficient time; besides that fifty French Launces, sent to make praie of certaine money caried from Trany to Barletto, were overthrowne by such as Consaluo had sent for the surety of the treasure. To these also might bee adioyned another accident which diminished greatly the valour of the French men, & which was the proper work & effect of valor, & not to be attributed to the iniquity of fortune: for a Trumpet going to Barletto to solicit the rancome of certaine souldiers taken at Rubos, certaine speeches were against xiiij.

Italians.

uttered against the French, by some of the Italian men at Armes, which being carried by the Trumpet to the French Campe, and answered eftsloones returned to the Italians, bred such enuie and inflammation of courage in both parts, that to iustifie the honour of their severall nations they agreed, that thirteene men at armes of the French, and thirteene Italians should fight in combat to the vterance within listes vntill the one were masters ouer the other: the place of the combat to bee assigned in a Champaine betweene Barletto, Andria, and Quadrato, where they should be accompanied with an equall number of assistants, to be Iudges of their valour. Neuerthelesse (to assure al ambuscados or suttile traines of cōspiracy) the Captains with the greatest part of both the armies, accompanied their Champions to the mid way, comforting the, that for that they were chosen out of the whole armie, they would with manifest action and courage make good the expectation that was on them, the same being such, that in their hands and valour was reposed by common consent, the honour of so noble nations. The Viceroy of the French declared to his, that their aduersaries were the selfe same Italians, who hauing no courage to abide the Frenchmen, had alwayes made them way, without expressing any tryall or experience of their vertue, euen since they had run frō the Alpes to the extreame bounds and limits of Italie: That they were not now pushed forward either with a new nature or new resolution of mind: but being mercenarie to the Spaniards and subiect to their commaundements, they had no libertie to resist the will of those men, whose custome being to fight not with vertue but with ambushes, made themselves beholders and idle lookers on the dangers of others: and that therefore as soone as the Italians were entred into the listes, and should see before them the armes and furie of such as had alwayes overcome them, they would either returne to their accustomed feares, or at least, if any seruile respect to the Spanish would push them to the fight, that compulsion, no lesse then their naturall feares, would make them an easie preie, the foundation layd vpon the vaine brags and braueries of the Spanish, being a Target too slender to beare the blowes of the puissant Frenchmen. On the other side, Consaluo prepared the mindes of his Champions with perswasions agreeable to the nature of the action they had in hand: he reduced to their remembrance the ancient honours of that nation, and the reputation and glorie of their armes, with the which they had earst tamed the whole world: That it was now in the power of a fewe, to declare that they were not inferiour to the vertue of their elders: And though Italy whose valour had vanquished the most regions of the world, had bene of late yeares ouer-runne by forraine armies, that it was by no other occasion, then the indiscretion of Princes, whose ambition accompanied with ciuill discords, had called in strange armies to roote out and ruinate one another: That the French had neuer obtained victorie in Italie by their owne strength or vertue, but by the aide & ministracion of the armes of the Italians, who had suffered the to passe so far into the bowels of their country, not by the terrour or agilitie of their armes, but by the furie of their artilleries, which were fearefull so long as they were new and vnaccustomed: That they were now to fight with the force and vertue of their proper persons, and that not onely in the presence of so great a Nobility of their owne side, but also in the spectacle and eye of the principall nations of Christendome; who, as well of the one part as of the other, had an honourable desire of their victorie: That they had to remember that they were raised by the most famous Captaines of Italie, and as by them they had had continuall nourishment and trayning in armes, so for their severall parts, they had in many perillous actions giuen an honourable experience of their vertue: And that therefore either the honour to readdresse the name of Italy with that glorie wherein it had bene not onely in the yeares of their elders, but also in the ages and times of themselves, was by destinie appointed to them: or else (so great an honour not being wonne by their hands) there can be no other expectation of the flourishing region of Italy, then to remaine dishonoured and in perpetuall seruitude and slaunder, by the pusillanimie of her proper children. With these perswasions ioyned to the comforts of other Captaines and souldiers particular of both the armies, the parties appointed for the combat, were led into the field: where both partes desirous by their proper vertue to bring glorie to their nation; as soone as the Assistants were placed according to the order of the field, and that the signe was giuen, they ranne furiously with their Launces: at which encounter, no aduantage inclining to either part, they shewed the same emulation of minde in the action of their other weapons: wherein as euerie one of the Champions shewed by his resolution and

agilitie with what desire of glorie he sought to conquer his aduersarie: so it was secretlie confessed by all those that were lookers on, that out of all the armies on both factions, could not bee chosen bodies more worthy to performe a prooffe so honourable and glorious. But as in this heat of fighting, they had spent a good space of time, wherein the ground was couered with tronchions and peeces of their armour, and somewhat dyed with the bloud that dropped from all parts, without that the aduantage or better of the fight could be iudged. And as they were beholden with a wonderfull silence by such as were present, and almost in no lesse trauell and passion of mind, then if they had bene the immediate parties to the perill, it hapned that one of the Italians was striken from his horse by a Frenchman, who as hee furiously pursued his fortune to dispatch him, another Italian carefull of the danger of his companion, killed with a wonderfull blow the Frenchman. The *Italian*s had boarespeares, with the which they made slaughter of many of the French horses, by meane whereof the Châpions of France, beginning to decline, could no longer cloke their weaknes, but their vertue yeelding to the fortune of their aduersaries, they became prisoners to the Italians: who returning with victorie to Consaluo and their other companies, were receiued with those honors that appertained to their merits: and being congratulated as men whose valours had restored Italy to her former glorie and honour, they entered Barlesso in triumph, their prisoners led afore them, the aire sounding with Drummes and Trumpets, the artillerie shooting off, the people crying with praises of their vertue, and all other shewes and actions vsed, that might set forth the reputation of their victorie. It is incredible how much the fortune of this combat diminished the courage of the French armie, and lifted vp the Spaniards into fame and presuming, euerie one construing this experience of a few, to a prophetic of the absolute issue of the whole warre.

About this time the French king was molested in Lombardie by the Swissers, the matter being begun not by the whole nation, but by those three Cantons which had occupied Belinzona: who seeking to induce him to consent that that place might remaine to them in proper, assailed Luzarno and Azurara, which being a wall of great length vpon the lake Maio neare to Luzarno, giues impediment to descend from the mountaines to the plaine, by no other way then through a gate which onlie is in that wall: and albeit they could not carie it in the beginning for the defence which the French Garrison made, (Monsieur de Chaumont, lying at Varese and Galeo with eight hundred Launces, hoping well also of the abilitie and defence of the place:) yet the number of the Swissers increasing afterwards, and succoured also by the Grisons, after they had giuen many assaults in vaine, diuers regiments of them climbing a great mountaine which commaunded the wall, they compelled such as kept the gate to abandon it: and taking afterwards the borough of Luzarno, but not the Castle, their strength increased dayly, for that the other nine Cantons, notwithstanding in the beginning they offered men to the king for the alliance they had with him, began afterwards to giue succours to the three other Cantons, alleading that for the respect of fidelitie and societie, they ought not to faile to minister to the necessitie of their companions, being thereunto bound by their ancient leagues, which were to be preferred afore all the obligations they had with others. Whilest they had an armie of fifteene thousand about the Castle, the French not able to rescue it for the straightnesse of the passages, and good gard that was made, they made pillage of the countrey thereabout: and making all things lawfull to their furie, because the Castle-keeper of Musocquo (a place appertaining to Iohn Iacques Trunulce) refused to lend them artillerie to batter the castle of Luzarno, they sacked the towne of Musocquo, forbearing to vex the Castle for that it was inexpugnable.

On the other side the Frenchmen, whom this emotion did not a litle import, assembling all their strength which they had in Lombardy, and hauing obtained succours of Bologna, of Ferrara, and of Mantua, require the Venetians to furnish that proportion of men, which they were bound vnto for the defence of the state of Myllan. The companies were promised according to the kings desire, but there was vsed so litle expedition in the leauying of them, and so great intermission to send them, as they serued to litle purpose. Monsieur de Chaumont, who had bestowed good strength and garison in the Castles that were in the mountaines, kept his regiments in the plaine, hoping that the Swissers, hauing neither horse nor artilleries, durst not descend into places discovered, but in the ende would be made vvearie for the difficultie of the victuals, and for that they were without money, and lesse hope to do any thing that was of importance. In which estate the Swissers hauing remayned many daies, and the want of victuals increasng (for the French with their Nauie had sunke manie Barks, which brought victualles to the Swissers Campe, and restrained the course of manie other by the lake) the soldiers began to nourish faction amongst themselves, for that the enterprise, appertained not but to the Canons which posselt Belinzon, and the Captaines being corrupted by the French monneys, they were content in the end to retire themselves, restoring (except Musocque as not appertaining to the king) all the places which they had taken in that expedition, obtaining promise of the king not to molest them of Belinzon vntill a certaine time. The French were so far estranged from any euill will to the Swissers, that they were not ashamed not onely in that time, when they had warre with the king of Spaine, and that they feared the king of Romains, and had the Venetians for suspected, but also in all other seasons, to buy the friendship of that nation, enduing them with yearly pensions both publike and priuate, and to make contracts with them vnder vnworthy conditions. In this action perhaps the French were moued, both by the small assurance they had in the footmen of their owne nation, and also for that as men of warre, they knew that that Prince makes warre to his great disadvantage, that vexeth a people that hath nothing to loose.

Philip Archduke of Austrich in France.

The king deliuered thus from the emotions and warres of the Swissers, had no lesse hope in the same season to see some issue of his warres in the kingdome of Naples: for that after manie means and practises of peace without any profit, Philip Archduke of Austrich and Prince of Flanders, detetmined to make his voyage from Spaine to Flanders by land, notwithstanding the contrarie desires of his father and mother in law, of whom he obtained free power and commission to contract a peace with the French king, which he had long solicited whilest hee was in Spaine: But they lent him accompanied with two Embassadours with whom hee was to communicate in all actions, and without whose counsell he would not treat or conclude anie thing. It is incredible with what magnificence and honor he was receiued by the kings assignmēt through all the realme of France, not onely that the king desired to make him fauourable in the practise of the peace, but also to deserue to make a perpetuall friend of that young Prince who was to become mighty and great, being the next successour to the Empire Romaine, and immediate inheritour to the kingdoms of Spaine with all the dependāces: All such as had grace or authoritie about him were honoured with the same liberties, and receiued presents of great price and riches. To these demonstrations was answerable the magnanimitie and royall behauiour of Philip: for that as the French king, besides his word and faith giuen for his sure passing through France, had sent into Flanders many of the Nobles of his realme for the safetie of Philip: so Philip, as soone as hee was entred France, to declare that he reposed wholly in the kings faith, gaue order that the Ostages should be redeliuered. These so great tokens and apparances of amitie, were not vnaccompanied (as much as was in them) with lesse effectes: for assembling at Bloys, after they had spent certaine dayes in discourse and disputation of things, they concluded

*Peace between

a peace in this sort: That the kingdome of Naples should be possessed according to the first diuision: But that there should be left in deputation to Philip, the Prouinces for the which they first fell to difference and armes: That from the present, Charles his sonne and Madam Claudia the Kings daughter (betweene whom should be a confirmation of that marriage, which had bene afore solicited) should be intituled Kings of Naples, and Dukes of Pomilia and Calabria: That that part which appertained to the king of Spaine should bee from thenceforward gouerned by the Archduke, and the partition discending to the French king, to be ordered by the proper deputies of his Maiestie: But that the one and the other part should bee holden vnder the name of the two children, to whom, at the time of consummation of marriage, the king should giue his part for the dowrie of his daughter. This peace was solemnlie published in the great Church of Bloys, and ratified by othes of the king, and of Philip, as procurer of the king and Queene of Spaine his parents in lawe: a peace truelie of right great consequence, if it had brought an effect equall to the intention: for, not onelie armes surceased betweene so mightie kings, but also peace would haue followed betweene the king of Romains and the French king: which would not onely haue bred newe enterprises against the Venetians, but also the Pope being suspected to them both, and in euill opinion with the vniuersall sortes of men, would not haue bene without his feares of counsellers and other actions actions which might haue brought diminution to his authority and greatnesse. But the King and the Archduke sending with expedition to publish the peace in the realme of Naples, with direction to the Captaines and commanders of men, to forbear to molest one another, attending the ratification of the Spanish king, and in the meane while their possession of things to continue, the ruler for the French offered to obey to his king: but the Spaniard (either for the hope he had of the victory, or for that he would not be contented with the only authority of Philip) answered, that he could not discontinue the warre vnlesse he had receiued expresse commaundement from his king: for the continuance whereof, he was so much the more encouraged, by how much the French king, gouerned by his hopes both in the practise and conclusion of peace, esteeming for certaine that which was yet vncertaine, had not only clallied in all other provisions of warre, but also had foreflowed the leauing of those regiments (that is three thousand footmen and three hundred Launces) which should haue bene embarked at Genes to be led to that enterprise vnder Monsieur de Perij. And of the contrary were arriued at Barletto the two thousand Alman footmen, which being leuiued with the fauour of the king of Romans; and embarked at Trieste, were passed in surety by the gulfes of Venice; not without the great complaint of the French king. In which respect, the Duke of Nemours, not able to assure a surceasing of armes, and lesse likely to refurbish his power, being made weake by the oppressions he had receiued before: yet, because he would occupy his whole strength, if either occasion or necessity compelled him to fight with his enemies, he sent for all the French bands that had bene dispersed into diuerse places, together with all the aides of the Barons of the realme, except those Lords and regiments which made warre vnder Monsieur d'Aubigny in Calabria. But in assembling them he found a fortune contrary to his expectation: for, the Duke of Arri, and Lewys d'Arri, one of those French Captaines which had their companies bestowed vpon the lands of Otranto, determining to march together to ioyne with the Viceroy, for that they were aduertised that Peter of Nauarre with many Spanish footmen, was in place apt to distresse them if they went separate and decided it hapned that Lewys d'Arri taking his oportunitie to passe surely, departed, without being careful of the danger of the Duke of Arri, who left alone, marched also with his companies, hauing espiall that Peter de Nauarre was gone to Matero to ioyne with Consaluo. But the counsels of men were not sufficient to resist fortune, for that the men of Ruylano (a towne in the countrey of Bari) who in the same dayes were reuolted against the Frenchmen, calling vpon the succours of Peter de Nauarre, who in their regard altered his way fro Matero towards Ruylano, and encountred the Duke of Arri, to whom the suddenesse of his peril brought him into many doubtfull cogitations what to do. But, as necessitie of daunger makes men resolute, so, in the end, seeing no surety in his retraite, he gaue his whole disposition to the battell: And as when men are driuen to fight, their constructions and iudgements do often varie, sometimes beguiling themselves with an overweening in their owne strength, and sometimes beleewing lesse of their enemy then his estate and power requires: so the Duke reposing much in the seruice of his horsemen (though his footmen were inferiour in numbers to the Spanish) whom he vainely supposed to be once wearied by the trauell they had made that night, vndertooke the battell, wherein euery one expressing his valour on both sides, his people at last were broken, his Vncle being slayne, and himselfe taken prisoner. And as it seldome hapneth that one fortune goeth without another, nor no aduersity vnaccompanied with another calamity, so foure French Gallies vnder the gouerning of Preian knight of the Rhodes, appeared in the haven of Otranto vnder licence of the Venetian Magistrate, promising to defend them from the inuasions of the Spanish Nauy, which vnder the Captaine Villemarino wasted in creeke thetherabouts. But after Preian was entred a little further in the haven, his forces little, and his fortune farre inferior to his enemies, he beganne to feare to be enuironed; and therefore to preuent that his damage and harmes should not turne to the profite of his enemies, after he had deliuered the Gallies and sunke his Gallies, he fought his safetie by land with his people, leauing his honour in suspicion by the greatnesse of his daunger.

The overthrow of the Duke of Arri.

The French King gaue commandement to his Captaines to stand onely vpon their gards, and not to seeke their enemies, assuring them that with speede they should either receiue the confirmation of the peace, or a competent proportion of succours: but the armies being so mighty and so neare one another, it was very hard to bridle the furie of the Frenchmen, or to bring them to this patience to draw the warre longer: It seemed rather that destiny began to sciance, and would no more defer the whole and absolute deciding of those affaires whose beginning hapned in Calabria: for after the Spaniards were ioyned in one strength at Semmaro, Monsieur d'Aubigny having assembled all his companies, and the power of the Barons that held the French faction, bestowed his footmen within the towne of Gioia three miles from Semmaro, and sent his horsemen to Losarno three miles from Gioia: and fortifying himselfe with foure peeces of artillery upon the shoare of the river; being the situation of Gioia, he stood ready prepared to oppose against his enemies if they made enterprise to passe the river. But the intentions of the Spanish were, other then he supposed, for the day they determined to passe, they caused their Vauanguard to march directly to the River; where Manuell de Benavide (who had the leading of them) being upon the shoare, began to parley with Monsieur d'Aubigny, who had led all his army to the bank contrary or opposite. At the same instant, the rearegard of the Spanish being followed with the battell, tooke another way to passe the River a mile and an halfe about Gioia: which being discerned of Monsieur d'Aubigny, he went in great hast without artillery to affront them afore they had all passed: but they were more happie in celeritie then Monsieur d'Aubigny, for that afore his coming they were all passed ouer, and raunged (albeit without artillery) in firme and set battell: and with that aduantage marched forth against the Frenchmen, who, by reason of their hast, either keeping no order at all, or at least by their smal numbers, not able to resist so great a strength, were there broken before the Vauanguard of the Spanish could passe the River. In which conflict Ambri-court was made prisoner with certaine other French Captaines, & the Duke of Sonne with many Barons of the kingdome. And albeit Monsieur d'Aubigny tooke the Rocke of Angelo for his safety, yet having no meane to issue out, his perill compelled him to yeeld himselfe prisoner, being ouerthrowne and taken euen in the selfe same places; where not many yeares before, he had with great glory triumphed ouer King Ferdinand and Consaluo, so inconstant are the properties of fortune, and the doings of men so subiect to alteration and chaunge. In this conflict perhaps nothing was more hurtfull to Monsieur d'Aubigny (of a franke and noble spirit, and one of the most resolute Captaines that the French king led into Italy) then that his owne too forward and violent inclination caried him too farre into the hope of the victory: a matter which likewise was hurtfull to the Viceroy in Pomilla, ioyning the report of the accident hapned in Calabria. For Consaluo not hearing of the victory of his people, and not able by the importunity of hunger and plague to remaine longer in Barletto, marched out of it, and leauing a very weak Garrison, he tooke his way to Ciriguole, a towne ten miles from thence, and almost in a triangle betweene Canosa (where the Viceroy was) & Barletto. The Viceroy (when dangers appeare, wise men fall into counsell) debated with his Captaines, whether were better to follow or flye the occasion of the battell: wherein many of his Captaines reasoned, that, in regard the Spaniards were increased in numbers, and his bands fall into great weakenesse and disorders, it was against policy to commit any thing to hazard, but to retire into Melfe or some other strong towne well provided of things necessary, and there to expect either a new succour out of France, or else the confirmation of the peace: a maner to temporise (which he was also bound to vse by commaundement) which he had newly receiued from the King. A contrary opinion was holden by other Captaines, to whom it seemed a thing daungerous to tarie till the army already victorious ouer Calabria, should ioyn with Consaluo, or at least should execute any enterprise of importance finding no man to resist him. They brought in the example of Monsieur Montpensier, chusing rather to retire into townes then to fight: That the memories of times past admonished them how farre they might hope for the long and vncertaine succours of France: That their Camp was nothing inferior either in force or vertue to the army of the enemy: & that the disorders that had hapned by negligence, ought not to be compared to the experience, which wold be shewed in plaine field with weapons and valours of men, and not with sleights or subtillties: That it was a more sure and honourable way, to make it the least with hope, an equall experience and triall of fortune, then eschuing the battell, and consuming themselves by degrees of temporising, to giue their enemy the victory without blood and without daunger: That touching the late message of the king, it was to be construed rather as an aduertisement, then in nature of a commaundement, in which degree, if Monsieur d'Aubigny had taken it, he had done well: But now the state of the war being changed by such a disorder, it was necessary likewise that their deliberations should alter. This last opinion prevailed, & therefore having advertisement by their espials, that the Spanish bands either all or part were issued out of Barletta; Monsieur de Nemours in like sort tooke his way towards Siriguole, a way very inconuenient both for the one and other army, for that the country was barreine of fresh waters, the summer and hote season being of greater rage of drought then was wont to be in the beginning of May: the disposition of the time brought many afflictions both to the one and other army, for that the very day of remouing, many souldiers died of drought by the wayes. And the discommodities of the wayes by the which they passed, gaue no lesse impediment to their marching, the French not knowing whether the whole or part of the Spanish army were in the field, for that both Fabricina Calonne with his light horsemen, tooke away the certaine knowledge, and also the Lances of the men at armes holden upright, and the stalkes of fenels growing high in that country, dimmed their sight that they could not well discerne. The Spaniards were the first that arrived at Siriguole which the Frenchmen kept; and incamping betwene two vines, they enlarged (by the aduise of Prosper Calonne) a ditch or trench which was at the entree of their Campe. Whilest they were dressing their lodgings or Campe, the diligence of the French in marching had brought them to the place, but by the condition of the time drawing neare night, they stood doubtfull whether they should so suddenly accept the battell or defer it till day following: Iues d'Alegre and the Prince of Melfe, perswaded that the fight might be put ouer till the next day, a respite conuenient for the refreshing of their owne men; and to no lesse purpose to distresse the Spaniards, who, they hoped, would be constrained by necessity of victuals, to remoue their Campe. To this reason was ioyned also a consideration of waite; how much it would be to their disaduantage, to set vpon them in their lodgings, specially being ignorant of the disposition of the place. But as euery calamity is led to his effect by his proper meane, and mortall men in many things, are made the instruments of their owne harmes: so Monsieur de Nemours caried more by his rash inclination, then by the safe counsell of others, the Spaniards were charged with great fury as well by the French as Swissers; and the fire hauing taken the powder of the Spaniards either by chance or by other meane, Consaluo vsing the occasion of that accident, cryed with a courage well resolved, the victory is ours, God declares it by manifest tokens, specially when we see we haue now no more necessity of the seruice of artillery. There be sundry opinions of the state of this battell: the French publish that in the first encounter they brake the Spanish footmen, & offering to the artillery, they had won it, & set the powder on fire, only by the darkenesse of the night, their men at armes, by negligence and misknowledge, had charged their own footmen, by which disorder, the Spaniards reassembled. But others reason, that for the difficulty to passe the ditch, the Frenchmen beginning to intricate and intangle themselves, fell to flying, no lesse by their proper disorder, then by the vertue of their enemies, being most of all amazed: for the death of Monsieur de Nemours, who entring with the first into the fury of the fight, and as he was in the action of a noble Captaine to encourage his men to win the trench, was stricken dead with a bullet. There be others, who discoursing more particularly, say that Monsieur de Nemours, despairing to be able to passe the ditch, and labouring to turne his strength towards the flanke of the Campe to aduerture to enter on that side, cryed that they should giue backe; which voyce, to those that knew not the occasion, gaue a signe to flye, which ioyned to the chance of his death in the first squadron hapning also at the same time, caused all the army to turne their backs and enter into a manifest flying. Some acquite the Viceroy for taking the battell against the counsell of others, and do lay the blame vpon Iues d'Alegre, who, contrary to the intention and desire of the Viceroy to fight that day, reprehending his fearefulnesse, induced him to do that whereunto he bare no disposition; the battell was very small continuance, and albeit the Spanish passing ouer the ditch followed the chase of their enemies, yet euen as in calamities fortune is not without her fauours, so by the oportunity of the night couering all things with darkenesse, there were few that fell into the perils that they feared most, I meane that were either taken or slaine, specially of the horsemen, of whom Monsieur Chandon was one. The residue with losse of their carriage, and artillery, saued themselves by flying: the Captaines as well as the souldiers being dispersed into many separate places, not as their vertue wold, but whither their feare and fortune led them. This victory hapned the eight day after the ouerthrow of Monsieur d'Aubray, being both on Friday, a day which the Spaniards haue obserued to be happy vnto them. The French, after the fear of the chase was passed, reassembled againe as well as the violence of the time & their fortune would suffer, and a men whose greater perils were yet to come, debated many deuises: Sometimes they thought best to ioyne with the residue of the army in some place conuenient, to take from the victors all meanes to go to Naples, and eifoones they iudged it most conuenient for their safety, to sticke to the defence of Naples; and yet, as it hapneth that to men in aduersity their feares grow daily greater, and to such as be vanquished is left nothing but consideration of difficulties: so neither one of these deuises was suffered to be put in execution: for that neither had they any election of places for their safe abiding; neither was their possibility to defend Naples for the scarcity of victuals: for the prouision and furnishing whereof, the French had sent asore to Rome to buy a great quantity of corne, which they could not transport, either for the impediments that they of Rome gaue, seeking to haue their towne stand in good prouision, or rather by the secret perswasion of the Pope, which was not the least credible.

The consideration of these difficulties made Alegre the Prince of Salerno, and many other Barons to retire betweene Caietto and Tracetto, where they reassembled vnder their names, the most part of the residue of the armie. But Consaluo to whose vertue this one thing was peculiar and proper, to know how to follow his fortune as well as he was skilfull to get the victory; after this good successe, tooke his way with the army towards the towne of Naples, and as he passed by Melfe, he made offer to the Prince to leaue him possessed of his whole estate, so that he would remaine at the deuotion of the Spaniards: but he rather chusing to go his way with his wife and children, went to ioyne with Lewys d'Ars lying at Venosa: by whose departure Consaluo taking Melfe, followed his way directly to Naples, at whose comming those Garrisons of the French which were in the towne, retired into the new Castell, and the Neapolitans deprived of all hope but such as is left to men abandoned, receiued Consaluo the xiiij. day of May, Capua and Aversa doing the like in the same time.

THE SIXT BOOKE OF THE historic and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT

THE French King makes his preparation to passe into Italy: Pope Alexander the sixt is empoisoned: His successor Pope Pius the third dieth within xxvi. dayes: In his the second created Pope: The Duke Valentinois is apprehended prisoner: The French are ouerthrown at Garillon: The Florentins faile to take the city of Pisa: Peace is established betweene the French King and the King of Spaniards.

THAT man etreth lesse who promisseth to himselfe a chaunge of the affaires of this world, then he that perswadeth that they are alwaies firme & stable. And albeit the mā wise & resolute, is seldom displeased with things which ought to be borne, for that whatsoever might happē to another, he neuer complaineth if it chaunce to him: yet (so is the state of man entangled with infirmities) ther hapneth no mutatiō which in some sort shaketh not the resolution and constancy of the mind: an example verified in the person of the French king: who, as soone as he heard the newes of so great a losse, and in a time wherein he had more expectation of peace, then of war, entred into no little alteration, concurring in that aduersity, not only the deprivation of a kingdome so mighty & flourishing,

-ishing, with the desolation and ruine of his armies, compounded of his chiefest nobilities and men of race and vertue: but also he considered the perill wherein stood all the residue of that which he held in Italy, which as he had already made the rewards of his glory and victories, so he referred to adioyne them (as perpetuall monuments) to the reputation of his Empire and greatnesse. But the humor which most fed this passion, proceeded chiefly of impatience against his fortune, esteem-ing his dishonor so much the greater, by how much he was vanquished by the king of Spaniards, whose power he iudged to be farre inferiour to his; an error familiar with Princes, to esteeme lesse of their enemy then he is, and more of their owne forces then they are indeede. And as in these cases the despite of the iniury doth much to enforce a desire of reuenge, so the king debating deeply the estate and nature of the wrong, which was, to be beguiled vnder hope, & promise of peace, determined to run vnto the remedy which commonly those men vse that hold themselues iniured: that is, with all his forces and meanes to assaye to recouer the honour and kingdom he hath lost, and with armes to restore the reputation that had bin stolne from him by deceit, holding it no iniustice to be. reuenged of him that did the first wrong. But afore he entred into the action of any enterprise, he complained grieuously to the Archduke not yet departed from Blois, recommending to him the infamy of infidelity, & how much it imported him to redresse the abuse, if he had any vertue to preferue his faith and his honour. By which instigation, the Archduke (whose innocency held him sufficiently acquitted) solicited greatly his father in law, to redresse the abuse, complaining in vehement termes that things were so handled to his great slander, & that in the sight and knowledge of all the world. It hath bene a custome with the Princes of the world to entertaine one another with vaine hopes and artificiall practises, esteeming more the occasions which the time offereth, then the faith and promises which themselves do make: for, the kings of Spaine, with many excuses, deferred to send the ratification of peace afore the victory, alledging somtimes, that hauing a custome to make their dispatches ioyntly, they could neuer be both together in one place as was necessary: and sometimes that they were so pestred with the multitude of affaires, that all oportunities to that expedition, were preiudicall. In which excuses may be manifestly discerned the ill disposition they had to embrace the peace, either for that their son in law had exceeded their commissions, or else for that after he was departed out of Spaine, they were entred into a better hope of the issue and successe of the warre: or at least for that it seemed straunge to them, that he had appropriated to himselfe their part of the realme, hauing no assurance (by the minority of the children) that the mariage of his sonne should take effect: and yet as they alwaies expressed inclinations to peace, & gaue continuall hopes to ratifie it; so, by deferring, they won as much time as they could, to the end to take aduice according to the euent of things.
 And obseruing stil the same sleight to temporize and entertaine, after they vnderstood by true ad-uertisement that their army remained victorious, albeit they were resolved to hold no reckening of the peace that was made, yet did they deferre to declare their intention to the Archduke, to the end, that keeping by that meanes the French king in suspence, he might haue the lesse oportunity to prepare for the rescuing of Caietta and the other places which yet remained. At length, constrained by the importunities of their sonne in law (who was determined that otherwise he would not depart from Blois) they sent thither new Embassadors, by whom was declared, after disputation of certaine dayes, that it was not the intention of their kings to ratify that peace which had bene made in that sort, which neither in matter, meaning, nor circumstance, it caried either honour or surety for them: and entring into controuersie with the Archduke, they told him, that it brought no maruell and discontentment to his father in law, that in the conditions of the peace, he had transgressed their will, and that albeit in regard of his honour his commission was free and large, yet he ought to communicate with the instructions that were giuen him, which were limited and subiect to rule. The Archduke answered, that his instructions were no lesse free and vni-uersall then his commission, and that at his departure, his parents in law assured him that they desired the peace chiefly by his meanes, and did sweare vpon the Holy Gospell and image of Iesus Christ to obserue whatsoever he should determine: and yet for his owne part, he was contented to trauell in it as in the person of a man regulated; and forbearing to vse the amplitude and authority of his commission, he alwaies communicated with the two personages which they had sent with him. These new Embassadors working all by art, propounded new meanes of accord, disclosing as it were that their kings had desire to render the realme to King Federicke. But those deuises being discerned not only to be vaine, but also full of scorne and deceit, for that they tended to estrange from the French king the spirit of the Archduke, who looked to haue that kingdome for his sonne. The king in publike audience answered them, that he would in no sort treat or negotiate with them, if first they ratified not the peace that was made, and declared that the disorders hapned by it did much discontent them: He told them, that it seemed to him a matter not only maruellous, but also detestable and abhominable, that those kings who gloried so much to haue gotten the title of Catholiques, would hold so base reckning of their proper honour, their faith giuen, their oath sworne, and of the religion they professe, bearing no respect to the Archduke, a Prince so great, so noble, so vertuous, and their sonne and heire. With this answer commaimding them the same day to depart his Court, he turned immediatly all his wits to the preparations of the war, wherein taking occasion vpon the greatnesse of the wrongs that had bin done, he determined to aduance far greater prouisions both by land and sea, then had bin done in any times afore by any of the kings of France: So importunate is the passion of reuenge in the minds of mortall men, who notwithstanding find oftentimes more security to dissemble iniuries then to reuenge them.

In so much as he determined to send two mightie armies to the realme of Naples, the one by sea and the other by land. And least in the meane while Caietta and the Castels of Naples were lost, he prepared to succour them with diligence by sea, as well with new supplies of men of war, as with all other necessary things: and to giue impediment that there went no succours out of Spain (which had bin the cause of all the disorders) he resolved to inuade the kingdome of Spain with two armies by land, addressing one to the countrey of Rossillon which adioyneth to the sea Mediterrane, and the other to Fontaraby with the other places assitling vpon the Ocean sea: and also at the same time, to assaile with an army by sea, the coasts of Catelogna and Valencia.

But whiles the French were diligent in preparing for these expeditions, Consaluo deuising how he might haue the Castels of Naples, planted his artillery against new Castell at the foote of the hill Saint Martin: from thence on a place somewhat raised, he beat the wall of the Citadell, whose situation being towards the sayd mountaine, was made strong with auncient wals, their foundations being almost vnder the earth. At the sametime also Peter of Navarro cast a mine to ouerthrow the wals of the Citadell, battring also the new Castell wals, and the Towre of Saint Vincent which Consaluo had won a few dayes before. New Castell had a forme & building after another fashion then it is at this day, for that now the Citadell being taken away, there beginneth a new circuit of wals, where were the wals of the same, and that stretcheth along the place of the Castell vntill the sea: this circuit begun by Federick & by him raised euen to the walt, being made of very strong matter of walling, & well founded, is very hard to be vndermined, for that it is subiect to countermines on all sides, & also the water runneth almost vpon the vppermost part of the ground. Consaluo had a determination, that as soone as he had taken the Citadell, and comming neare the vault of the Castell wall, he would destroy it with new mines: but either by the naturall rashnesse, or by the ill fortune of the Frenchmen, a greater occasion was offered to him, the aduersities of the French making all things happy to their enemies. For, after Peter of Navarro had put fire to the mine which he had perfected, the fury of the powder blew open the wall of the Citadell, & at the same instant the Spanishe bands of footmen standing ready raunged in battell expecting the operation of the fire-worke, made entries on many sides, partly by those places of the wall that were broken, and partly vsing the seruice of scaling ladders, they commanded the wall in sundry other places not hurt by the mine, their fortune making those things easie, which by experience & reason seemed not without manifest perill. On the other side, the French, issuing out of the Castell of intention not to suffer them to remaine within the Citadell, charged them, but with a successe farre inferior to their vertue, for that being immediatly overlayed with multitudes of the Spanishe, as they retired towards the Rampier, the Spaniards entred pelmell with them, & running with the same fortune eue vpon the way that goeth to the gate, they so redoubled the feares of the French already appalled by the dispaire of their own estate, that standing in condition vtterly abandoned, in lesse then halfe an houre they rendred the Castell with their goods and liues to discreffion, the Count of Montoire remaining prisoner, with many other Lords. This conquest was so much the more agreeable to the Spaniards, & lesse for the purpose of the French, by how much there arrived from Genes the day following, for their succours, an army by sea of fixe great ships, with many smaller smaller vessels freighted with victuals, weapon & munitions, & a regiment of 1000. footmen. At the discouerie of this Nauie, the Spanish armie at sea riding then in the port of Naples, retired into Tschia, whither the French Nauie pursued them vnderstanding the new Castle was lost: but the Spanish Nauie hauing sunke before them certaine Barks, to the end they were not compelled to fight, after they had bestowed certaine bolnes of shot one against another, more for pleasure then preiudice, they brake off, the one going to Caietta, and the other being reassured by the departure of the enemy, retired to the mole of Naples: fortune doing more for their safetie then their owne venue.

After the taking of new Castle, Consaluo fell to deuise by what meanes he might haue the residue of the realme, & therefore without tarying for the armie that was in Calabria (which laie there to conquer the vale of Ariana to take away all impediments to passe further) he sent Prosper Colonne into Abruzzza: and leauing Peter of Nauarro afore the Egge Castle, he marched with the residue of the armie towards Caietta, in the taking whereof he supposed did consist the summe of the warre, for that both the hopes & the dispaire of the French mē depēded whollie vpon the defence or losse of that Citie, strong by the oportunitie of the sea, & by the conueniencie & greatnes of his port, verie fit to receiue the armies that should be sent frō Genes to Provence. Touching the French men, they did not only hold Caietta, but also, besides the places thereabouts which were in their power, they comaunded in Abruzzza, Aquilea, the rocke of Euandra, with many other places: besides, the Lord Lewys d'Ars, hauing reassembled manie troops of horsemen & footmen, & being fortified with the Prince of Melfa within Venoufa, did great harmes to the countrie thereabout: Lastly, Rossano, Matalona, with many other strong peeces appertaining to the Barons of the faction of Anion, held out constantly at the deuotion of the French king, their valour notwithstanding being insufficient to resist their aduersities.

In this meane while Peter of Nauarro made certaine close or couered Barks, with the which approaching in more suretie the walles of the Egge Castle, he cast a mine on that side which prospects Pizisalcona, without the knowledge or priuie of them within, & as soone as he had intangled it with the fire, he blew into the aire in great furie one part of the wall, together with the bodies of men that stood vpon it: with the which, both for the action terrible, & the newnes of the deuise, strange, the Castle was immediatly taken to the special reputation of Peter of Nauarro, & general wonder of al men, for that as new inuentions to reuerse a strong place are most fearfull, hauing as yet no deuise to encounter them, so it was incredible to what estate of opinion this new experience brought Peter of Nauarro, against whose mines they thought that neither walles, fortresses, nor other working could make resistance, so readily is the nature of man raised into wonder when his mind comprehends not the reason of the things which the eye beholdeth performed in action. And sure in those daies it was a thing of great horror, that with the force of Cannon powder put into a Caue, or rather powred in the mine, men should throw downe to the earth, places & walles of greatest strength & most subtile foundation. The first that vsed this experience, of vndermining of walles in Italy, were the Genowaies, amongst whom, according to the testimonie of some, Peter of Nauarro exercised the art of warre in the person of a meane soldier on foote, it was in the yeare 1487, when they laie incamped afore the rock of Serezanella holden then by the Florentines, where, with a myne cast in this maner, they opened a part of the wall, missing notwithstanding the taking of the rock, for that the myne (by some error or imperfection) had not pierced so deepe vnder the rocke as was needefull, the same being the occasion that at that time the example of such an experience was not followed.

Consaluo, drawing neare to Caietta, M. d'Aligre, who had distributed 400. Launces & 4000. footmen of those which remained of the fortune of the battaile, between Caietta, Fondi, Lixio, Tracetto, & the rock Guillaumo, retired them all efsiones within Caietta wherein entred with him the Princes of Salerno & Bisignan, the Duke of Tracetto with many other Barons of the realme ioyned afore with him. After the retreat of these companies, Consaluo entred vpon those places which they had left abandoned, & also vpon the rock of S. Germain, encamping afterwards in the Suburbs of Caietta. And after he had planted his artillerie, he battered with an incredible furie that side towards the hauen, & the mountain commonly called Mount Roland, a hil conioyned & hath commandement ouer the Citie, & the which, the French men had then fortified with rampiers & Bastillions of earth, being afterwards by him inclosed with wal, he assailed in vaine to enter with two assaults (but not ordered) and forbearing at last to giue the assault general, & disposed that day which he had determined to giue it, he saw it would be hard to haue it, aswel for the numbers & valours of those within, as also when he considered that though his army should enter by strength into the mountain, yet he should be but brought into greater perill, standing open to the shot of the artillerie planted in the monastery & other high places vpon the mountain. He forbore not for all this to plaie with his artillerie & to molest the town, which likewise was enuironed & besieged on that side to the sea, lying afore the hauē the xvij. Spanish Gallies which Dom Raymon de Cardona gouerned. But whilest Consaluo was busie in these actions, there arriued for the French a Nauie of six grosse Carracks Genouaies, six other ships, & seue gallies with good succors of victuals & footmen. Their commaunder was the Marquis of Saluzzo, who by the death of M. de Nemours, the king had sent thither for their new Viceroy, the fortune of the warres notwithstanding, nothing altring though the person of the General was changed. The king desiring greatly to keepe Caietta, refurnished them estoones within few daies, what vpon those vessels & what vpo others, with 1000 footmen of Corseigna & 3000 Gascoins: in so much as by the comming of this new Nauie, the Spanish Fleete was cōstrained to retire to Naples, & Consaluo despairing to do any more good there, retyred his regimēts within the moale of Caietta, & within Castellona, whereby he kept Caietta besieged with a siege (as it were) more large, after he had lost many of his people, partly by skirmishing, & some in retyring, amongst whom Dom Hugues de Cardona was slaine by a shot frō the towne. But at the same time, all his other affaires of the kingdom trained a successe more happie, for that Prosper Colonne had newly taken the rock of Euandro & Aquilea, & reduced al the other piēces of Abruzzza to the Spanish deuotion, almost all Calabria, yeelding the like obedience by the contract which the Count Capaccio had lastly made with them. And there remained no other place free from their iurisdiction, but Rossano & S. Senerin where the Prince of Rossano was besieged, nothing resisting the felicitie of those men, whom fortune went about to make victors.

Whilest these alterations trauelled the kingdom of Naples, the other regions of Italy were not altogether void of suspitions and troubles: for the Florentines, afore the fortune of the French began so headlong to decline in the kingdome of Naples, fearing indifferently the ambuscadoes of the Pope, & the ambition of the Duke Valentinou, forgate not to leaue prouisions of warre equal to the greatnes of the perill that threatned, holding it easie to suffer a mischief, whē they are sure of the remedie: they entertained into their paie for the leading of their armie (& yet without title of Generall) the Bailife of Caen, with fifty French Launces: a Capitaine for his own particular well recommended for the seruice of warre, & for the respect of the Florentines verie conuenient, for that being the kings subiect, & had brought his charge of fiftie Launces by the kings consent; they had opinion that those of whom they earst doubted, would now be better aduised what they would do, the king expressing vnder that degree of fauour & disposition to be readie to their aide in al necessities. As soone as he was come to their armie, they reassembled all their troupes, & for the second time, cut off the corne of the Pisans, but not through the whole countrey, for that to enter the vale of Serle was not without danger, hauing his situation betweene the mountaines and the waters, & in the midway betweene Lucqua & Pisa. Immediately after they had giuen this spoile to their corne, the Camp marched to Vicopisan, which was taken without difficultie, for that 100. French footmen being within it, the Bailife of Caen threatning to punish them as enemies to the king, & sometimes promising them of liberalitie a moneths pay, they exchanged their faith with feare & hope of profit, & issued out of the towne, the same being the occasion that Vicopisan was rendred to discretion. Verucola also wherein was but a slender garrd, was forthwith enuironed, to the end no succors should enter into it: and the artillerie being afterwards trailed thither not without great difficulties, for that the mountains therabouts, offered many troublesome impediments, those that were within, fearing more the thunder of the Cannon, then trusting to their proper vertue of fortune, yeelded, their goods & liues saued. The situation of Verucola being a litle fortresse situate vpon a high mountain during the warres in the country of Pisa, is of great importance: for that being within fife miles of Pisa, it hath not only a naturall aptnes to distresse the countrey thereabout, yea euen to the gates of the citie, but also by his prospect he discouereth all the bands & troops that come out of Pisa, whether they be on foote or horsemen. P. Vitelli & many other experienced Captaines made many tryals in vaine to carrie it since the warre began. And now the confidēce that the Pisans had, that Vicopisan would be defended, wthout taking the which, the Florentines could not encāp before Verucola, was the cause that they had not made sufficient prouision, wherein they helped forward the fortune of their enemies, mies more by their proper negligence then by the others vertue, opinion beguiling them against reason or experience. Greatly did amaze the Pisans the losse of Verucola, in whom notwithstanding, neither the regard of the harmes they had receiued, nor the consideration of their other calamities being miserable by want of money & victuals, could worke no inclination to returne to the obedience of the Florentines, languishing (by one common infirmitie) in dispaire to obtaine pardon for the conscience of the great transgressions they had don: which dispositiō it was needfull, that such as in the gouernment bare geatest authoritie, should entertaine with a speciall diligence, for that those of the plaine countrey (without whom they were not able to continue defence) bare no small suspēctiō to run with the streame, & to varie in mind as their common fortune declined. And therefore nourishing them with diuers hopes, together with those estates of the common people that liued more by the benefits of peace, then troubles of warre, they published amongst them sundrie rumors vnder the authoritie of fained letters, amusing them with diuers inuentions, and confounding things false with those that were true; if any accident hapned in Italy, they tooke the oportunitie & made it serue for their purpose, communicating with the people that sometimes one Prince, somtimes another, were readie to come to succor them: they made perswasions according to the propertie of the time, vsing their tongues in stead of force, to staie those men vpon whom depended their own safetie. But in al these extremities they were not without some aide & succors of the Genowases & Lucquois, ancient enemies of the Florentines, & likewise of Pandolfo Petrucci, bearing litle remembrance of the benefits receiued: and (which was of geatest importance) they were also nourished in secret with certaine succors, but with far greater hopes, by the Duke Valentino: Ambition hath infinit operations, & in this abuseth the imaginatiōs of men, that it makes them seeme able to hold those things which they cannot gripe, & raiseth their mindes to conceiue matters about their power or possibilitie: For the Duke, in whom had long raged a desire to make him selfe lord of that citie, & in other times had abstained for feare of the kings displeasure, tooke now the aduantage of the time, and presuming much by the infelicitie of the French in the realme of Naples, he ioyned to him the consent of his father, & treated with the Pisan Embassadours whom they had sent to Rome for that purpose, to accept the iurisdiction, aspiring by that meane to occupie all Tuskane: a deuise, which albeit brought the Florentines & Siennois into no small suspicion of him, yet the vniuersall benefit being hindered by their particularities, there was no proceeding to that vnitie which the French king propounded betweene the Florentines, the Bolonois, & the Siennois, for that they of Florence refused to accept it if they were not repossessed of Mont Pulcian, as had beene solicited & promised from the beginning: and Pandolfo who bare a mind estranged from it (albeit he made other shew) alleaged that to restore it, would so stirre vp the hate of the people of Sienna against him, that he should be constrained yet once againe to forsake the towne, and therefore he said it was better (for the common benefit) to deferre it as yet, til time brought about a better occasion, then in restoring it presently to further the Duke Valentino with meanes to occupie Sienna. By these meanes, denying nothing, he kept things in longnesse & delaies, seeking to leaue the Florentines contented with hopes in stead of effects, which excuses by them reiecte were accepted & beleued in the Court of France, by the meane of Franncis de Naruy resident at Sienna by the kings commaundement.

But it was not the intentiō of the Pope & Valentino to put these enterprises to executiō, otherwise then the proceeding of the army which the king prepared, gaue them courage, and induced them by occasiōs to stick thore the one king then to the other: whereupon in that time they stood in suspēctiō & variatiō of thoughts, deferring as much as they could the declaratiō of their intentiō, which bare no fauour or inclinatiō to the French king further then there was feare to constrain them, for that the experience of things passed in Bologna & Tuscan tooke away all hope to attempt greater matters with his fauour: & for that reasons they had begun afore the victorie of the Spaniards to become more & more separat fro him in which after the victorie, rising in impudēcie & weening, they respected no more (as they were wont to do) neither his wil nor his authoritie, his aduersities disclosing their coruptiōs, which in his prosperities he rather suspected then discerned. And albeit, immediatly after the ouerthrows of the French, they gaue assurāce to embrace the kings quarrels, making démonstratiō to entertain men to send to the realme of Naples; yet, what by the ambition of new conquests, & greedy eyes they cast vpon the riches of Tuskane, the king requiring that they would declare them selues openly for him, the Pope answered in such miserie and doubt, that by how much lesse they were innocent in wordes or meaning, by so much more it was reasonable in the king to suspect them. Their simulation and dissimulation being so notable, that it was a prouerbe ordinarie in Rome, that the Pope neuer did that which he saide, and the Duke seldome spake that which he meant. Besides, the contention wherein they were with Iohn Iordan was not yet determined: for, albeit Valentinois fearing the kings displeasure, abstained to molest him vpon his Maiesties commaundement: yet the Pope declaring how much that greeued him, ceased not to sollicit the king to suffer him either by armes to reconquer the estates of Iohn Iordan, or els by some other degree of compulsion to see that he had recompence for them: giuing to vnderstand that that which moued him was not ambition, but a iust feare of his neighbourhood, proceeding vpon this suspition, that finding amongst the papers of Cardinall Vrsin a blanke signed with the proper hand of Iohn Iordan, it was an argument, that in those things which were negociated at Maisons, he had one selfe will and intelligence against him with the Vrsins. In which thing the king more regarding profit then honestie, had proceeded diuersly, according to the diuersitie of times, sometimes expressing fauour to Iohn Iordan as before, and somtimes inclining to satisfie the Pope in some degree. And for that cause Iohn Iordan refusing to depose Bracciano into the hands of the French Embassador resident at Rome, the king required that they should repose vpon him the resolution of the difference, vnder condition that Iohn Iordan should be conueyed into Fraunce within two moneths, and that things should remaine in that estate, vntil he had determined: whereunto as Iohn Iordan consented by necessitie, hoping through his own merits and the expectation he had of his father and him, to be fully deliuered from such vexations: so also in the Pope appeared no resistance, more for feare then otherwise, for that the French king required such a matter in a time when the Archduke contracted the peace in the name of the kings of Spaine. But the condition of things being changed by the victorie of the Spaniards, and seeing withall that the French king had neede of him, he demanded all the states of Iohn Iordan, offering the recompence that should be declared by the king, who for the same occasion induced Iohn Iordan to consent thereunto, and to promise to deliuer in his sonne for the assurance of that which should be determined: a matter which the king did greatly against his wil, for that he had no intention to deliuer vp those estates to the Pope, if at the same instant, he ioined not with him openly in the waire of Naples, holding it as reasonable for him as for the Pope, to take the aduantage of things, & to serue his turne of controuersies. But they of Petillano where the sonne of Iohn Iordan was, refusing to deliuer him to the kings Embassadour, who was gone to Port Hercules to receiue him, Iohn Iordan him selfe being then returned, went to the Embassadour, and to fulfill the promise of his faith, offered him his proper person, which the Embassadour accepted with litle reputation, and with lesse discretion bestowed him in a ship: but as soone as the king knew it, he caused him to be set at libertie, esteeming it an iniurie dishonorable, to do iustice vpon him for the disobedience of others.

prepares mightily against the K.
of Spaine.

In this meane while, there was vsed a generall diligence to leaue the preparation which the French king meant to emploie both on this side & beyond the mounts. For the Lord d' Albert & the Marshall of Cie, were gone into Guien with foure hundred Launces, & fiue thousand footmen, as well Swissers as Gascons, to make warre on the part of Fontarabie: and to stirre vp the Countie of Rosillon, the Marshal of Rieux was sent into Languedock with eight hundred launces & eight thousand footmen, part Swissers & part French. And at the same time the Nauie by sea hoyled saile to endamage the coastes of Catelogna and the realme of Valence. Besides, the king had dispatched for Italy with title of Captaine generall ouer his armie, the Lord Trymonille (to whom was transferred by vniuersall opinion the whole merite and reputation for matters of warre, within the realme of Fraunce) & sent with the same expedition, the Bailife of Dyon to dispatch eight thousand Swissers, the men at armes also & the footmen making hast to march, notwithstanding the armie was not so strong as was determined in the beginning. Perhaps the king would haue it so, not for disabilitie, or for that he would spare, but for that he desired that they might make the more expedition into the kingdome of Naples, & partly because Monsieur d' Alegre aduertising the king of the state of the affaires there, assured him that the remainder of the armie was stronger then it was in deed, both for that the townes & Barons remained firme in his deuotion, & also he had demanded succors of all those in Italy which fauored his faction. By which

which meane and industrie, the Florentyns had graunted him the Bailly of Caen with the fiftie Launces paid of their own money, and an hundred and fiftie other men at armes. The Duke of Ferrary also and the Bolonnoys, with the Marquis of Mantua (who for that the king sent to him, went to him in person) did refurnish him euery one in particular with an hundred men at armes, and they of Sienna with an other hundred: which bands ioyned to the eight hundred Launces and five thousand Gascoys which Trymonille brought into Italy, & to the eight thousand Swissers which were expected, reckening also those that remained within Caietta, made vp the number of a thousand eight hundred Launces French and Italian, & more then eightene thousand foote men. Besides these preparations for the warre by land, the armie by sea was departed, a Naue strong & glorious, in so much as all men confessed, that there was no memorie that any French king had euer made so huge and mightie preparations (making distinction of the forces both by sea & by land, gathered aswell on this side, as beyond the mounts:) but it was not thought good for the kings suretie, to suffer his armie to passe by Rome, if first his maiestie were not well assured of the Pope and Duke Valentinois, for that he had iust occasion to doubt of them for many reasons & many demonstrations, but specially by the testimonie of certaine letters from Valentinois to Consaluo newly surceped, wherein was debated between them that if Consaluo tooke Caietta (in which case he should stand wel assured of all the matters of the kingdome) he should passe further with his armie, and Valentinois should take vpon him the iurisdiction of Pisa, and so they both to ioyne in one strength to assaile Tuscan. In which respect, the king (his armie being already passed into Lumbardy) was verie importunate that they should at last, declare their vttermost intention, holding it better to know them as they were, then to doubt them to be more or lesse then he should find them. And for their parts, albeit they listned to both parts, and treated with euery one, yet, iudging that the time was conuenient to make traffike of the trauels of another, their desires caried them most to ioyne with the Spanish: but they were restrained again with the consideration of this manifest danger, lest the french armie would begin to inuade their estates, in which case they should feele damage & displeasure, where they hoped to reape rewards & greatnes. In this estate of doubt and incertaintie of inclination, they suffred both parts to leaue apparantly bands of footmen within Rome, deferring as much as they could to declare them selues: but being at last in termes resolute vrged by the king, they offered that the Duke should be ioyned to his armie with five hundred men at armes & two thousand footmen, the king consenting not only to the occupying of the lands of Iohn Jordan, but also to the conquering of Sienna. And yet when they were vpon the point of conclusion, they varied, introducing new difficulties, as men, who (according to their custome) to be at libertie to take counsel of the euent of things, had no desire to declare them selues according to good meaning, and therefore there was propounded another nature of practise, by the which the Pope seeming not to declare for any of the parties, but to remaine in the person of a comon father, consented to giue passage to the french armie through the dominions of the Church, with promise not to molest neither the Florentyns, the Siennois, nor the Bolonnois during the wars in the realme of Naples. Which conditions had at length ben accepted by the king, to the end to giue expedition of passage to his armie to Naples, albeit he knew they were neither honorable for him self, nor sure for such as depended on him in Italy, seeing he had no assurance that the Pope and Valentinois would not declare against him, if any misfortune hapned to him in the realme: besides there was this danger, least as soone as his armie was out of the territories of Rome, they would not rise contrarie to their faith, to assaile Tuscan, which for the disagreement of the people, & the numbers of men which he had drained out of it, was become weake & almost disarmed, being a thing not vnlikely, that he would either set vpon that enterprise or some other, seeing they had so long time expected occasions, thinking to draw out of them a wonderfull profit.

But as the cogitations of men are vaine, and their thoughts full of deceit: so, when they stood in the highest estate of their hopes, behold the Pope, who went to supper in a vineyard neare the Vatican, to reioyce in the delight and pleasure of the fresh aire, is suddenly caried for dead to the Bishops Pallace: his sonne also communicating in the same accident, but with better fortune: for the day following, which was the eighteenth day of August, the dead corps of the Pope (according to custome) was borne into the Church of S. Peter, blacke, swolne, and most deformed, most manifest signes of poison: but Valentinois what by the vigour & strength of his youth, and readie helpe of strong medicines and contrepoisons; had his life saued, remaining notwithstanding oppressed with a long and grievous sickness: It was assuredly beleached that the accident proceeded of poison, the discourse whereof according to common report was in this sort: The Duke Valentinois, who was to be present at that supper, had determined to poison Adrian Cardinal of Cornette, reseruing that time and place to execute his bloudie resolution: for it is most certaine that in his father and him were naturall customes to vse poison, not only to be reuenged of their enemies, or to be assured of suspitions, but also vpon a wicked couetousnes to dispoile rich men of their goods, whether they were Cardinales or Courtiers, although they had neuer done them wrong, as hapned to the Cardinal Saint Ange who was verie rich. This manner of rage they would vse also against their greatest friends and familiars, and such as had bene their most faithfull seruants, such as were the Cardinales of Capua and Modeno: a recompense vnworthie the merits of good men, & not disagreeable to the disposition of such a father & sonne; whereof the one made all things lawfull by vile dispensation, and with the other nothing was dishonest wherein was oportunitie to his purposes: The Duke Valentinois sent before certaine flagons with wine infected with poison, which he gaue to a sertiant that knew nothing of the matter, commaunding that no person should touch them: a commaundement preiudiciall to his master, as the ignorance of the seruant was the instrument in the euil that hapned both to the father and sonne: Such is the suffrance of God, who in the execution of his iudgements, raiseth one murderer to kill another, and breaketh the brands of the fyre vpon the head of him that first kindled it. For, the Pope comming by aduenture somewhat before supper, and ouertome with the drought and immoderate heat of the time, called for drinke: and because his owne prouision was not yet brought from the Pallace, he that had the infected wine in charge, thinking it to be recommended to his keeping for a wine most excellent, gaue the Pope to drinke of the same wine which Valentinois had sent: who arriuing whilest his father was drinking, dranke also of the same wine, being but iust that they both should taste of the same cup which they had brued for the destruction of others. All the towne of Rome ranne with great gladnes to Saint Peters about the dead bodie of the Pope, their eyes not being satisfied to see dead and destroyed a Serpent, who with his immoderate ambition and poisoned infidelitie, together with all the horrible examples of crueltie, luxurie, and monstrous couetousnes, selling without distinction both holie things and prophane things, had infected the whole world: and yet was accompanied with a most rare and almost perpetuall prosperitie, euen from his young age to the end of his life, desiring alwaies great things, and obtaining most often that he desired: an example of much importance, to confound the arrogancie of those men, who presuming to know and see perfectly with humane eyes the depth of Gods iudgements, do assure, that what hapneth either good or ill to mortall men, proceedeth either of their merites or fautes: as though we sawe not daily many good men vniustly tormented, and many wicked persons about their desertings liue in ease and honour: wherein who makes another interpretation, derogates the iustice & power of God, the greatnes of which being not to be contained within any scripts or termes present, knoweth how well and largely to discteme in another time and place, the iust from the vniust, and that with rewardes and eternall punishments.

The Duke Valentinois no lesse sorowfull for the death of his father, then languishing in his owne infirmitie, rettyred all his bandes of men of warre about him; lying sicke in the Pallace: and hauing alwaies thought, partly by the feare of his armes, and partly through the fauour of the Spanish Cardinales which were eleuen, to create a Pope at his pleasure after the death of his father, he found now impediments about his expectation, specially in the matter of the election, and all his other plots and deuises to suffer imperfection and errour by reason of his disease, which was verie daungerous. In which respect he complained grieuously, for that hauing oftentimes foreseene all the accidents that might happen to him by the death of his father, and withall cast all the remedies that the wit of man might comprehend, yet he could neuer imagine that at the same time he should be restrained with a sickness so daungerous: and therefore finding it necessarie to frame his counsels, not to the plots he had layde before, but to the necessitie present: he sawe he was not able in one time to susteine the hatred of the Colonnos and Frsins, & fearing least they should ioine in conspiracie against him, he resolved to repose rather in those whom he had offended only in their goods, then to trust to the behauiour of such as he had grieued grieved both in their goods and persons : and in that minde he procured readie reconciliation with the Colomnois and such of the Vale as followed that faction ; he invited them to returne estates to their estates, and made restitution of the Castles which Alexander with great expenses had fortified and enlarged, the alteration and feare of the time compelling him to do more then any regard to honour, equitie, conscience, or religion . All which notwithstanding, sufficed not neither for his suertie, nor to keepe the towne of Rome in peace, wherein all things, were full of suspitions and tumults, for that both Prosper Colomno was entred and all that faction had taken armes : and also Fabio Vrsin comming euen to the houses of the familie of Mont Jordan, had with a great multitude of his partakers set on fire certeine merchants shops and the houses of many Spanish Courtiers, a natio generally enuyed by the memorie of the insolencies which they had done during the Popedom of Alexander. Besides, Fabio thirsting after the bloud of Valentynois, made great leuies of forreine souldiers, and solicited Bartlemew Aluiano being then in the paie of the Venetians, to ioyne with him and his house in the reuenge of so many wrongs as he had don them, thinking it but iust to raise violence against him, whose furie had not spared to persecute them and their friends with all sortes of oppression and ruines . The suburbes and meadowes so swarmed with the men of warre of Valentynois, that the Cardinals seeing no reason, of suertie to assemble at the Bishops Pallace, drew together at the couent of the Church of Minerna, at which place (contrary to the auncient custome) they began, but farre later then they were wont, to doe the funerall of Alexander. The trouble and mutinie of the time present not only deferring the celebration of the obsequies, but also somewhat derogating the ceremonie, detecting in those last actions the abhominable and infamous life of him in whose regard they were done : it was much feared least Consaluo would come to Rome, specially for that Prosper Colomno had left at Murina, a certaine number of Spanish souldiers ; and for the reconciliation of Valentynois with the Colomnois, it was beleued that he had an intention to follow the Spanish faction . But greater were the feares of the comming of the french armie, which had marched slowly till that day, for that in the publike counnelles of the Swissers (being not a litle amazed for the ill fortune of the French in the realme of Naples) it was doubted afore the contract, that the king could not make leaue of their men, and all the Capteines and footmen chosen together had refused for the same occasion ; the same beeing the cause that they were not so readie, and that they made long aboad by the wayes : But in respect of the Popes death, the armie which was gouerned by the Marquis of Mantua with title of the kings Lieutenant, & by the Bailly of Caen, & Monsieur de Sandricourt, in whom except the name, remained as much power as in the Generall, for that Tramouille remained sicke at Parma, was come without tarying for the Swissers, to the territories of Sienna, with intention to goe to Rome according to the direction of the king, who also had commaunded the Nauie which was at Cauetta to make saile to Ostia, to giue impediment to Consaluo for going to Rome with his armie to compell the Cardinals to chosse a Pope at his deuotion. Notwithstanding the french armie remained certaine dayes betweene Bancouent and Vuerbe, for that the merchants making difficultie for the troubled time that was at Rome to accept the billes of exchange that were sent out of France, the Swissers now comen into the countrey of Sienna, refused to march further if they were not paid . In this time the tumultes were no lesse in the territorie of Rome, with many other places through the estate of the Church and the lands of Valentynois, for that the Vrsins and all the Romish Barons restored them selues to their estates : The familie of Vitelli were returned to Citta de Castello, & Iohn Pawle Basillon vnder hope of a certaine intelligence, had assailed Perouza. In which action albeit he was put to the chase by his enemies, and constrained to go his way, yet being refurnished with newe bands and open succours of the Florentynes, he entred the towne in a braue and resolute assault, not without the slaughter of his enemies and some losse of his owne companie . The towne of Plombyn also tooke armes, which albeit they of Sienna laboured to vsurpe & occupie, yet the auncient Lord returned thither by the fauour of the Florentynes. The Duke of Vrbyn, the Lordes of Pesere, of Camerin, and Sins Gale, did the like in their estates : onely Romagnia (notwithstanding they were not without suspicion of the Venetians who leuyed great bands of men at Ranenna) remained quiet and inclined to the deuotion of Valentynois, knowing by experience how much it was more tollerable and better for the weale of the countrey to serue one only and mightie Lord, then to haue in euerie towne: Lords particular, who neither for their weaknesse could defend them, nor for their pouertie, were able to doe them good, but rather when they found their reuenues insufficient to entertaine them, they would be constrained to oppress them: They considered also, that for the authoritie & greatnes of the Duke Valentynois, & for the good iustice he ministred amongst them, their countrey was not vexed with so many mutinies and tumults of factions as it was wont to be, bringing ordinarie slaughters to their friends and cohabitants. Besides, they drew into consideration the benefites that he had done for many, together with the great friendshippes he had gotten, by entertaining and giuing paie to such as had bene trained in armes, by distributing offices to men able and sufficient, and also by soliciting his father on the behalf of Prelates and Churchmen, touching the collation of benefices and spirituall dignities. Out of these respects they took occasion of firmnes, that neither the examples of others that reuolted, nor the memorie of their auncient Lords, could not estrange them from Valentynois: who albeit he stood oppressed with many difficulties, and lesse expectation of a-bilitie in a state so pluckt and broken, yet was he laboured vnto both by the French and Spanishe, and with many offers and promises importunately solicited to be on their side: for that besides the oportunitie of his forces and men of warre, they hoped by this meane to winne the voices of the Spanishe Cardinals in the election to be made. But the Duke looking wisely into the state of his affaires, tooke counsell of the inclination of the time, & refused to follow the fancies of men: and albeit for the reconcilment that was made with the Colonniois, it was beleued that he would be declared for the Spanishe, yet being induced to that reconcilment only by feare, least they would ioyne with the Orsinois, he declared now that he would do nothing contrarie to his fidelitie to the French, whom he determined to follow; for that, both within the towne of Rome, which the kings armie did now approach, and also in his other estates, they might do him more good and harme then the Spanishe: in so much as the first day of September he made a consenti-on with the Cardinall S. Seuerin and Monsieur de Trans the kings Embassador, by the which he promised to aid him with his souldiers in the enterprise of Naples, and in all other expeditions against all persons except the Church. And on the other part, the kings Agents bound the king to the protection as well of his person, as of all the estates he possessed, and to concurre also in the recouerie of those which he had lost. Besides these, the Duke gaue hopes to draw the most part of the Spanishe Cardinals to giue their voice to the Cardinall of Amboise, who puffed vp with a proud hope to obtaine the Popedom with authoritie, with money, and with the armies of his king, went immediately out of France after the Popes death to Rome, carrying with him the Cardinall of Aragon and the Cardinall Ascanius: him he had deliuered two yeares before out of the Towre of Bourges, and giuen him honorable countenance in the Court, hoping that if the Pope should dye, his ancient reputation might do much to further his ambitio, together with the many friends and fauorers which he had in the Court of Rome: foundations verie weake to beare so high and waightie a purpose, for that neither Valentynois could wholly dispose the Spanishe Cardinals more inclined (according to the custome of men) to their proper profite, then to reacknowledge the good turnes that his father and he had done to them, and withall, many amongst them, hauing regard not to offend the mind of their king, would not haue bene so farre ouerseene, as to choose for Pope a French Cardinall. Neither yet Ascanius, if he had had any power or place in the election, would haue consented to lift to the supreme seat the Cardinall of Amboise, for that it was to the perpetual embasing and cutting off of all the hopes that yet remained, as well to him, as to those of his house. They deferred yet the election of the new Pope, not only for that it was later then was wont ere they began to celebrate the obsequies of the dead, till the ending of which (enduring for the most part nine daies) the Cardinals haue no custome to enter into the Conclau or house of election: but also, the better to cutt off occasions and dangers of a schisme, in so great a confusion of affaires, & important diuision of Princes, the Cardinals that were present had agreed to giue aduertisement to those that were absent to make their repaire: and when they were come, the Colledge neuerthelesse was holden in suspence, suspecting that the election would not be free, as well for the bands of Valentynois, as for that the French armie which at last was drawn between Nepi and the Tiber with intention to come to Rome, refused to passe the river of Tyber, if aforehand there were not chosen a new Pope. They feared, that either the contrarie part would rule the Colledge in the election, or els such was the deuise of Cardinall Amboise, no lesse for the safety of his person, then hoping to be the better fauoured, These things, after many contentions, the Colledge refusing otherwaies to enter into the Conclauē) were at last resolued and made forme, for that the Cardinall of Amboise gaue his faith to the whole Court of Cardinals, that the French armie should not passe Nepi and the Isle, the Valentinois consenting to go to Nepi and afterwards to Cinisa Castellano, hauing sent to the French Camp two hundred men at armes and three hundred light horsemen vnder the leading of Lodowike de la Mirandola and Alexander de Trynulle: but the Colledge erected many bands of footemen for the gard of Rome, and gaue power to three Prelates whom they had appointed for the garde of the Conclauē, to open it if they discerned sedition or tumult, to the end that all the Cardinals being in libertie to go whither they will, euery one might be out of hope to force them. At last the Cardinals entred the Conclauē, being xxxviij. in number, where the disagreemēt which in other times was wont to kepe things in delay, was the cause nowe that they entred roundly into the action, and created in fewe daies a new Pope. And albeit in the election they had much to do to agree vpon the person, as well for their generall conetousnesse, as for the contention betweene the Cardinals depending of the French king, and the Spanish Cardinals embracing the faction of the king of Spaine. And albeit they were no lesse amased with the present daunger wherein they stood, all things in Rome beeing full of suspicion and tumult, then with the consideration of the accidents which in a time so troubled might happen by the vacation of the Sea: yet at last, euen by the consent of the Cardinall of Amboise, in who failed euery day al hope to be elected, they created for Pope Frauncis Piccolomini Cardinall of Sienna, in whom was no expectation of long life, both for his extreme age & present sicknesse: a Cardinall sure of vnspotted report, and for his other conditions, not vnworthy that degree, who, to renewe the memorie of Pius secundus his vnclē, tooke vpon him the name of Pius the third.

Frauncis Piccolomini made Pope.

As soone as the Pope was created, the French armie had no further occasion to abide there, and falling speedily into the way that had bene agreed vpon before, they passed suddenly the riuier of Tyber: but neither for the creation of the Pope, nor for the discamping of the armie, the tumults at Rome did not appease, for that because there was expectation for the coming of Aluiano and Iohn Paule Baillon, who conspiring together, made leuies of men in Perusa. Valentinois continuing as yet sicke, and fearing their comming, was returned to Rome with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, the like numbers of light horsemen, & eight hundred footmen, hauing obtained safeconduct of the Pope, who hoped that he might the easlyer put end to those things by some composition. But the Valentinois being within one towne and walles with the Vrsins, who lusted in a iust thirst after his bloud, the Vrsins, by the oportunitie of new bands arriuing, notwithstanding they demaunded of the Pope & Colledge of Cardinals a short and readie iustice, determined to be reuenged vpon him with armes, as soone as Iohn Paule Baillon and Aluiano were arriued. By reason of these conspiring intentions, there was also some controuersie betweene the towne and them of the suburbes where Valentinois was lodged: a contention which troubled not only the people of Rome, and the court, but also was supposed to bring great preiudice to the affaires of the French, for that the Vrsins, as soone as they were once dispatched of the quarell against Valentinois, preparing to go to the pay either of the French or Spanish king, and iudging that their strength was of no little importance to the victorie, they were sought to by both parts with ample conditions: but bearing a naturall disposition to the part of the French, the Cardinall of Amboise entertained in the kings name Iulio Vrsin, who contracted for all those of his familie, except Aluiano, for whom was reserued place, with honorable conditions; but his comming reuerfed all: for, albeit in the beginning he was almost agreed with the Cardinall of Amboise, yet, couetousnesse ouercomming his inclination, and being in one moment restrained with the Spanish Embassadour, he entred paie with the king of Spaine with fise hundred men at armes, and prouision of ix. thousand duckets yearely, assuring him selfe of all those of his familie, except Iohn Iordan: to which deliberation he was chiefly induced (as he frankly confessed) by despite that the Cardinall of Amboise, burning more and more in ambition to be Pope, fauoured Valentinois, hoping by his meane to obtaine the most part of the voices of the Spanish Cardinals: notwithstanding that the Cardinall clearing him selfe of the fault by transferring it to another, gaue out that he was perswaded that the Venetians were authors of it, who, for the desire they had, that the French king should not obtaine the realme of Naples, had not only consented that he should leaue their pay, promising to reſtore for him the ſame place; but alſo to the end the firſt payments ſhould be more readie, they lent to the Spaniſh Embaſſadors ſiſteene thouſand duckats; a matter, which though it bene in euery part certaine, yet it cannot be denied that the Venetian Embaſſador did not manifeſtly intrude himſelfe into that praſtiſe. Some were of opinion, that the conditions & large offers of the Spaniards, were the cauſe, for that they bound them ſelues to diſtribute eſtates in the kingdom, alwel to him as to all thoſe of his familie, and to indue his brother with reuenues eccleſiaſticall: and laſtly (which he eſteemed much) to aide him when the warre was finiſhed with two thouſand Spaniſh footmen, in the enterpriſe which he determined againſt the Florentines in the fauour of Peter de Medicis. It was beleued that Iohn Paule Baillon comen now to Rome with Lance, and who following his example, treated at one time with the French and with the Spaniſh, would alſo accompanie him in the ſame deliberation: but the Cardinall d'Amboſſe, who a litle amazed that the Vrſins had left the king, (a dealing which made doubtful the hopes of the French being afore almoſt certaine,) intertaind him immediatly into the kings ſeruiſe with an hundred and ſiſtie men at armes: he almoſt accorded whatſoeuer the other demaunded, but all vnder the name of the Florentines, for that Iohn Paule would it ſo, to the end to be more aſſured of his paies, which were to be rebated of the ſummes they ought to the king by vertue of their conuentions, he being more curious to prouide for the ſuretie of his paie, then careful to keepe his fidelitie with the king for the ſeruiſe that was required: for, being returned to Perouſa to put his people in order, and receiuing xiiij. thouſand duckats, he was contented to gouerne himſelfe more according to the ſucceſſe of the time and common euent of things, and by his paſſions and particular intereſts, then according to the reputation and faith of ſouldiers. In which reſpects deſerting with many excuſes, to go to the French armie, he would not depart from Perouſa: a matter which the Cardinall Amboſſe ſuppoſed to proceede vpon this, that Iohn Paule imitating the inſtancie of the Captaines of Italie of that time, had from the houre he was intertaind, made promiſe to Bartholmew Aluano and the Spaniards to do ſo, as holding that moſt reaſonable & indifferent for him to do, wherein was moſt ſuretie for his paie & ſafetie; a maner of dealing familiar with men that be mercenarie, but farre from thoſe that hold deare either honor or reputation. As ſoone as the Vrſins were entred into the paie of the Spaniſh, peace proceeded between them and the Colonna, reſolued and ſet down at the ſame inſtant in the lodging of the Spaniſh Embaſſador: to whom, and to the Venetian agent, they referred the reſolution of all their differences. The agreement of thoſe houſes brought no litle feare to Valentinois, for that being determined to leaue Rome, & preparing to go to Bracciana, Iohn Iordan hauing giuen his faith to the Cardinall of Amboſſe to lead him thither in ſuretie: Iohn Paule and the Vrſins were determined to aſſaile him, who hauing no meane to enter into the ſuburbs by the gate of the caſtle S. Ange, they iſſued out of Rome, and fetching along circuit to come to the gate Torrano, they found it ſhut, and burnt it, finding nothing to reſiſt the furie of their reuenge prouoked by ſo iuſt occaſions. As ſoone as they were entred the gate, they began to ſkirmiſh with certaine horſemen of Valentinois, to whole ſuccors albeit manie of the French ſouldiers did run, who were not yet departed out of Rome: yet what by the increaſing of the numbers of his enemies, and their rage redoubling, & his own people (whoſe ſtrength was much diminished afore) making ſignes to abandon him, the neceſſitie of his peril contrained him together with the Prince of Squillace and certaine Spaniſh Cardinals, to ſecke his ſafetie within the pallace of Varican, from whence he retired with a fearefull ſpeede into the caſtle S. Ange, hauing by the Popes conſent, receiued faith of the Captaine of the Caſtell (who was the ſame that had that charge in the daies of the dead Pope) to ſuffer him to go out when he would: all his people fled whither their feare or fortune would lead them. In this garbille the Bayliſe of Cade, was lightly hurt, and the Cardinall of Amboſſe had no litle feare: But the matter of quarrell being taken away by this accident, the tumults alſo were immediatly appeaſed within the towne of Rome: in ſo much as they began all in peace to prepare for the election of a new Pope, for that Pius, not beguiling the hopes which the Cardinals conceiued of him at the time of his creation, the xxvj. daie after his election, paſſed into a better life.

Valentinois

the third dieth.

After the death of Pius, the Cardinals deferring for certaine daies to enter the Conclau: (for they they thought good that the Vrſins afore should iſſue out of Rome, where they yet remained to returne the numbers which they ſhould leade to the Spaniſh armie) reſolved vpon the election out of the Conclauē. And the Cardinall S. Petri ad vincla mightie in friends, reputation, and riches had drawen to him the voices of ſo manie Cardinals, that entring the Conclauē, he was with an example all new, and without ſhutting the Conclauē, elected Pope the ſame night (thoſe that were of the contrarie opinion not daring to oppoſe againſt him). He, either hauing regard to his firſt name of Iulio, or (as coniectures were made) to ſignifie the greatnes of his conceptions, or laſtly, becauſe he would not giue place to Alexander, no not in the excellencie of name, tooke vpon him the name of Iulio, the ſecond of that name. Amongſt all the Popes that had paſſed, it was wondred that by ſo great conſent, they had created for Pope, a Cardinall, who was knowne to be of a diſpoſition rigorous and terrible, and in whom was no expectation of reſt and tranquillitie, hauing conſumed his youth in continuall trauels, offended many by neceſſitie, & exerciſed hatreds againſt manie great perſonages, a man to whoſe wit nothing was more familiar, then the inuention of trouble, faction, and conſpiracie. But on the other ſide, the cauſes of his election to that degree, appeared clearly, and ſurmounted all other difficulties: for, he had bene of long time a Cardinall of great power and might, and with his magnificence, wherein he had alwaies exceeded the reſidue, and with the greatnes of his ſpirit, by the which he did great things, he had not only made him ſelfe mightie in opinion and friends, but by times and degrees had erected high his authoritie in the Court of Rome, bearing the name, title, and dignitie of the principall defender of the eccleſiaſtike libertie. But that which ſerued moſt in his aduancement, was the promiſes immoderate and infinite which he made to the Cardinals, Princes and Barons, and to all others whom he might make profitable to him in that action. Beſides, he had the meane to diſtribute money, benefices and ſpirituall dignities, aſwell ſuch as were his owne, as thoſe that were the rights of others, for that ſuch was the bruite and renowme of his liberalitie, that manie made willing offers to him to diſpoſe as he beſt liked of their treaſures, their names, their offices, and benefices. They conſidered not that his promiſes were faire too great then that being Pope, he was either able or ought to obſerue, for that he had of ſo long continuance enjoyed the name of iuſt and vpright, that Pope Alexander him ſelfe his greateſt enemy, ſpeaking ill of him in all other things, could not but confeſſe him to be true of his word: a praiſe which he made no care to defile and ſtaine, to the end to become Pope, knowing that no man more eaſilie beguileth another, than he that hath the cuſtome and name neuer to deceiue any: The Cardinall of Amboſe conſented to this election, for that diſpairing to obtaine the Popedom for himſelfe, he hoped, that in the new Pope would be recontinued in time to come thoſe degrees and properties of amitie which he had alwayes borne to the king his maiſter: yſing this wiſedome, to ſeeme to beare that with liking & contentment, which he could not hinder by any deuſe, or power. The Cardinall Aſcanius gaue alſo his franke conſent, being reconciled to him before, and treading vnder ſeete the memorie of all ancient contentions that had been between them, at ſuch time as afore the Popedom of Alexander, they ſolowed the court of Rome in the perſons of Cardinals: for, hauing better experience of his diſpoſition then the Cardinall of Amboſe, thought, that being aſcended to the Popedom, he ſhould haue the ſame vnquietnes, or rather greater, than he had had in a meaner fortune, together with ſuch conceptions as might be able to open to him a way to recouer the duchie of Milan. In like ſort the Spaniſh Cardinals yeelded their conſent, notwithstanding in the beſiuning they ſhewed no inclination. But ſeeing there was ſuch a concurrence of others, & fearing not to be ſufficient enough to let his election, they iudged it more conuenient for their ſuretie, to hold him appeaſed in conſenting, then to ſtirre him to anger in reſuſing, ſomewhat aſſuying themſelues in the great promiſes he made to them, & for the reſt, induced by the perſwaſions & requests of Valenſois, whoſe condition ſtood ſo environed with calamities, that he was conſtrained to ſolow euery dangerous counſel. He was alſo no leſſe abuſed then the others with the hopes that he gaue him: for that he promiſed him to make a marriage betweene his daughter & his nephew Frauncis Maria de la Roſere Prefect of Rome, to confirm him captain of the armies of the Church: and which was of greateſt importace, to ioyn to his aid in the recouery of the towne of Romania. All which, except the Caſtles, were almoſt withdrawn from his obedience. The affaires of which prouince, full of innouations & changes, troubled with diuers thoughts the ſpirite of the Pope, both for that he knew he was not able at that time to bring it to his deuotion, and also he endured with murmure & grudge, that in it should be raised the greatnes of the Venetians, enuie bearing this nature, not to make men so much to complaine of their proper wants, as to greeue in the wealth & well doing of others.

When it was vnderstood in Romania, that Valentinois was fled into the Castle S. Angelo, & the regiments of men that were about him disperfed and passed into their feuerall calamities, the Cities which had expected him before in great constancie, hauing now their hopes turned into feares, applied to the time, and began to take new parties: such for the most part is the wauering condition of communalities and multitudes, not measuring things by iustice and equitie of reason, but either by opinion, which commonly is partiall, or by common report, which for the most part is full of incertainties and errors. Cesena returned to the auncient deuotion of the Church: Imola (the Captaine of the Castle being killed by meane of certaine the principal Citizens) stood in doubt, one part desiring to reuert to the Church, and another part to be reconciled to the Romans their first Lords: The Citie of Favry possessed by the Ordellaffy long time before it came to the Riars by the permission of Pope Sixtus, had repealed Anthonio a remainder of the same familie: who first prouing to enter with the fauour of the Venetians, but afterwards fearing that vnder his name, they would retaine the iurisdiction to them selues, had recourse to the Florentines, and by their meanes was reinuested in his patrimonie: John Sforce returned to Pefero: and to Rimini Pandolfe Malatesta, the one and other being called by the people. But Denys of Nalda, an auncient souldier to Valentinois, at the request of the Castle keeper of Rimini, went to their succours: by whose help in good time, Pandolfe being put to the chafe, the Citie returned eftswoones to the obedience of Valentinois. Faenza only perseuered longest in his deuotio, but in the end, falling into a deprivation of hope for his returne, casting their eyes vpon certaine remainders of the familie of Manfreda their auncient Lords, they called home Astor, a young gentleman of the same house, but a bastard, none remaining of the race legitimate. But the Venetians aspiring to the iurisdiction of all Romania, immediately after the death of Pope Alexander, had sent to Rauenna manie bands of souldiers, with whom, as they made a charge one night vpon the sodaine, and with great furie, vpon the Citie of Cesena, so the people of the place standing valiantly to their defence, by their vertue, vanquished the conspiracies of their enemies, the Venetians which went thither without artillerie, hoping more to surprise it then to force it, retyring to the countrey of Rauenna: where they considered diligently all things that might geue them any occasion to make them selues great in that Prouince, which immediatly was presented to them by the discords that were betweene Denys of Nalde and the Faenians, for, it being somewhat intollerable to Denys, that the Faenians should eftswoones returne vnder the gouernment of the house of Manfreda, against whom he was drawne into rebellion at such time as Valentinois assailed that Citie, he called in the Venetians, and put into their hands the Castles of the vale of Lamona which he had in keeping, And the better to further their practises, the Venetians a litle after put a band of three hundred footmen within the Castle of Faenza, being brought in by the Castle-keeper, whom they had seduced by their corruptions. They occupied in like sort, and in the same time, the borough of Forlimpoplo, with manie other boroughs of Romania, and sent one part of their men of warre, to take the citie of Fava, but the people held out constantly for the Church, holding it more honorable to abide perill, then corrupt their allegiance. They were also brought into Rimini by the consent of the people, couenanting beforehand with Pandolfe Malatesta to giue him in recompence the towne of Citadella in the territories of Padua, and a yearely pension, with a perpetuall estate of a company of men at armes. They returned afterwards in great diligence to besiege Faenza, for that the townesmen nothing amazed with the losse of the Castle for the incommoditie of his seate and separation from the Citie by a deepe trench, made valiant resistance, both for the affection they bare to the familie of Manfreda, and also for a grudge they had that the inhabitants of the vale of Lamona, had promised Manfreda the imperie of Faenza: they esteemed like their proper aduersities, so that they might obserue the full office of fidelitie to the familie of Manfreda their true & auncient Lord. But of themselves being vnable to make defence sufficient, for that Christopher Moore commander of the Venetians had approached his artillerie to the town, & occupied al the places of importance in the coutry, they praied succors of the new Pope Iulio, to whom such a manner of audacitie was not a litle disagreeable. But being newly ascende to that supreme ſcate without force, without mony & without hope to be ayded by either of the kings of France or Spayne, for that both they were trauelled with thoughts of far greater importance, & ſo that he denied to be confederat with either of them: he was without meane of comfort in this calamitie, but through the authority of the name Pontificall. And to proue what reuerence the Venetians bare to it, together with what regard they remembred the amities which long time before he had borne to that common weale: he ſent to Venice the Biſhop of Tiuoli, to complaine that Faenza being a Citie immediatly appertaining to the Church, they would not forbear to do ſo great a diſhonour to a Pope, who afore he was raiſed to that Soueraigne creation, as he honoured their common weale with a ſpeciall affection, ſo now ſtanding in a greater fortune, they might hope for right ample fruits of his frienſhip ſo aunciently borne. It may be there wanted not in the Senat thoſe ſorts of men which aforetime had diſſwaded not to entangle their eſtate with the matters of Piſa, and that they ſhould not receiue in pawne the ports of the Realme of Naples, nor make partition with the French king of the Duchy of Millan: it may be that in the wiſedomes of theſe men appeared the conſideration of euils that might happen, and how, by making themſelues dayly more and more ſuſpected and hated, they might in this action adde to other hatreds the ill will of the Pope. But ambitious counſels hauing bin fauoured with ſo happie ſucceſſe, and therefore all their failles being hoyle in a wind ſo happie of fortune, the opinions of thoſe that perſwaded the contrarie were not heard. And therefore (almoſt with a generall conſent) it was aunſwered to the Popes Embaſſador: that the ſtate of Venice had alwayes greatly deſired that the Cardinall S. Petrus de vincula ſhould come to be Pope, and as he had now obtained it, not by corruption, but by his proper vertue and merits, ſo they hoped that the ſame inclination which in his meaner fortune induced him to embrace and loue them, would ſtill go on working with confirmation of offices and amities, as for their parts, he ſhould not doubt, but they would follow him with better reſpects being Pope, then they had done whileſt he was in the eſtate and perſon of a Cardinall: But as touching the point of imputation, they knew not wherein they had offended his dignity, embracing the occaſion which was offered to them to haue Faenza: for that that City was not onely not poſſeſſed by the Church, but alſo the Church made a willing deprivation of all her rights, in transferring ſo amply & in plaine Conſiſtory the iuriſdiction to the Duke Valentinois: That he would remember that afore that graunt, the Popes (within no memorie of man) had euer poſſeſſed Faenza, but from time to time had giuen it to new Vicars, without acknowledging other ſuperioritie then the tribute, which they offered to pay readily when it ſhould be required: That the Fauentins had no deſire to be the ſubiects of the Church, but abhorring ſuch nomination, they had reuerenced the name of the Duke Valentinois, with all thoſe offices and obſeruances that were in them: And that now hauing no more hope in him, they were runne headlong to call in the baſtards of the houſe of Manfreda: Laſtly, they beſought him, that being in the authority of Pope, he would hold them in the ſame eſtate of frienſhip, which he thought them worthie of, when he had but the perſon of a Cardinall, not ſuffering light occaſions to remoue that graue and ſetled liking which he had ſo long time had of them, more by his proper inclination, then by any their deſeruings. After the Pope was certified of the will of the Venetians, he had ſent into Romania the Duke Valentinois, whom he had embraced with many demonſtrations of honour aſſoone as he was Pope, and in token of amitie lodged him in the pallace Pontificall. Hauing that he feared, leaſt his going, in the beginning agreeable enough to the people, ſhould not be then very hatefull, ſeeing they were already all drawne into rebellion againſt him. Touching the condition of the Fauentins, there was no more remaining to them, but to haue recourſe to the Florentins, who diſcontented that a City of ſo neare neighborhood ſhould fall into the power of the Venetians, had ſent to their ſuccors in the beginning 200 footme, entertaining them with hopes ſtill to refurniſh them, to the end to hold them in courage till the Pope were at oportunitie to ſuccour them: But ſeeing by many apparances that the Pope had no diſpoſition to take armes, & that the authoritie of the French king (warning the Venetians in the beginning not to moleſt the eſtates of the Duke Valentinois) was not ſufficient to withdraw them: And laſtly, eſteeming it no pollicy to enter alone into a warre with ſo mightie enemies, they forbore to reſcue them with any further ſupply. By which alteration the Fauentins being cut off from all hopes, and the Venetian army (incamping at the Church of the Obſeruants) hauing begunne to plaie with their artillerie againſt the walles of their Citie, being vnhappy also in this, that their intelligences were discovered, and certaine of them taken who had conspired to put the Venetians into the towne: they yielded vp their City into their hands, the Venetians agreeing to giue to Affar a certaine pensio (albeit but litle) for the releefe of his life. After the taking of Faenza, the Venetians might with the same facilitie and fortune haue commanded Imola and Furly: but not to aggrauate the indignation of the Pope, who murmured not a litle, they sent their me into garrison, determining for that time to passe no further, hauing occupied in Romagna, besides Faenza and Rimini with their countries, Montefiora, Saint Archangeo Verrucque, Gaterre, Sauignano, and Meldole the haue of the countrey of Cesena, and in the territorie of Imola, Tosignana, Solaruola, and Montataile. Valentinois held only in Romagna the Castels of Furly, of Cesena, of Forlimpople, and of Bertinoire. All which (albeit he had great desire to go into Romagna, to the end they were not vsurped by the Venetians) he had easily consented to put into the Popes keeping, with bond to receiue them of him againe at such time as they should be assured, had it not bin that the Pope (his auncient integrity being not yet overcome with desire to beare rule) refused the offer, saying, he wold not willingly accept occasiōs that might any way allure him to corrupt his faith. At last to oppose in some sort against the proceedings of the Venetians, with whom he was not a litle discontented for the danger of the estate Ecclesiastike, hauing also a desire that Valentinois should depart from Rome, he accorded with Valentinois that he should go to Spessa by sea, and from thence by land to Ferrara, and so to Imola, where should be restored to him an hundred men at armes, and fifty light horsemen, which yet followed his Ensignes (interposing in this conuentiō not only the name of the Pope, but also the name of the colledge of Cardinals.) With this resolution Valentinois, being gone to Ostia to be embarked, the Pope was suddenly repented that he had not accepted the Castels; & hauing now a speciall desire to haue them (not respecting the meanes) and to keepe them to himselfe, he sent after the Cardinals of Volterre and Sorrente to perswade him, that to preuent that those places shold not fall into the hands of the Venetians, he would be content to deliuer the vp into the Popes keeping, vnder the same promise that had bin treated vpon at Rome: so soone do mens minds alter, when ambition hath once possessed the spirits, and made way to greedy desire, which in matters of profit holds nothing respected. Valentinois taking aduantage of the Popes incertainty, denied now to do that which earst he was well contented, and the Pope rising with the occasion into indignity, caused him to be arrested in the Gallies wherein he was embarked, and in decent sort to be led to Magliana, from whence (all the Court and communality of Rome reioycing for the apprehension of his person) he was led to the Vatican, and honoured, but not without especiall and good gards: the reason was, that the Pope fearing lest the Castel keepers despairing of his safety, wold not sell the Castels to the Venetians, sought to make him tractable by easie meanes, and so to haue them by his consent and will. Thus the power of Duke Valentinois, rising (as it were suddenly to his Soueraigntie and height, tooke end with a ruine more sudden: and as the meanes by the which he aspired to his greatnesse had more resemblance with cruelty and deceits, then that the armes and power of the Church did aduance him: so, by a due sentence of iustice he experienced in himselfe part of the artes and trunperies wherewith his father and he had vexed many seuerall personages. He was like to the tree that groweth, till he come to his height, and then is plucked vp from the roote in a moment. The heauie stone commonly ouerwhelmeth himselfe with his owne weight. Who doth couet the fruite, and not considereth the height of the tree whereon it groweth, let him take heede, that whilest he laboureth to climbe to the top, he fall not with the bowes which he doth embrace. It is hard for men ambitious to hold fast their fortune, for she is slippery and cannot be kept against her will: and therefore to men that study to follow the streame, it is good to put a bridle to their felicity, so shall they the better gouerne it. It is an office in wise men to consider alwayes their owne estate, where the vaine ambitious man liueth; for the most part in the remembrance of those things which make him to forget himselfe. The souldiers and followers of the Duke had almost no better fortune, who being drawne into the countrey of Perouza, with hope to obtaine safe conduct of the Florentins and others (being chased by the regiments of Utelli) they were constrained for their safety to retire vpon the lands of the Florentins: where, being dispersed betweene Castilion and Cortona, and reduced to foure hundred horsemen, with a very slender strength of footmen, they were stripped by the appointment of the Florentins, and Dom Michael their leader taken prisoner: him they deliuered afterwards to the Pope, who demaunded him with an importunity well expressing the hates he bare to all the old seruants of the late Pope Alexander. And albeit this man had bene a faithfull minister and executer of all the wishes of Valentino, yet after the Pope had spent some conference with him, he turned his cruelty into compassion, following his naturall inclination, which was to be easie to pardon those vpon whom he had power to execute his anger. About this time the Cardinall Amboise departed from Rome to retorne into France, hauing obtained of the Pope, more for feare then for good will, a confirmation of the legation of that Realme: but the Cardinall Ascanius followed him not, notwithstanding at his coming out of France he promised the king by oath, that he would retorne: of which oath he had procured secret absolution of the Pope afore, not remembering that amongst men there can be no greater bond then an oath; and who loseth his faith hath no more to lose, seeing we acknowledge religion to consist in faith it selfe. But the example of the Cardinall Ascanius (coming at the credulity of the Cardinall Amboise, could not make the French Cardinall better aduised in the actiō with Pandolfe Petrucci, who receiuing the Cardinall at Sienna with many honours, and making insinuation into his good fauours with deepe subtleties and counsels full of art, promising to cause Mont Pulcian to be redred to the Florentines, ouercame him so much, that at his retorne into France he assured the king that he had not found in Italy a man of better spirit, and wrought that his Maiesty gaue sufferance to his sonne to retorne to Sienna, remaining at that time in the Court of France for the assurance of his fathers promises. These were the mutations that hapned in Italy by the death of the Pope.

But in these times, the enterprises begua with greater hopes on the other side the Mounts by the French king, were brought into many difficulties: for the army sent vpon the frontier of Gascogne, no lesse for want of money then lacke of good gournment in those that had the charge, was broken with a speede quicker then they could march thither. The Gallies also, which had runne all along the Spanish seas, were retired to the port of Marseillas: and the army leauied for Parpignan, of the which the king promised much being well furnished of all things necessary, was incamped before Saulses, which is a strong place neare to Narbona, standing at the foote of the hills Pirenei in the countrey of Rossillon. But being well defended, it made a wonderfull resistance: and albeit it was furiously assaulted by the Frenchmen, vsing both the seruice of artilleries, and the art of vnderminings, yet the vertue of the defendants kept it from spoyle and ruine. There assembled an army of all the Spanish Realmes at Parpignan, which the king did honour with the presence of his person to the end to succour it: and being ioyned to this army (by reason the French were discamped) the regiments that had bin sent to defend the frontiers of Fontarabie, &c. all these forces being drawne into one strength, and marching to giue battell to the French army, the Captaines seeing no reason to contend against fortune, retired with the Campe towards Narbona; after they had liyn afore Saulses about forty dayes. The Spaniards losing no benefite of the time and occasion, made incursions vpon the territories of the French king, where hauing taken certaine places of meane importance (the French making no resistance, for that they were withdrawne into Narbona) they esloones returned vpon their owne frontiers by the commandement of their king; who, hauing obtained the true end of him that is assailed, entertained, but with ill will the warre on the other side the Mounts, seeing albeit his Realmes and Prouinces were sufficient mightie to defend him from the French king, yet he held them farre too weak, to offend him: A consideration of great importance to him that entred into a warre, to forsee, with a better counsell how he may defend himselfe then offend his enemy. A litle after (by the interposing of king Federike) they made a truce for fiue moneths, comprehending onely those things that concerned the affaires on the other side the Mounts: for that the Spanish king, assuring Federike that he would consent that the Realme of Naples should be restored to him, and Federike expecting no lesse of the French king, the rather at the contemplation of the Queene inclined to compassion, had introduced betweene them the practises of peace. In which negotiation the Spanish Embassadors (the warre continuing still in Italy) went into France, where they gouerned their doings with such art, that Federike namely perswaded himselfe that the difficulty of his restitution, which the Barons of the faction of Anjou impugned vehemently, would be principally on the French Kings side.

Thus all the warres betweene both the kings being reduced onely into the kingdome of Naples, the eyes and thoughts of all men were turned thither: for that the Frenchmen hauing passed from Rome by the lands of Valmontano and the Colannois (where they found an easie consent to refresh them with victuals) marched by the fields of the Church towards S. Germain, a place where Consaluo (leaving Garrison in the Castell of Secqua and Montcassin) was encamped, not with intention to hazard fortune, but to be an impediment that they passed no further, which by the strength and opportunity of the place, he hoped to do easily. The Frenchmen being arrived at Pontcorue, and at Ceperana, the Marquis of Salusse, with such as were within Caistia, joined to them, having afore by the occasion of discamping of Consaluo, recovered the Duchie of Tracetta, & the Countrey of Fonery, even to the floud of Garillon. The first thing that the French army did, was to assay to get the Caistel of Secqua, from the which after they had in vaine giue one assault they brake off & leauied their siege. But for that actiō they brought vpon theselues so much cōtempt & imputatiō, that it was publikely affirmed in the Spanish army, that that day the Realme of Naples was assured against the Frenchmē, who ioyning feare of their fortune, & distrustful for that respect to chase their enemy towards S. Germain, determined to returne by the coast fi-holding that way suspected in their retiring wherein they found confidence and fauour in marching on. After they had reposed two dayes within Aquin, which they had taken, and left seuen hundred footemen within the Castell Guillanue, they returned by Pontcorue, and marched by the way of Fondy, to lodge at a towne set vpon the way of the Riuer of Garillon, where (antiquitie holds) that the auncient City of Nimurno was builded: a place not only conuenient to cast a bridge, and passe the Riuer, as was their intention, but also a great importunitie to encampe there if they should haue bene constrained: for they had Caetta and their Nauy at sea at their backes, and Tracetta, Itrie, Fondy, with all the circuite of the countrey to the Riuer of Garillon stood firme in their deuotion. It was thought that the French army passing the Riuer, was a thing of great consequence for the victory: for that Consaluo being so farre inferior in forces that he durst not appeare in playne field, the French might march without impediment even to the walles of Naples, whither also their Nauie at sea might haue approached, hauing nothing to let them, if their vertue had but answered the opportunity. And for that cause Consaluo issuing out of Saint Germain, was come on the other part of Garillon, to let with all his strength the passing of the French, affying much in the disaduantage and difficulties which armies find to passe Riuers that haue no fords, specially when the enemy is opposed against them. But it often hapneth that thigs in execution fall out otherwise then they appeared in the first imagination, and as often it chaunceth (practise being farre aboute the opinion of things) that that which at first was esteemed hard, brought forth an action most easie, as of the contrary, most hardnesse was often found in those things wherein coniecture and supposition made most facility. For, the French notwithstanding the furious resistance and impediments of the Spanish, after they had cast the bridge, won the way of the Riuer by force of artillery, planted partly vpon the banke where they encamped, which was somewhat higher then the banke on the one side, and partly vpon barkes which they had caused to be brought from the Nauie at sea, and drawne vp against the streame of the Riuer. But the day after as they began to make an enterprise to passe, the Spaniards opposed against them, and charging with an incredible resolution vpon such as were already passed, they repulsed them even to the middest of the bridge, and had followed them further, if the furie of the artillerie had not compelled them to retire. In this encounter died on the French side the Lieutenant of the Baylife of Dion, and of the Spaniards was slayne Fabio Sonne to Pawle Ursin, a young man amongst the Italians of great expectation. It is sayd, that if when the French men began to passe, they had aduanced forward with the same courage they entred into the enterprise, they had that day remained maisters of the field & the victory: but whilest they proceeded slowly, and with demonstration of timorousnesse, they did not onely lose the occasion of the victory of the day, but they diminished greatly all hope in time to come, the fortune of the warre declining with the opportunity which they had lost. From that day all things tooke with them very ill successe, for that amongst the files of the army was rather confusion then concord, and (according to the custome of the French Iouldiers with the Italian Captaines) very litle obedience to the Marquis of Mantua the kings Lieutenant. In so much as, either for that occasion, or in respect of his disease (being sicke in deede) or for that by other experiences in that seruice, he had lost all hope of the victory, he went from the army, leauing an opinion to the French king, that his loyalty was greater then his courage, & that his vertue was of other faculty then to gouerne an army. After the the Marquis had thus giuen vp his charge, the Marquis of Salusse, the Baylife of Cden & Monsieur Sandricourt chiefe commanders in the French army; hauing first raised at the head of the bridge beyond the Riuer a Rampier with cariages, erected a bastion capable of many men, by whose protection they were defended from their enemies in passing the bridge. But they were let to passe further by other difficulties; hapning partly through their proper negligence, but more by the vertue and patience of their enemies, but most of all by the malice of their fortune, with whom nothing is more familiar then to deceiue the confidence and expectation of men: for, Consaluo, who studied to hinder them more with the occasion of the winter, and situation of the countrey, then with his army and forces, was encamped at Cintura, a place seated on high, and remoued from the Riuer somewhat more then a mile, about the which the bands of footemen and horsemen were lodged with a great incommodity, for that the place of his owne condition being solitary, and not much releued with cottages or cabinets of hearthsme, they had almost no other couert then the skie, the ground also as well for the lownes of the plaine, as for that the season and weather was rainie, being full of water and mire: a necessity which driue those souldiers that had no meane to encampe in places more firme and high, to planke and couer the place of the ground where they laye with mattes and other things materiall to defend the moistnesse of the earth. In regard of these difficulties, & for that the army was ill paid, the French withal hauing wholly won the passage of the riuer, certaine Captains were of opinion to retire the army to Capua, both to the end to releue the intollerable sufferance of the souldiers, and to take themselves out of that continuall expectation of daunger, their numbers being farre inferiour to their enemies: It often hapneth that when extremities and perill be at hand, confidence is turned into feare, and when the counsels of men are not constant, they cannot but wauer in resolution, their vertue hauing taken another habite by the consideration of the daunger they see afore them. But that pusillanimitie of the Captaines was resolutely reiected of Consaluo with this aunswere worthe the greatnesse of his heart: In many cases (sayth he) vaine feares are farre more hurtfull then hastie confidence or credulity, a common disposition in the nature of man, making him to esteeme more then needeth those daungers that be nearest at hand, and hold lesse reckening then he ought of perils furthest off and to come: but concerning the present case, as glory springs not of dignity nor of honour (for that they are the goods of fortune) but of vertue, which is the riches of the mind & gift of the goodnesse of God: so for my part I desire rather to be presently buried ten foote deepe in the ground whereon we stand, then by giuing back one foot to prolong my life an hundred yeares: fortune oftentimes makes many men more apt to win glory, then able to keepe it, but occasion & oportunitie seeme to offer vs that estate of perpetuall honor and reputation, which our owne vertue denieth vs to be worthy of. And so resisting all difficulties with an incredible constancie, and fortifying himselfe with a deepe trench, and with bastions which he caused to make in the front of the Campe, he prepared to defend him against the French, standing against him: who, notwithstanding the protection of their bastillion which they had builded, remoued nothing at all, for that the countrey being all ouerflowne with the raines and waters of the Riuer) this place is called by Lynie for the neighbourhood of Sessa, aqua sinuessana, and perhaps they are the lakes of Minturna (wherein C. Marcius hid himselfe flying before Sylla) they could not passe further, but through a strait which was all waterish and full of a deepe quagmyre. And perhaps there was daunger to be charged in the flanke of the footebands of the Spanish lightly armed, which lay encamped very neare the strait: the winter also by aduenture inclining to cold and sharpnesse, brought forth more continuall multitudes of snowes and raynes, then had vsed to fall in those regions. Wherein it seemed that fortune and the elements aboue had conspired against the French, who staying there, did not only waste the time vnprofitably, but also they receiued by that abode (by reason of their naturall disposition) almost the like harmes which mens bodies requie by a poyson that worketh slowly: for, albeir they were lodged with lesse discomforties then the Spanish, and that by the meane of the reliques of an auncient Theater, whereunto they had ioyned many other shrowds & couers, besides the fauour of certaine old houses neare to them: & for that the circumference or skirts of the tower somewhat higher then the plaine of Sessa, were lesse offended with waters: and lastly, that most part of their horsemen were lodged within Tracetta, and other places affronting: yet the bodies of the Frenchmen and Swissers, not bearing so naturall resistance against long travels and perplexities, as do the bodies of the Spaniards, they gave manifest tokens of the diminution of their late valour and fury. Besides, the covetousness of the officers and treasurers, to whose office belong the paying of the souldiers, encreased much those difficulties: for that they preferring their particular profit afore the common provision of the whole, and forgetting no degrees of delay or illusion, they suffered to diminish the numbers of the souldiers, and were negligent to furnish the Campe with victuals as appertained: by reason whereof diseases fell vpon the army, and many of the Italian companies went away discontented. These disorders were made greater by the discord of the Captaines, through whose fault there was neither order nor obedience, and in an army there can be no expectation of the exercise of discipline, where is no certainty of pay made. Thus the Frenchmen being restrained by the sharpenesse of the winter, remained idle vpon the shoares of Garillan, no other thing being done either by the enemy or by them, but certain light skirmishings which were of no importace, & yet the Spanish seemed alwaies to cary the better fortune. About the same time also the footbands which the French left in garrison within the Castell Guillaume, not able to endure the continuall braueries of the garrisons of the Castell of Sacqua, and other peeces thereabouts commaunded by the Spanish, abandoned the places of their charge, and pretending to come to the army, were charged by the way and broken, wherein seeking to auoyde the danger they feared most, they light vpon the perill they distrusted least, being only abused in the opinion and intention of their safety. But things hauing had continuance in this estate many dayes, Bart. Aluiano, with certaine of the Vrsins and their regiments, arriued in the Spanish army, by whose coming Consaluo thought himselfe so strongly refurnished, hauing in his army nine hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and nine thousand Spanish footmen, that he began to thinke that now he was no more to study to defend himselfe, but to offend his enemy, whereunto he was so much the more encouraged, by how much he was well aduertised that the French (stronger in horsemen then in footmen) were dispersed in such separation and distance, that their lodgings held little lesse then ten miles of the countrey, in so much as neare the Towre of Garillan, there were onely the Marquis of Salusse Viceroy, and other principall Captaines, with the lesser part of the army, which diminished continually by the aggravation of diseases, of the which many died, and amongst others the Baylife of Caen. For this cause, hauing determined to assay to passe secretly the Riuer (in the good succeeding of which he doubted nothing of the victory) he recommended to Aluiano (the author as some thinke of that counsell) the charge to make secretly a bridge. By his direction there was made a bridge of barkes and vessels within a Creeke neare to Sessa, which he caused to be brought by night to Garillan, and to be cast at the passage of Suya, foure miles about the bridge of the Frenchmen, where they made no guard. As soone as this bridge was cast (being the xxvij. day of December in the night) all the army passed together with the person of Consaluo, who lodged the same night in the towne of Suya neare the Riuer, which was occupied by those that passed the first. The morning following which was on a Fryday (a day happy for the Spaniards) Consaluo hauing ordered that the rearegard lodged betweene the Castell of Montdragon and Cariuola, foure miles below the bridge of the French, should go and charge their bridge, he prepared himselfe with the vauntguard led by Aluiano, and with the battell which passed with himselfe, to follow the Frenchmen: who receiuing aduertisement the same night that the Spaniards had cast a bridge & began to passe, entred into a generall feare, which so much the more drew them into astonishment, by how much this accident and boldnesse of the enemy had exceeded their expectation, and hauing themselves determined to attempt nothing till the time were more gracious and fauourable, they nourished also a coniecture that the enemy stood retained with the same negligence and slouthfulness, construing things by opinion only, without respecting the oportunitie, which being overslipt of them, proued fauorable to the enemy. Therefore albeit the Viceroy (to who were resorted many bands both from Tracetti and the places about) pushed forward more with feare then with settled counsell (as often hapneth in sudden aduentures) had sent towards Suya to stop their passage, Monsieur d'Alegre, with certaine regiments of footmen and horsemen: yet finding that their deuise was too long protracted, & that feare ouerruled all discourses & considerations, they leuied their Campe suddenly, & about midnight with a hast contrary to the valour of men resolute, they brake vp from the Towre of Garillan, leauing abandoned the most part of their munitions and nine great peeces of artillery, together with great numbers of their souldiers with bodies wounded wounded and full of sicknesse. Such a thing is feare, that it makes men forgetfull aboute shame & all other obseruances, and when the calamitie is generall, it leaues euerie one to his fortune, impression for the most part amazing more then the perill it selfe: They tooke the way towards Caietta, whether they thought to retire: but Consaluo, who would omit no oportunitie wherein occasion was offered, as soone as he knew they were discamped, followed them with his armie, sending afore Prosper Colonne with his light horsmen to vndertake the skirmish, to the end their march might be more slowe. And notwithstanding the flight was entertained by the horsmen, yet the French forbore not still to keepe on their way, being notwithstanding compelled to stay often times for feare to fall in disorder at the bridges and hard passages, from whence, after they had supported the skirmish a certaine space, they retired still, receiuing alwayes some hurt. The order they vsed was this, the artillerie marched afore, the footbands followed after, and then the horsmen, of whom, such as were most behind continued the fight with the enemy. The Frenchmen being in this sort aduanced, after certaine pauses and light skirmishes, as far as the bridge which is before Caietta, necessitie compelled the Viceroy to cause to stay there one part of his men at armes, to giue leasure to the artilleries to passe before: but they being not able to march with that speed which was necessary to their safety, the copanies of the enemies beginning already to meddle with them, there was begun in that place a great and hot skirmish, for that the rereguard of the Spaniards came immediately after, who hauing passed the riuer without resistance, euen with those barks of the bridge which had bene broken by the Frenchmen, went towards Caietta by the right way, Consaluo marching alwayes on the wing with the residue of the armie. The fight was violent at the bridge of Mola for a certaine time, the French maintaining themselves principally by the aduantage of the place, but with feares farre greater then their valours: and the Spanish ioyning furie to their fortune, fought with the same felicitie which follow those men that suppose themselves to be already in the possession of the victorie. At last the Frenchmen to whose disability began to succeed a feare, least part of the regiments which Consaluo had sent by the coast for that effect, would cut off their way, began to retire in disorder, & being continually followed by their enemies, when they came to the head of two wayes, the one leading to Tiry, and the other to Caietta, they fell into generall and manifest flying, manie remaining slaine, as Barnardo Adorna Lieutenant of fiftie Launces: many were taken prisoners, and the artilleries abandoned, with all the horses appointed for the seruice of the same; and touching the residue which fled towards Caietta, they were victoriously chased euen to the gates of the Citie. At the same time Fabrizio Colonne, sent by Consaluo (after he had passed the riuer with five hundred horse and a thousand footmen, neare to Pontcoruo) and being fauored of most part of the villages and countrey-men, stripped the regiments of Lodowyk de la Mirandola, and Alexander de Triunco; besides, there were manie of the armie, who being lodged at Fondy, Tiry, and other places thereabouts, and hearing that the Spanish had cast the bridge, went not to the armie at the towre of Garillan, but for their safetie dispersed into diuerse places, were taken and stripped by the countrey. But Peter de Medicis who also followed the French campe, with certaine other Gentlemen, had a greater misfortune: for when the armie brake vp from before Garillan, being mounted vpon a barke with foure peeces of artillerie, to go to Caietta, their barke sunke, as well for that they had overcharged her, as that the winds were contrarie to the mouth of the riuer: they were all drowned: a destinie lamẽtable, considering the qualitie of the persons, with the maner of their dying. Wherin though many vainly dispute that fortune led them to so miserable an accident, yet if we will lift vp our considerations to God, we shall find that hee hath reserued such a prerogative ouer all things which he hath created, that to him onely belongs the authoritie to dispose all things by the same power wherewith he hath created them of nothing. The night following, Consaluo with the armie lodged at Castellon and Mola, and appearing the next day before Caietta, whither were retired the French Captaines, together with the Princes of Salerno and Bisignan, he occupied immediately the suburbs and the mount, which the French had abandoned. And albeit Caietta was sufficiently manned with multitudes of souldiers, and no lesse prouision of victuals, besides the conueniencie of the place to be succoured by the armie at sea: yet yeelding to the consideration of their perils, which were more in impression then in deed, they lost courage, and inclined with manifest consent to parley, being not disposed to endure the perplexitie of expectation of succours that were incertaine. They sent out the Baylife of Dyon and S. Colombo with Theodore de Triunfo, who in the mouth of all the residue accorded the first day of the yeare 1504. to giue vp to Consaluo, Caietan with the castle, vnder condition of free power to go out of the realme of Naples with their goods, either by land or sea, and that M. d. Aubigny and the other prisoners should be redeliuered both of the one and other party. But this capitulation was not so clearly set downe, that Consaluo tooke not occasion to dispute, that by the vertue of the covenants, the Barons of the kingdome could challenge no libertie or deliuerie from imprisonment. This was the chafe that was giuen to the French armie neare to the riuer of Garillan, being encamped vpon the shores or banks thereof about fiftie dayes: an ouerthrow hapning to the noble through their owne disorders, then by the vertue of their enemies; & so much the more worthy of commemoration and memorie, by how much followed (as it were by succession of calamitie) the absolute losse of so noble and mighty a kingdome, together with the confirmation of the empire of the Spanish: it nourisheth also matter more worthy of monument, for that the French entring with a far greater strength then the enemy, and no lesse plenty of all prouisions both by land and sea necessarie to the warre, they were vanquished with a facilitie farre contrarie to the course of victories, and without blood or danger of the conquerers. But the thing that was no lesse lamentable in this accident then all the residue, was, that albeit there died very few of the French by the sword of the enemy, yet the number was small that was reserued of so great an armie: for that of the regiments of footmen which escaped by flying, and of those also that came from Caietta after the accord, there died many troupes by the wayes, as well the sharp violence of the cold, as the rigour of sicknesse, seruing to the execution of those miserable bodies, whom fortune spared from the slaughters of the warres: and of such whose strength with great paine was able to carie them to Rome, part came starued with the hardnesse of the weather, and some through feeblenesse languished, lingring yet to abide with greater paines their latter times: of this sort many died in hospitals both of hunger and colde, the streets and high wayes being lamentable testimonies of their calamities, and the ditches and other places vile and vnworthy, seruing as sepulchers to those bodies, whose mindes not long since supposed them inuincible against all aduersitie of warre. And whether in comparison of causes and reasons, we may referre the motions of these calamities either to destinie enuying the French, and no lesse contrarie, to the nobilitie then to bodies of inferiour condition: or to the diseases which fell vpon them, by the discomforts they suffred about Garillan, many euen of those who departing from Caietta (where they left the most part of their horses) imbarcked themselues to passe by sea, and either perished by the wayes, or at least being reserued till they came into Fraunce, died in the sight of their friends, of whom they thought to receiue consolation. Amongst these were the Marquise of Salusse, Sandricourt, and the Baylife of the Mountaines, with many other Gentlemen of marke, in whom the maner of their death was no lesse lamentable then their fortune: ouer and besides, that which by imputation may be imposed vpon the French Captaines for their disagreement & negligent gouernment, as also that that may be obiected to the iniurie of the time, that neither the French nor Swissers are not coparatiue with the Spaniards, either with resolution of mind to temporise or expect, or with their bodies to sustaine the trauels and incommodities that a warre draweth with it. There are principally considered two things which hindered the French king, that he remained not victorious: the one was, the long abode that the armie made vpon the territories of Rome for the Popes death, the same being the cause that winter came vpon them, and that the Vrsins were practised withall by Consaluo afore they could enter into the kingdome: where, if they could haue made their entrie whilst the time was tollerable, Consaluo far inferiour to them in forces, and not fauoured with the oportunitie & rigour of the time, had bene constrained to abandon the greatest part of the kingdome, and to seeke out the strong places for his succour, or else suffer the authoritie of an enemy farre more mightie then himselfe. The other consideration was, the couetousnesse of the officers and treasurers, who, beguiling the king in the payes of the souldiers, and lesse trustie in the prouision of victuals and furniments for the seruice, made their thefts and negligences the principall cause of the diminution of that armie, since the king had expressed such a prouision and care for all things necessarie, that it is certaine by good credible testimonie, that at the unhappie time when the Frenchmen were ouerthrowne, there were within Rome by the kings direction, great quantities of siluer and other reliefes for warre. But so violent was the destinie that ran to the desolation and ruine of that armie, that albeit at the last, last, after many complaints of the Captaines and the whole multitude of souldiers, there was leaued an abundant prouision of victuals, yet they suffered such a penurie and scarcitie in the beginning that that disorder ioyned to the other discommodities, was the breeder of infinite disca-ses, of the absenting of many, of the murmuring of many, and that many seeing their fidelity could find no refuge in the armie, sought their safety in places thereabout; matters which in the end brought forth the absolute ruine of so braue an armie: for, as for the nourishing of the bodie, it is not enough that the head be well disposed, but it is also necessarie that the other members do their office: euen so it sufficeth not that the Prince do his dutie, if withall, the diligence & vertue which ought to be in his ministers haue not equall action, the one being necessarie to the other, as the direction of the head and braine of a man auayleth little without the execution of the other inferior members, to whom such ministrations is appointed.

The selfe same yeare, wherein so great mutations hapned in Italy, was made a peace between the Turke Baiazet Ottoman, and the Venetians, which both parties imbraced with great affection: for the Turke, in whom was expressed a spirit of meeknesse and disposed to learning and study of the Scriptures of his religion, had, by the working of his owne inclination, a nature farre estranged from armes: by reason whereof, notwithstanding he had begun the warre with great preparations both by sea and land, and occupied in Morea the two former yeares Naupacto now called Lepanto, Modono, Corono and Innquo, yet he followed not, nor continued the warres with so great affection, being withdrawne either by the desire he had to tranquillity and rest, or at least by a suspicion of his proper danger, least for religion sake the Princes of Christendome should drawe into conspiracie against him: for, both Pope Alexander had sent certaine Gallies to the succours of the Venetians, and with money had also stirred vp Launcelot king of Bohemia and Hungaria to make warre vpon the Turkes frontiers, the French and Spanish kings sending (but not at one time) their seuerall armies to ioine with the power of the Venetians. But this peace was embraced by the state of Venice with a greater desire, for that by the iniquitie of the warres, and that to the common detriment of the Citie, and particular losse to euerie one in priuate, the traffique of marchandise which they made in diuerse regions of the Leuant was discontinued: the City also of Venice, which euery yeare was wont to haue from certaine prouinces of the Turkes, certaine quantities of corne, did suffer manie necessities for the deprivation of that reliefe. And lastly, where they had wont to amplifie their iurisdiction by the warres which they haue managed with other Princes, they feared nothing so much as the power of the Turkes, of whom they had bene alwayes beaten as often as they had had warres together: for, Amurathes, grandfather to Baiazet, had occupied the towne of Thessalonica (now called Salonica) parcell of the dominions of Venice: & after him Mahomet his father, maintaining continuall war against them for sixteene yeares tooke from the Ile of Negropoto, a great part of Peloponneso, now named Morea Scutaro, with manie other townes in Macedonia and Albania: In so much as both for that they supported the warre against the Turkes with right great difficulties and expences, hauing no hope to breed any profite by them; and also, by how much they doubted at the same time to be distressed by inua-sion of other Christian Princes, (the time being full of conspiracies) by so much was it reasonable that they desired to be at tranquillity with the Turkish regions. It was suffered to Baiazet by the conditions of the peace, to retaine still all that he had occupied, and the Venetians reseruing onely the Ile of Cesalonia, anciently called Leucado, were compelled to yeeld to him the propriety of Nerita, now named S. Mavra. But the warre of the Turkes brought not so many displeasures to the Venetians, as they receiued harmes by the king of Portugall, who had taken from them, & appropriated to himselfe the traffike of spices, which the Marchants and ships bringing out of Alexandria (a noble Citie in Egypt) to Venice, they sent dispersed with a wonderful profit through all the prouinces in Christendome. The which alteration being a thing of the most merit and memory of all others that haue hapned in the world since many ages, and, for the harmes which the Citie of Venice receiued by it, hauing some affinity with the matters of Italy, it cannot much alter the estate of our historie to speake somewhat of it at large.

Such men of spirit and science as by deep speculation and contemplation haue considered the wonderfull motions and dispositions of the heauen, and haue left the knowledge thereof recommended to succession and posteritie, haue figured a line running through the round circle of the heauen, from the West to the East, and bearing an equall distance in all parts from the Pole Septentrional.

temrionall and Pole Meridionall, they call it the line Equinoctiall: for that when the sunne is under it, the day and night haue one equalitie. They haue deuicd with imagination the longnesse of this line into three hundred and three score parts, which they call degrees, as the other circuit of the heauen, by the Poles is likewise of three hundred and threescore degrees. After these men had giuen this rule, the Cosmographers measuring and deuicd the earth, haue figured in the earth a line Equinoctiall, which falles perpendicularly vnder the Celestial line figured by the Astrologians, deuicd likewise the same and the circuit of the earth with a line falling perpendicularly vnder the Poles in largenesse of three hundred and threescore degrees: so as from our Pole to the Pole Meridionall, they put a distance of an hundred and fourescore degrees, and from euerie one of the Poles to the line Equinoctiall, fourescore and ten degrees. These haue bene the generall opinions of the Cosmographers: but touching the particular description of the earth habitable, after they had made knowne that part of the earth which is vnder our Hemisphere, they had a perswasion that that part of the earth lying vnder the Zona torrida, figured in the heauen of the Astrologians, and wherein is contained the line Equinoctiall, was, (as being neere the sunne) vnhabitable by reason of his heat: and that from our Hemisphere there was no passage to the lands which are vnder the Zona torrida, nor to those regions, which beyond it are towards the Pole Meridionall, called by the confession of Ptoleme, lands and seas vnknowne. By reason whereof both he and the others presupposed, that whosoever would passe from our Hemisphere to the Sino Arabico and Sino Persico, or to the other parts of India, which first came to the knowledge of men by the victories of the great Alexander, should be constrained to go thither by land, or else coming as neare to it as he could by the sea Mediterrane, should performe the residue of the way by land. But the nauigations of the Portugals haue made known in our time, that those opinions & suppositions were false, for that the marchants pushed on with a desire to gaine, hauing begun many yeares since to coast Africa, and being guided by litle and litle etten to the Iles of Cape Verde (which the Ancients named the Iles of Esperides) which are distant foureteene degrees from the Equinox, drawing towards the Pole Arctike: and being come sithence, in making a long circuit towards the South, to the cape de bonne Esperance, which is a promontorie of Afryke, further distant then any other from the line Equinoctiall, for that his distance containeth xxxviii. degrees. And drawing from thence towards the East, they haue sailed by the Ocean, euen to the Sino Arabico and Sino Persico; in which places the Marchants of Alexandria are wont to buy the spices which grew there in part, but for the most part were brought thither from the Iles Molucque and other parts of India, and are afterward conueyed by land by a way long, and full of incommodities, and with no lesse charges into Alexandria, where they were sold to the Marchants Venerians, and they bringing them from Venice, furnished all Christendome to their great gaines and wealth: for that they only possessing the traffike of the spices, layd on them what rate or price they would, and caried into Alexandria many sorts of marchandise in the ships wherein they brought imbarcked the spices, the same vessels likewise wherein they conueyed that trade of spicerie into France, Flaunders, England, and other places, returning fraughted with other marchandise. But the Portugals going by sea from Lisbone the capitall Citie of the realme, into regions far remoued, and hauing confederation in the Indian sea with the kings of Calicut and other regions neare, they pierced by degrees further, and builded with time fortresses in places conuenient, by whose oportunitie making themselves friendship with certaine cities of the Countries, and reducing others to obedience by their armes and oppression, they haue appropriate to themselves the traffike of the spices, which the marchants of Alexandria were wont to haue afore: & bringing them by sea into Portugall, they distributed them also by sea into the selfe same realmes and countries, where the Venerians at the first had custome and vent for them: Sure this nauigation is right wonderfull, for that it containes a course of eight thousand French leagues, through seas altogether vnknowne, vnder other stars, vnder other firmament, & with other instrumets: for, the line Equinoctiall being passed, they are no more guided by the North star, & stand altogether depriued of the seruice & vse of the Adamant stone, & for that they cannot take harbour in so long a way, but in regions vnknowne, differing in language, in religion, in customes, and altogether barbarous and enemies to strangers. And yet notwithstanding so many difficulties, they haue in time made this nauigation so familiar, that where afore they had wont to consume ten moneths in the voiage, they run it now commonly in lesse then fixe, their daungers being lesse, and all things in more security. But far more maruelous, in the nauigation of the Spaniards, which was begun by Christopher Colombo a Genoway, in the yeare 1490: after he had many times sayled by the Ocean sea, wherein making coniectures by the obseruation of certaine windes of that which afterwards succeeded to him in deed, he obtained certaine vessels of the king and Queene of Spaine, with the which setting his course towards the West, he discovered at thirtie dayes end in the vttermost extremities of our Hemisphere, certaine Ilands altogether vnkowne to men before: regions happie for the situation of the heauen, and for the fertilitie of the land, and withall no lesse blessed (lauiing that certaine people liued vpon man's flesh) by the disposition of the inhabitants, whose maners were simple, and contented with that which the liberalitie of nature brought forth for them: they were not disquieted with passions of couetousnesse and ambition: but most vnhappy, in that the people hauing no certaine religion, no knowledge in learning, no science in negotiations or handie crafts, but wholly without experience of armes, without rule or art of warre, and without science, vse or custome in any thing, be as it were no other then tractable & tame creatures, and a praie mo. leasie to whosoever will assaile them. By meane whereof, the Spaniards being drawne with the facilitie of commanding those Ilands, and with the possibilitie of reuenue and profite, being plentifull of veines for gold, many of the began to inhabite there, as in their proper country. Christopher Colombo passing further, and after him Americo Vesputcio Florentin, and successiuelly many others, haue disclosed other Ilands and great countries of firme land, finding in certaine of the (albeit in the most part the contrarie) as well in their buildings both publike and priuate, as in the forme of their habits and conuersation, a conformity of maners and ciuill comelineffe, but so farre ignorant in the knowledge of armes, that they were a ready praie to the first inuader: and yet the limits of these new countries are so far stretched out, that they farre surmount the inhabitable circuit of the earth come first to the knowledge of man. In these regions the Spanish enlarging themselves with new supplies of people, and with new nauigations, & sometimes labouring the mines of gold and siluer that are in many places, and also in the sands of the riuers, sometimes buying it at easie prices of the inhabitants, or at least taking it from them by robberie and violence, they haue brought infinite quantities into Spaine, many sayling thither at their proper charges and venture, but vnder licence of the king, to whom they retribute the fift part of all that they bring from thence: yea, the Spaniards haue taken such courage in these courses of nauigation, that certaine sayles aduancing three and fiftie degrees towards the Pole Antartike, alwaies along the coasts of the firme land, and afterwards falling into a straight sea, from thence sayling towards the East by a verie large sea, and returning afterwards by the nauigation which the Portugals make, they haue (as appeareth clearly) sayled round about the earth. Which makes me say, that the Portugals and the Spaniards, but specially Colombo, the first finder out of this wonderfull & perillous nauigation, are worthy, whose knowledge, industrie, resolutenesse, study, and trauels, be celebrated with eternall memorie, for that by their vertues, our age and all posterities are made capable of the knowledge of great things, which afore lay hid from the sence and vnderstanding of men: but far greater had bene their merits, if in those paines, in those perils, and in those aduentures, they had not bene induced by the immoderate thirst after gold and riches, but caried by desire to disclose them for the benefite and enlarging of Christian faith: a matter neuertheless hapned consequently, for that the inhabitants in many places haue suffered conuersion to the religion catholike. By these nauigations it is knowne that the ancients were beguiled in many things touching the knowledge of the earth: that there was passage beyond the line Equinoctiall: that there was habitation vnder the Zona torrida: as also (contrarie to their opinion) it is knowne by the nauigation of others, that the Zones next to the Poles were inhabited, vnder the which they assured (hauing regard to the situation of the heauen, so farre remoued from the course of the Sun) that there was no abilitie of dwelling for the extremuch cold. Besides, it is knowne (which some of the ancients beleued, and some rebuked) that vnder our feet be other inhabitants, whom they named Antipodes.

But returning now to the matter of our narratiō of those things which hapned the year 1504, after Caletta was rendred to the Spanish: the newes of the chace of the French neare Garillan, ioyned to so many disorders and aduersities that followed, made sorowfull almost the whole realme of Fraunce, no lesse for the generall multitude of bodies that were slaine, then for the losse offo great a nobilitie. The Court accompanying their teares and weepings with habits of sorrow and mourning, filled all full of heauinesse & affliction, & throughout the realme nothing was heard with more compassion, then the lamentable complainings of men and women, accusing the day wherein the miserable humour of couetousnesse to conquer estates in Italy entered the heart of their kings, to whom, if any thing might satisfie the desires of men, the proprieties and possessions of so many of their owne countries might haue satisfied. In these perplexities the king was not without his proper calamity, and to him so much the more intollerable, by how much in so great a diminution of his authority and reputation, he saw also a deprivation of hope neuer to be able to recouer so noble a realme, his losses farre exceeding the remedie hee could expect. He called to remembrance the braue words which he had so often objected against the king of Spaine, & how vainly he had promised to himself a successe of those huge preparations which he made to invade him on all sides. But that which made him rise most of all into furie and complaint, was the consideration of his plots laid with so great wisdom and expences, that notwithstanding his importunities and diligence in the prouision of his warres so plentifully and liberally furnished, & matching withall with enemies most poore and needy of all things, yet the couetousnesse and robberies of his owne people, had turned his glorie into infamie, and made his losses the more lamentable, by how much he was betrayed by their corruptions. In so much as crying out against heauen and earth, he protested with many othes, that since he was serued with so great a negligence and infidelitie of his owne seruants, he would from henceforth neuer leaue recommended to his Captaines any expedition of warre, and much lesse repose himselfe vpon their assurance, but that in his owne person he would be the fashioner and follower of all enterprises. To these vexations of mind was ioyned this last and chiefe perplexitie, that he saw how much his forces were weakened for the losse of such an armie, for the death of so many braue captaines, and diminution of so flourishing a Nobilitie. All which concurring in one fortune, heaped against him such an aduersitie, that if Maximilian had made any sturre in the duchie of Mullan, or the Spanish armie had past further then their victorie of Naples, he doubted much to be able to defend that estate, speciallie Askanius Sforce ioyning to the one of them, whom the people desired with no litle affection. So dangerous are the illes that are feared by a reuolution of estate, which for the most part drawes with it all those miseries which may be figured in an vtter ruine or desolation. Touching the King of Romaines, no man marueled that he was not wakened in so great oportunitie, for that it was his custome to delay, and to let passe, for the most part, times and occasions. But euery one held a contrarie perswasion of Consaluo, for that all the French faction in Italy had a wonderfull feare, least he, hoping that neither money, nor occasions would faile his victorious armie, would not ioyne himselfe to his fortune to follow the subuersion of the state of Mil-lan, and in his way, to change the affaires of Fuscan: which if he had done, it was beleueed assuredly that the French king, drained of money and appalled in courage, had yeilded to the storme without any resistance, speciallie his people hauing no desire to passe into Italy, and such as remained of the calamitie of Caietta in passing the mounts, hauing despised the commandements of their king presented at Genes: besides, it was clearly discerned that the king, hauing no inclination to armes, was wholly prepared to make peace with Maximilian, and no lesse disposed to continue the negotiations and practises with the king of Spaine, for the solicitation whereof (not communed vpon in the extreame heat of the warre) the Spanish Embassadors had bene & were at that time at the Court: but Consaluo, whom hereafter we will call for the most part the great Captaine, hauing confirmed with so manie glorious victories the surname, that before had bene giuen him by a Spanish brag, refused to imbrace the benefit of so great an occasion: either for that, being altogether without money, & indebted to his armie for manie payes, he saw it impossible to make his people march either vnder hope of profit that was to be won with perill, or in promise of their payes which would belong in coming, his regiments crying either to be satisfied, or to be bestowed in garrison: or else he was tied to proceed according to the will of his king, whose direction it was not lawfull for him to transgresse: or at the least it seemed not to agree with his securitie, to draw his armie out of the kingdome of Naples, till first he had purged it of all his enemies: for that Lewys d'Ar, one of the French Captaines, who, since the journey of Cirignoula had put himselfe within Venousa with such remainders of Frenchmen as were not to be despised, and who, whilst the armies were vpon the shoares of Gatillan, had occupied Troja and and S. Senere, kept also in deuotion all Pomylia: certaine Barons also of the faction of Anion, which were retired vpon their estates, stood to their defence, embracing openly the part of the French king. It was lastly this impediment, that a litle after the victory the Great Captaine fell into a dangerous sickness, which staying his personall expedition, he sent Aluiano with part of his armie to fight vpon Louys d'Arz: by which his necessitie, not able for the present to follow his victory, of the kingdome of Naples, the residue of Italy remained rather in suspition, then in traueil, hanging more in expectation then in action: for the Venetians, according to their custome, stood doubtfull, expecting what would bee the issue of things: the Florentins thought they had won much at a time when they wholly despaired to be succoured by the French king, they were not invaded by the Great Captaine: & the Pope, referring to another time his ambitious thoughts, studied to bring to passe that the Duke Valentinois, who held no more in Romania but the Castles of Furly, of Cesena, and of Bertinoire, (hauing lost Forlimpoppe by corruption of the keeper) might accord to leaue them to him, taking the aduantage of the time, and his imprisonment. Valentinois condescended to giue to the Pope the assignement of the Castle of Cesena, and Dom Petro d'Onedo a Spaniard, being gone thither to receiue it in the Popes name, was hanged by the Castle-keeper, objecting that it could be no lesse dishonour to him to obey his Lord whilest he was a prisoner, then he that presumed to impose that request vpon him deserued to be punished. By this occasion the Pope despairing to reioyce in his desire without the deliuey of Valentinois, he accorded with him (and of this conuention there was a Bull dispatched in the Consistorie for greater surety) that he shod be set in the rocke of Ostia, vnder the absolute power of Bernardin Carnagiall a Spaniard, Cardinall of S. Croce, and he to let him go whesoeuer he had rendered to the Pope the Castles of Cesena and Bertinoire, and transferred to the Pope the assignation of the rocke of Furly, & appointed in the towne of Rome, bankers to answer fifteen thousand duckats in recompence of the expences which the Castle-keeper alleaged he had sustained. But the Pope had another intention, for that albeit he would not apparantly defile and break the faith he had giuen, yet his meaning was to keepe his deliuey in delay, either for feare least he being at libertie, the Castle-keeper of Furly would refuse to render the Rocke, or else for the memorie of the iniuries he had receiued of his father and him, or at least for the hate which euerie one reasonably bare him: So infallible is the lawe of iustice to take reuenge of wrongs, not obseruing the presence of times wherein they are done, but transferring occasions from one season to another, calleth then the iniuries into reckning, whe the offender hath least memorie of the. Valentinois growing into some suspition, that the Pope would not hold faith with him, required secretly the Great Captaine to giue him safeconduct to come to Naples, and withall to send two Gallies to conuey him from Ostia: which request being condescended vnto by Consaluo, the Cardinall of S. Croce holding the same suspition with Valentinois, suffered him to depart without the Popes priuie, being first aduertised, that pledge was put in for the fifteen thousand duckats, with the redeliuerie vp of the Castles of Cesena and Bertinoire. The feare and danger wherein Valentinois was, made him carelesse to attend the Gallies which the Great Captaine should send him, and therefore being still caried with those impressions, he went secretly by land to Nettuna, from thence he sailed in a litle Barke to Montdragon, and so by land went to Naples, where Consaluo receiued him with great tokens of gladnesse & shewes of honor. At Naples he communicated many times in secret with Consaluo, who he solicited at last to giue him power to passe to Pisa, assuring him, that if he might but once put foot into that City, it wold be much to the profit & furtherance of his king. Consaluo dissimbling his opinion, seemed to fauour the deuise, and offering him galleis to garde him in passing, he suffered him to leaue in the kingdome, such regiments of footmen as he thought to carie with him: he entertained him in this hope, till he had receiued answer from his king conformable to that he had determined to doe, alwaies consulting with him of the affaires of Tuscanie, and Aluiano offering at the same time to invade the Florentines, for the desire he had to see the familie of Medicis restored. But as there is no possibilitie to auoid that which the euerlasting counsell of God hath determined, nor anie reason to pull on the destiny of things till times be accomplished: so Valentinois raised into thoughts of securitie, stood readie to his ruine, when he iudged his estate in most stabilitie, euen as a house whose foundation is not sound, failes eftsfoones to the ground being but newly builded: for, the galleis being now prepared, and his bands of footemen in readinesse to march the day following, Valentinois

prisoner by Consaluo.

after he had deuised long the same night with Consaluo, and taking his leaue with demonstration of great affection embracing one another at parting, was by his commandement; as soon as he was out of the chamber, retained in the Castle, sending forthwith into his lodging to rife the safe-conduct that had bene sent him before he departed from Ostia. Consaluo excused himselfe vpon the authoritie of his King, who sending warrant to apprehend him prisoner, his Maiesties commandement (he said) was of more force then his safe conduct, for that the assurance that was giuen by the proper authoritie of a seruant, was not auayleable if the wil of his Lord consented not. Besides, he occupied with him these round tearmes, that it was necessarie to hold him restrained, for that, not satisfied with so manie sinister dealings done in times past, he would still change the estates of others, he deuised to innouate things, he sowed vniust slaunders, & cast to kindle a fire through all Italy. Immediately after he sent him in a light Galley prisoner to Spainne, leauing him of all his traine but one Page to serue him: there he was imprisoned within the Castle of Medino de Carrapo, having good oportunitie by the consideration of his iust punishment to enter into conscience touching the harmes he hap inflicted vpon diuerse regions and men.

Truce between
and France.

About this time truce was made both by sea and land, as well for Italy; as the nations beyond the Mounts, betweene the French king and the king of Spainne: which, as the French desired it by necessity, so the Spanish embraced it by iust reason, for that he thought it was better to confirme by that meane with greater surety and rest, that which he had conquered, then to referre all to hazard by new warres, which being full of peril and expences, bring forth oftentimes other issues then are hoped for. The conditions were, that euery one should retaine that which he possessed: That it should be suffered to the subiects of both parties to traffike through all their realmes and estates, except in the kingdom of Naples, with the which exception the Great Captaine obtained indirectly, that which was forbidden to him directly: for, in the frontiers of those places which the French held (which were only Rossano in Calabria, Oiro in the land of Otranto, and in Pomylia, Venusa, Conuerjan, and the Mount Castle) Consaluo bestowed men to giue impedimēt, that not one of the souldiers or men of those townes should vse conuerlation with any peece possessed by the Spanish: a deuise which brought them into such necessitie, that Lomys d'Ars with the other Barons and souldiers of those places, went their way, knowing that the inhabitants, not able to endure so many discommodities, were determined to yeeld themselves to the Spaniards: So infinit is the malice of fortune, that whom she hath resolved to root vp, she will not spare to persecute till his last desolation be come. But for all this, the kingdome of Naples, notwithstanding the enemies were all expulsed, enioyed not the fruits of the peace: for that the Spanish soldiers, to whom were due their payes for more then one year, not contented that the Great Captaine (the better to containe them til he had leuied prouisions for mony) had bestowed the in sundrie places where they liued vpon the people (which men of war call to liue by discretion) breaking all bonds of discipline and obedience, had entred Capua and the sea Castle, from whence they would not depart till they were satisfied of their payes. And because the money could not be leuied by conuenient means (the summe being great) without laying an excessiue taxation on the realm, the conditions of the peace were found so much the more miserable, by how much the medicine was no lesse grievous than the disease they went about to cure: matters so much the lesse easie or tolerable, by how much they were practised new, & out of the examples passed: for, notwithstanding that since the ancient times, wherein the discipline of warre was exercised with seueritie, the souldiers were alwaies full of libertie, and troublesome to the peoples: yet things being as yet not wholly disordered, they liued for the most part of their payes, & their libertie was not altogether intollerable. But the Spaniards were the first that began in Italy to liue wholly vpon the substance of peoples, the disability of their kings giuing them that occasion, or haply their necessities much enforcing, being ill payd: of which beginning, disorders rising alwayes in increasing (for the imitation of an ill is greater for the most part then the example) euen the Spaniards themselves and the Italians also, whether they were payd or not payd, haue euer since made such custome of that example, that to the great dishonor of the discipline of warre at this day, the goods of good men and friends are no more assured from the insolencie of souldiers, then such as belong to wicked people and the verie enemy, all things running in confusion without regard to obedience, conscience or honour, as the horse when he hath broken his bridle, forbeareth not in his libertie to spoile the fields of his maister, as if he were a straunger.

What

What by the taking of Valentino's, and this truce betweene the two kings, with opinion that the peace would succeed immediatlie, Romania was put wholly in rest: for Arnola was diuolued afore by the willes of the chieftaines of the Citie into the power of the Pope, and not without the consent of Cardinall S. George, whom the Pope entertained with a vaine hope that he would render it aftsoons to his nephewes. And about those seasons Lowys his bastard brother being entred into Furne, by the death of Anthony d'Ordelauffy, that citie had falne into the hands of the Venetians, to whom Lowys offered it (knowing hee was not able enough to holde it) sauing that the conditions of the present time made them feare to accept it, least they should further incense the Pope, who without any resistance obtained the towne abandoned by Lowys, and had likewise, paying fifteene thousand duckats, the Citadell: a place which the keeper (a faithfull seruauit to Valentino's) would neuer giue vp, till he was assured of his imprisonment by men which he sent expresse to Naples, holding it a iust office to retaine to the last those things which his maister had recommended to his fidelitie.

Thus, being a surceasing of armes in all other parts of Italy, the Florentines only would not cease in the beginning of sommer to recontinue the warres vpon the Pisans according to their custome: for, hauing newly receiued into their pay Iohn Paule Baillon, with other captains, and men at armes of the Colonniois and Sauelleis, and leauying withall farre greater forces then they were wont, they sent an armie to giue the spoile to the corne of the Pisans, wherein they proceeded with greater courage, for that they doubted no impediment by the Spaniard, not so much for that the king of Spaine had not stained the Pisans in the truce (wherein both the kings had libertie to comprehend their friends and adherents) as for that the Great Captaine, after his victories vpon the Frenchmen, notwithstanding from the beginning he had giuen great hopes to the Pisans, had exercised gracious and sweet speeches with the Florentins, hoping at the least by his cunning to separate them from the French king: wherein albeir he found himselfe afterwards disappointed, yet wisely forbearing to incense them, as not to giue them occasion to be more for the French king, he was entred by the meane of Prosper Colonne (but not otherwise then with words simply) into this secret intelligence with them, that if it hapned the French king itsoons to renew the warres of Naples, that they should not minister to him any ayde, as also for his part he would not giue succours to the Pisans, but in case the Florentins should send an armie with artilleries to take the Citie, which he wished they should not recouer so long as they followed the amitie of the French king. The Florentine armie prepared to spoile not only those parts of the countrie of Pisa which they had wasted in times past, but also to ouer-run S. Rossoro and Barbaricino, and so to the vales of Serclo & Osolo, places ioyning to Pisa, wherunto they could not go without dāger whē their armie was lesse: thē they encāped before Librafratta, which being manned with a verie slender garrison, was within few dayes constrained to yeeld to discretion. And such were the calamities of that yeare, that the Pisans had bene compelled by famine to receiue the yoke of the Florentins, if they had not bene succoured by their neighbours, but principally by the Genoweyes and Lucques (for Pandolfe Petrucci no lesse ready to stirre vp others, then liberal in his owne promises to contribute to the expences, was verie long in effects) with whose monyes Reniero of Sassetto, a souldier of the Great Captaine, with certain other leaders hauing sufferance, led to Pisa by sea two hundred horsemē, and the Genoweyes sent thither a Prouost with a thousand footmen: ouer and besides which prouisions, Bardello de porto Venere, a famous roucr in the sea Tirreneum, &c who being leauied & payd by the said helpers, was called the Captaine of the Pisani, reuictualled Pisa continually with a Gallion and other Brigandines: for these considerations the Florentins holding it necessarie, that besides the trauels they gaue them by land, they should also take from them the vse of the sea, entertained three light Gallies of king Federyk which were in Pronence, with the which as their Captaine Dom Rinas Ricaiuso approached Lynorno, Bardello retired, and yet sometime taking the occasion of the winds, he brought some barkes laden with victuals to the mouth of Arno, from whence they fell easilie into the towne of Pisa, which at the same time suffered manie perplexities by land: for, after the armie of Florence had taken Librafratta, deuiding themselues into many legions, they looked how to giue impediment to the tilling of the lands for the yeare following, and to restraine the passage of victuals both by the way of Lucque and the sea: they gaue also in the end of the sommer a spoile to all sorts of graines, whereof that countrey brings forth a great quantitie: their furie left nothing vnproued against the mine of the Pisans: for neither wearied with the great expences, nor holding impossible any thing that gaue them hope to accomplish their purpose, they deuised to trouble the Pisans in a new fashion, that is, by a new channell to make fall the riuer of Arno, which runneth by the towne of Pisa, from the towre of Fapiana five miles from Pisa, into the poole which is betweene Pisa & Linorna: which if they had brought to passe, there could haue bene no more portage of things to Pisa by sea through the riuer of Arno, and the raine waters, for that the countrey is low, not able to be conueyed into the sea, the Citie had remained as it were in the midst of a marish, as also for the difficulty to passe Arno, the Pisans could not haue run from thence forward along the hilles to hinder the traffike from Livorno to Flori, and lastly, they should haue bene constrained to fortifie that part of Pisa, by the which the riuer entered and issued, least it should be open to the incursions of the enemy. But this enterprife, as it was begun with a very great hope, and followed with farre greater expences, was in the end made vaine: and as it often hapneth that like enterprises, notwithstanding they be laid out by measure and line, are yet found fallible by experience, which is the certaine prooue of the difference that is between the deuising and doing of things: so besides many difficulties, not considered before, and now caused by the course of the riuer, which when they thought to restraine, abated of himselfe fretting his channell: the bottome of the poole where they would haue it enter, contrarie to the reasons and opinions of many enginists and water-workers, was found to be higher then the channell of Arno. Besides in so great a desire to obtaine Pisa, fortune enuied also the ambition of the Florentines, for that the Gallies which they had entertained, returning from Villefranche with a prize of the Pisans laden with graine, were so weatherbeaten neare to Rapallo, that they were constrained to giue against the ground, the Captaine with the residue hauing great paine to saue themselves. But the Florentines, whose desire of the victorie was without limit, sought to serue their turn of all the means which either the wit of man, or oportunitie of the time could deuise: and therefore after they had proued in vaine to raunge the Pisans by armes & threatnings, they sought to reclaime them by affabilitie and sweetnesse, making a new law, by the which it was graunted, that euery Citizen or other subiect of the Countrey of Pisa that within a certaine time would eftsoones withdraw to his liuing or dwelling place, should obtaine pardon of all faults committed, with full restitution of goods. Notwithstanding the fauour of this lawe, there were very few of heart and faith resolute, which would depart out of Pisa, but they suffered all such as were vnprofitable to the warre to take the benefite of the edict, and go their way: the same being the cause that both the dearth of victuals which raged afore, was not now so great, and also that they receiued afterwards certaine commoditie of reuenues from others that secretly ayded them; whereby, albeit the necessities of the Pisans were somewhat by these means diminished, yet they found their estate grievously vexed with their great pouertie and want: and yet hauing all things in lesse horror then the name of the Florentines, notwithstanding the minds of the Peasants did often times wauer, they determined to endure all extremitie of misery, rather then to returne to the deuotion of the Florentines. Therefore they offered to giue themselves vp to the Genowayes, with who they had so oftentimes fought for the iurisdiction & for their safetie, and by whom their power had bene of long antiquity afflicted and embased. Of this motion they of Lucqua and Pandolfe Petrucci were the causes, desiring (to auoyd in themselves the continuall expences and troubles) to bind the Genowayes to the defence of Pisa. And for their more easie inducing to the matter, they offered to defray part of the expences for three years. Whereupon the Genowayes, hauing a deliberation to embrace the offer, notwithstanding Iohn Lowys de Fiesquo with many others were against it, made an instance to the French king to suffer them, without whose consent they had no power to execute any deliberation: they debated with the king how dangerous it would be that the Pisans, excluded from this their last and almost only hope, should come to offer themselves to the king of Spaine, from whence would succeed to his great preiudice, that both Genes should be in continuall trauell and danger, and almost all Tuskane by compulsion follow the Spanish faction. These reasons, albeit at the beginning had so much wrought with the king that he was almost at a point to gratifie their demands, yet his Counsell considering, that if the Genowayes should begin to accept warres of themselves; and for a desire of imperie, to haue confederation with other Potentates; it would be cause, that comming afterwards to raise their thoughts to greater things, they would put their state into into absolute libertie: he forbade them expressly to accept the iurisdiction of Pisa, but not that they should forbear to aide or succour them, notwithstanding the Florantines had made great complaints, particular respects bearing more force in these matters, then equitie, conscience, or compassion.

About this time the peace was earnestly laboured betweene the kings of Spaine and France, who offered dissemblingly to render the realme of Naples to the king Federike, or to the Duke of Calabria his sonne, to whom the French king should resigne and giue vp all his claime, so farre forth as the mariage were accomplished between the Duke & the Queene widow, Nece to the same king, being afore bene wife to yong Ferdinand of Aragon king of Naples. And it was without doubt, that the French king had a minde so farre estranged from the affaires of the kingdom of Naples, that for his own regard, he had accepted all sorts of peace, if it had not bene for these two difficulties that restrained him: the one (of lesse moment with him then the other) was the shame & reproches that would be thundred vpon him, to leaue abandoned the Barons, who for that they folowed his faction, had suffred priuation of their estates, & to whom were offered conditions hard & intollerable: the other (working somewhat more strongly with him) was the doubt wherein he was, lest the king of Spaine hauing other intentions offered, according to his accustomed subtilties, this restitution for some end, that though his maiesties consenting, yet the effect should not follow: and that in the meane while the Archduke were not estranged from him, who desiring to haue the kingdom of Naples for his sonne, made instance that there should be continuation of the peace which he had begun before. Therefore he answered generally that he desired the peace, but that he could not with honor giue vp to an Arragon the rights which he had in the same realme. And on the other part, he continued the auncient practises with the king of Romanes, & the Archduke: wherein as he was almost certaine of the conclusion & effect, & to the end they should not be cut off nor hindered by the incertaine practises of the king of Spaine, he let call before him the Spanish Embassadours, making his colour for his greater honor, that the respects & interests of the Barons did chiefly moue him. And being set in the chaire royal, in the aspect & presence of all the court, with solempne ceremonies far about the vsage of times before, he complained that their king expressed in words his desire & disposition to the peace, hauing his intentions dissembled, in which regard, & also for that it was not a thing worthie the vertue and honor of a king, to consume the time in vaine practises, he told them it were their best to depart out of the realme of France. After whose going away, the Embassadours of Maximilian and the Archduke came to giue perfectiō to that which had bin negociated: in which action (because there were plottes layed to greater purposes) was assistant the Bishop of Sisteron the Popes ordinarie Nuncio in that Court, & the Marquis of Finalo whom the Pope sent expressly in those affaires. This peace hauing bene many times afore throughly debated for the profit which appeared verie great to all those Princes, was finally set down vnder these conditions: That the mariage of Lady Claudia the French kings daughter, commoned vpo long time before, should now grow to effect with Charles the eldest sonne to the Archduke: And for more firm confirmation of the same, there should be ioyned to the oath and subscription of the French king, the ratification of Frances Count of Angulesme, who (issue male failing in the king, was next heire to the Crowne) together with manie of the principals of the kingdom: That all the inuestitures of the state of Millan allowed till that day, being razed & cancelled for iust and honest occasions, Maximilian should transferre the inuestiture thereof to the French king, for himselfe and heires males, and for want of such issue it should be (in fauour of the mariage) conueyed to Madame Claudia, and to Charles, & if Charles should dye before the consummation of the mariage, then it to descend to Ladie Claudia, & to the second son of the Archduke if she married with him: That betweene the Pope, the king of Romanes, the French king, & the Archduke, should be made a confederation for their common defence, & to offend the Venetians, from whom they all determined to withdraw those places which they occupied of theirs: That the king of Romanes should passe in person into Italie against the Venetians, & afterwards go to Rome to take the crowne imperiall: That the French king, as soone as the Charters should be dispatched, should paie for the inuestiture three-score thousand florins of Rhem, & three score thousand others within six moneths, & euery yeare a paire of spurs of gold, vpon the daie of the Natiuitie of our Lord: That there should be place left for the king of Spaine to enter into this confederation within foure moneths: But it was not expressed, that in case he did not enter, it should be sufficed to the French king to invade the kingdome of Naples: That the French king should giue no more aide nor succors to the Count Palantine, who stirred vp by him, and entertained with hope of his succors, was in great warre with the king of Romans: That the Venetians should be excluded out of this league, notwithstanding that both the king had giuen willing care to their Embassadours, and also the Cardinall of Amboyse (to cleare them from all suspicion) had nourished them with assured promises & such, that the king would neuer go against that confederation which he had with them. These matters were contained in letters which were solemnly passed: besides he which it was moued that the king and Maximilian should speake together at an other time in some place convenient. The king also promised at that time, that he would deliuer out of prison Lodowike Sforce, and endue him with conuenient meane to liue in the realme of France. The safetie of this man, the king of Romans had shame not to procure, for that his conscience put him in remembrance, that the promises he had made him, and the hopes he had vainly reposed in him, had bene causes to hasten his ruine. In which considerations, hauing no power to do what he would, at least he expressed inclination to do what he could: in so much as when the Cardinall of Amboyse went to him at Trent, he wrought so much as he should no more be so straitly kept as he had bene, making now importunate instance that he might remaine at libertie in the court of France, or in such quarter of the realme as it pleased the king. The king promised also at his request, that the exiles of the Duchie of Myllan should returne, wherupō were manie difficulties in the negociation of Trent: it was beleueed that he would keep this capitulation being so greatly to the aduantage of the Archduke and Maximilian, notwithstanding his ordinarie variations, the Pope being comprehended, and no lesse agreeable to the French king, nor so much for the desire he had at that time to make new enterprises, as for an ambitious respect to obtaine the inuestiture of the duchie of Myllan, and to be assured not to be molested neither by Cesar nor his sonne.

king Federik.

In these seasons dyed king Federik, being wholly depriued of hope to recouer by accord the kingdome of Naples, notwithstanding he was perswaded afore (euery one naturally suffreth him selfe to be beguyled by desire) that the king of Spaine had a better deuotion to it then the French king: he considered not that in that time it was a thing vaine to hope for the restitution of so noble a realme, the examples being verie rare in times farre more auncient & before, where men were more disposed to actes of vertue and nobilitie, then they were in the time running: he saw not also that it was a thing out of all likelihood, that he which had vsed so manie deceits to occupie the moitie of the kingdome, would now that he hath wonne all, depriue him selfe of the fruit and glorie of his victorie. Besides in the common reason and discourse of affaires, he might haue perceiued that the one made no lesse difficultie then the other: only he had more reason to doubt, that he that was already possessed, would not restore, then he which held nothing in the kingdome, would not consent.

The death of Elizabeth Queene of Spaine.

In the end of this yeare, Elizabeth queene of Spaine exchanged this life for a better: she was a Lady of most honest and honorable conditions, and wonne in the opinion of her subiects a right worthie name of magnanimitie, modestie, and discretio: to her did properly appertaine the kingdome of Castilla, which is the greater part of Spaine, to the which shee succeeded after the death of Henry her brother, but not without blood & warre. For albeit it was beleueed for a long time, that Henry by nature was vnable to procreation, and for that reason Beltramise could not be his daughter which was brought forth by his wife, & by him nourished many yeares as a frute of his own seed. And albeit for that occasion Elizabeth sister of Henry was acknowledged for Princessse of Castill, a title nearest to the succession: yet manie Barons of the realme rising after his death in fauour of Beltramise, & the king of Portugall ministring succors by armes in the right of a friend, allie & confederat, the factions comming at last to battel, the cause of Elizabeth was approued most iust by the issue of the field. Ferdinand of Aragon her husband leading the armie, who likewise was descended of the house of the kings of Castill, & conioyned to Elizabeth in the third degree of consanguinitie, & he afterwards succeeding by the death of John his father to the realme of Aragon, they both tooke vpon them by one ioynt right the title of king & queene of Spaine: for that the kingdom of Valence being vnited to the crown of Aragon, together with the countrie of Catalogna, they were Lords ouer all the prouince of Spaine, which is contained betweene the Mounts Pirenes, the Ocean sea, & the Middle earth sea. And vnder this title, for that that region hath bin occupied by many kings of the Mores, the title of many kingdoms is com-prehended, euery one of them making a title separate by him selfe: except notwithstanding the kingdome of Granado, which being at that time possessed by the Mores, was afterwards by the vertue of this King & Queene gloriously subdued to the Empire of Castile, together with the title & kingdome of Portugall, & the Realme of Nauarre much inferior, all which had kings particular. But the kingdome of Aragon with Cucilia, Sardaigna, & other Ilands appertaining by inheritance to Ferdinand, were governed by him only, without interposing the name or authoritie of the queene, contrary to the policy & course of gouernment in Castile: the reason was, for that that kingdom belonging by law of succession to Elizabeth, & standing in a state endowed to Ferdinand, things were administered vnder their common name aswel in demonstrations as in effects, nothing being executed which was not debated, ordeined, & subscribed by them both. The title of the king of Spaine was common, their Embassadors dispatched in common, their armies leuied in common, their wars administered in common, and neither of them in particular appropriating more then the other in authoritie & gouernment of the kingdom. But by the death of Elizabeth without issue males the succession of Castile, by the lawes of that kingdome, which regarding more the proximity then the sex, exclude not the woman, belonged to Iane the daughter of Ferdinand & her, & wife to the Archduke, their eldest daughter, which had bene married to Emanuel king of Portugall, together with her litle sonne, being dead long time before: by reason whereof, the administration of the realme dowage appertaining by the end of the marriage, no more to Ferdinand, he was excoones to returne into his litle kingdome of Aragon: litle in comparison of the realme of Castile, for the straitnes of the countrey, & smalnesse of the reuenues, & for that also the kings of Aragon, not hauing absolute regall authoritie in all things, be in manie points subiect to the constitutions & customes of the same prouinces, which limit much the power of their kings. But Elizabeth drawing towards her latest time, ordeined by her testament, that Ferdinand so long as he liued should be gouernor of Castile, aswel for that she desired it might be kept in his first greatnes, for the amitie that had bene mutual betwene them; as also for that she knewe it concerned the profite of her subiects to be continued vnder the moderate gouernment of Ferdinand, and imported no lesse the commoditie of her sonne in law & daughter, who, seeing in the end they should likewise succede Ferdinand, had reason to esteem it much to their behoofe, that vntil Philp, borne & nourished in Flandres where things were gouerned diuersly, had attained a riper age, & taken a greater knowledge of the lawes, customes, nature, & maners of Spaine, all their realmes might be preferred for them vnder one peaceable & well ordered gouernment, the countreis of Castile & Aragon being maintained in the meane while as one selfe body. But as in mortall actions the wit of man is insufficient to set down a firme stabilitie, for that all things vnder the highest circuit haue their proper reuolutions: so litle helped the wise prouisions of this Queene, to stay the alteration of things, for that after her death new accidents hapning in Spaine, the state tooke a new forme of gouernment. But touching the affaires of Italie, as we meane to expresse hereafter, they were better disposed to a new peace.

Testament of
zabeth.

The yeare 1505. things continued in the same estate of tranquillitie wherein they had bene nourished the yere before, which was such, that had not the quarel betwene the Florentines & Pisians brought some alteration, the actions of armes for that yere had wholly surceased, one part of the Potentates being desirous of peace, & the other that were enclined to warre, holden retained for many reasons: for, it sufficed the king of Spaine (who continued still the same title, & as yet trauailed with the thoughts of his dead wife) to keepe the kingdome of Naples by meane of the truce that had bene made. The French king was entred into a great suspition, for that Cesar following in this as in all other things, his wandring nature, had not ratified the peace. The Pope, albeit he was desirous of innouation & new things, yet he neither durst nor could stirre, vnlesse he were accompanied with the armes of some mightie Prince. And the Venerians esteemed it to no small grace, if in so great consult & counsell of things against them, & in so ill a disposition of the Pope, they stood quiet & were not molested by others: wherein the better to appease the Pope, they had offered many moneths before to leaue him Rimini, & all that they had possessed in Romania since the death of Pope Alexander, to the end he did consent that they might retaine Faenza with his territories. This offer they made also for feare they had of the French king, & for that Cesar at the solicitation of the Pope, had sent his Embassadors to Venice to sommon them to make restitution of the lands of the Church: but the Popes answer was so resolute, that they passed no further. He tolde them according to the constancie of his minde, and his free nature to expresse his conceits, that he would not consent to the retaining only of a little towre, but did hope to recover before his death both Ravenna and Cervia, Cities which they possessed no less unjuſtly then they did Faenza: with which aunſwer they kept ſuſpended their further ſutes till the beginning of the Sommer, when their feares being become greater, they offered by the meane of the Duke of Urbino (a friend indifferent) to reſtore all that they had occupied, which was not of the ſerutenances of Faenza and Rimini, ſo that the Pope, who would not afore admit the Embaſſadours to tender their obedience, would now conſent to receive them. This demand albeit the Pope ſhewed him ſelfe ſomewhat hard to accept, ſuppoſing he ſhould do wrong to his dignitie, as not conuenient to allow it, remembering the great quarrels and ſcawings he had made to them: yet hauing regard to the perplexities that were enduted by them of Furlie, Imola, and Ceſena, who deſtroyed of the greateſt part of their countries, ſuffered manie incommodities. And ſeeing withall no other meanes to redreſſe things with ſpeede, for that the affaires betwene Caſar and the French king, proceeded with ſo great a longneſſe of time and delaie: at laſt he conſented to that which in effects was a gaine without loſſe, ſince neither by words nor writings he was bound to any thing: ſo that after the townes were reſtored, eight Embaſſadours of the principals of the Senate choſen ſince he was created Pope, were ſent to him. (The greateſt companie and moſt honorable ſhewe of Embaſſadours which that common weale had euer ſent to any Pope, if he were not a Venetian:) But after they had entred their obedience with the ceremonies accuſtomed, they brought not backe to Venice any ſigne, by the which they could gather that the Pope was become more eaſie or tractable: ſo deepe were the impreſſions of his miſliking againſt them: or elſe ſo cunningly could he diſſemble contrarie to his owne promiſes and their expectations. About this time the French king, deſiring to put end to that which had bene debated, ſent the Cardinall of Amboyſe to Haguenau a towne of baſe Almaine, where Caſar and the Archduke attended him, hauing newly taken that town vpon the Count Palatine: there were publiſhed & ſworn ſolemly the conuictions that had bene made, the Cardinall paying the moiety of the money promiſed for the inueſtiture, with promiſe that Caſar ſhould receive the other moiety as ſoone as he ſhould paſſe into Italie. Notwithſtanding, both at the preſent he gaue to vnderſtand, and a little after he declared, that he could not paſſe that yeare for the impediments which were in Germanie, the ſame making the ſuſpition of warre ſo much the leſſe, the French king being determined to enter into no new attempt without him: only, the warre almoſt continuall betwene the Florentines and Piſans, remained kindled in Italie, the which proceeding by eaſie degrees, and not purſued but when occaſions offered to the one or the other partie, who otherwiſe had no one ſettled enterpriſe: it hapned that Luke Savelle iſſued out of Caffina, in which land the Florentines made their retrait of warre, and with him certaine Captaines and Conſtables of the Florentines, with foure hundred horſe and manie bands of footemen, their intention was to reuiſtually Libraſatta, and by the ſame meane to leuie certaine heardes of cattel of the Piſans feeding on the other ſide the riuer of Serle vpon the grounds of the Lucquoys, not ſo much for the benefit and pillage of the pray, as for the deſire they had to draw the Piſans to the fight, hauing a confidence to ouerthrow them, for that they were the ſtronger in the field. And when they had conueyed victuals into Libraſatta, and poſſeſſed the pray they pretended they returned with leiſure by the ſame way, to the end to entice the Piſans with that oportunitie to come and charge them. Tarlatin chiefe commaunder ouer their men of warre, iſſued out of Piſa as ſoone as he vnderſtood the enimie droue away their cattell: and becauſe the chiefe point of the reſcure reſted in expedition, he tooke no moe with him then fifteene men at armes, ſortie light horſemen, and threſcore footemen, leauing order that a greater ſtrength ſhould follow him: ſo neceſſarie is ſpeed in enterpriſes, that often times they are wonne and loſt with a leſſe meaſure and diſtance of time then is required to conſult vpon them. But the Piſan Captain vnderſtanding that certaine of the Florentine horſemen were runne vp euen to S. Iacques neare Piſa, he made towards them, and they retiring to their ſtrength which ſtayed at the bridge Capella vpon the riuer of Oſola, and three miles fro Piſa where they taried for the droues of cattel that were taken, & the Mules with the which they had reuiſtually Libraſatta coming behind, & as yet beyond the bridge, which the firſt bands of footemen had occupied, & manned the loopeholes & trenches: Tarlatin folowed them euen to the bridge, not perceiuing that all the armie of the Florentines were in that place, till he was ſo neare that he could not returne without manifest daunger: and therefore, as necessity is mightie to make men resolute, so he determined to make way by his valour, and to charge the bridge, declaring to his company that that whereunto their perill constrained them, was not without great hope and possibility to overcome; for that in a place so strait where few men could fight, the great number of their enemies was more fearefull then hurtfull, the narrowness of the place hindring the vsage of the weapon wherewith they should strike them: in so much that albeit they could not make their passage ouer the bridge, at the least they should easily maintaine their owne defence till the regiments of Pisa, which he had sent for, were come to their succours: But if they could winne the bridge, the victory would be lesse easie then the attempt was glorious, for that the way beyond the bridge which runneth betweene the bridge and the mountaine being strait and narrow, the multitude of their enemies encombred with the mulets and beastes they had stolne, would of themselves fall easily into disorder, being drawne into a place so inconuenient either to fight or to flie. His words were iustified with deedes: for he being the formost, giuing with great valour the spurs to his horse, charged the bridge, but being compelled to retire, another did the like, and after him a third; whose horse being hurt, the Captaine returned with great fury to succour him, and in that veine of courage, what with the force of his weapon and fury of his horse, he passed on the other side the bridge, the footmen that defended making him place: foure others of his company did the like by his example, all which whilest they entertained the skirmish on the other side the bridge with the footmen of the enemy in a strait meddow, certaine footmen of the Pisans passed ouer the Riuer in water vp to the chinne, the horsemen likewise passing without impediment ouer the bridge which was now abandoned, besides the succours expected from Pisa, beginning to arriue without order: wherein the Florentine souldiers seeing their safety turned into perill, and their bodies and weapons reduced into a place strait and narrow, fell into confusion amongst themselves, and as men whose confidence was turned into cowardnesse, and nothing but feare appearing in their faces which had wont to expresse courage and resolution, hauing no Captaine of authority to retaine them in order, they turned their backes and fell to flying: in so much that they which were farre mightier in forces, and marched in order and obseruance of warre, left the victory to those whose numbers were farre inferiour, and came altogether disbanded, with intention rather to make shew only, then to fight in deede. Many Captaines of the Florentine footmen and other Gentlemen of marke were the miserable monuments of this ouerthrow, for that many of them were slaine, mo taken, and most of all dangerously hurt, and such as sought safety in flying, fell into the discretion of the vnplandish people of Lucqua, who stripping them, sent them away naked to be beholden with greater griefe of their friends: so spitefull is fortune when she is disposed to oppresse such as she holds for hated, that suffering them to escape out of the daunger they feared most, she leades them into those aduersities they doubted least, taking her pleasure in the afflictions of men. This calamitie of the Florentines brought a great disorder to their affaires in the countrey of Pisa, for that hauing weakened their legions of horsemen within Cassina, they were not able to let the Pisans (whom their late victory had made insolent and proude) to ouerrun & pill the whole countrey. And that which was of greater importance, Pandolfe Petrucci being entred into a hope by reason of this accidēt, that they might easily giue impedimēt to the Florentines for spoyling that sommer the corne of the Pisans, who maintaining defence with their accustomed difficulties, were (but in cold maner) ayded by the Genowaies and Lucquois, for the Siemois succoured them rather with counsell, then with money or victuals: he wrought so much that John Pawle Baillon, in whom the Florentines reposed much, for that they had bene the principall cause of his returne into Perouza, refused during the time of his seruice, to continue in their pay, alleaging that Marke Antonie and Murio Colunno, with Luke and Iacques Sanelles hauing altogether a greater number of men then he, and being in the same pay, he could not remaine there without daunger for the diuersitie of factions. And to the end they should haue lesse time to prouide themselves, he temporised and taried as long as he could, to disclose wholly that which he had in his thought; and to induce them to giue more faith and credite to his excuse, he promised the Florentines not to take armes against them: wherein to keepethem the more assured, he left as a gage, his son Maletesta a very young man, in their pay with fifteene men at armes: and because himselfe would not remaine altogether without appointment, he tooke pay of the Siemois with threescore and ten men at armes. But because they of Sienna were not able to support so great expences, the Lucquois who did communicate in that counsell, tooke into their paie with threescore and ten men at armes, Troilus Sanellus, who afore was mercenary to the Siennois.

What for the sudden and vnlooked for departing of John Pawle, & the harmes receiued at the bridge Capello, the Florentins looking into their owne weakenesse, would not that yeare giue the spoyle to the lands of the Pisans, forbearing to attēpt enterprises till their fortune were better knowne, conciled: yea they saw how farre they were constrained to deuise how they might remedie greater dangers: for the auncient humor of affection being estfoones reuiued in John Pawle, and in Pandolfe, they debated secretly with the Cardinall of Medicis to trouble the King of the Florentins, making their principall foundation of Bartlemew Aluiano, who being in some disagreement with the Great Captaine, was newly come to Rome, where he drew to him many souldiers with diuerse hopes and promises: wherein it was feared least those counsels would pierce into Cardinall Askanius, with deliberatiō (if things succeeded not happily in Tuskane) to assaile the Duchy of Millan, with the ioynt forces of the Florentins, and others consented to this conspiracy. The reason was, that they had a hope, that assaying it there would easily rise some mutation, seeing there was a slender strength of men at armes of Fraunce, many of the nobilitie were abroad, the peoples much enclined to the name of Sforce, and the French king (on whom was false a great malady, languishing in so dangerous extremity, that for many houres there was a generall dispaire of his health, and though he should somewhat reuiue, yet his disease had made him so ill disposed, that there was no hope of life, and lesse expectation of action. And such as looked into things with a deeper counsell, doubted least Askanius (with whom at that time the Venetian Embassador had familiar conuersation at Rome) intertained a secret intelligence not only with the Great Captaine, but also with the Venetians, who had bin of late more ready and more bold to offend the French then in times past, for that the French king, who newly was entred into suspition and distrust of the king of Romaines and his son, seeing after the death of the Queene of Spaine, what would be the greatnesse of the Archduke, forooke apparantly their amitie, and aided against the Archduke the Duke of Guelldres his sharpe enemy, and inclined to practise particular intelligence with the king of Spaine.

kanius.

But as the thoughts of men are deceitfull, and their hopes full of infirmitie and frailtie, so; whilest these things were in sollicitatiō, the French king, whose recouery was holdē desperate, went daily growing into health, and Cardinall Askanius died suddenly at Rome of the plague. By whose death albeit the dangers of the estate of Millan were cut off, yet the plots layed to molest the Florentins were not altogether remoued: and therefore P. Petrucci, John Pawle Baillon, and Bartlemew Aluiano assembled together in the borough of Pregai, vpon the confines of the Perusins & Siennois, not with hope to be strong inough to restore the Medicis into Florence, but with this intention, that Aluiano entring into Pisa with the wils of the Pisans, should inuade (for the suretie of that City) the frontier of the Florentins, with deuise to passe further as occasion would present. These preparations smothered hitherto, beginning now to burst out into light, the Florentins feared much of the dispositiō of the Great Captaine, both for that they knew that the time for the which Aluiano was entertained in the Spanish pay remained yet till the next Nouember, and also for that they could not beleue that P. Petrucci would enter into new enterprises without his consent: seeing the said Petrucci, neuer satisfying the French king, of the sums of money which he promised, and hauing oftentimes abused him in other properties, depended altogether of the king of Spaine. Besides, the suspition of the Florentins was augmented in this, that (fearing the Lord of Plombin, which was vnder the protection of the Spanish king, to be assailed by the Genoaiers) Consaluo had sent to Plombin for his surety a thousand footmen, vnder the charge of Nuquo de Campo, & to the Riuer of Plombin three ships, two gallies, with certaine other vessels: which forces brought into a place so nere the Florentins, gaue the great occasion to feare that they were come to ioyne with Aluiano, as he himselfe assured that they were promised: but the truth was, that the king of Spaine, after the truce made with the French king, gaue direction (for diminution of the expēces) that as well the regiment of Aluiano, as the bands of others which had bin limited, should be reduced to a hundred Launces. Whereupō he taking occasiō to be grieved, did not only refuse to bind himselfe estfoones with new oath, but also maintained that he was acquitted of the first, both for that he was not satisfied of his paies passed, & also the Great Captaine would not hold his his promise to giue him after the conquest of Naples, two thousand footmen to serue his turne against the Florentins in fauour of the Medeis: Lastly the mind of Aluiano was trauellling, naturally desirous of new things, and altogether impatient of tranquillity and rest.

The Florentins, for their defence against so violent stormes, had recourse to the French king, who was bound by the capitulations of protection to defend them with foure hundred Launces: they sent to him to refurnish them with two hundred, but he, being more caried with couetousnesse of money, then with regard to the prayers of his friends, or compassion of his auncient confederates, answered, that he would giue them no succours, if first they made him not satisfied of the thirtie thousand duckats which were due to him by the obligation of protection. And albeit the Florentins made many humble requests and sures, that he would yet temporize and expect a litle, alledging how much they were aggrieved with intollerable expences necessary for their defence: yet being more carried with couetousnesse, then with reason or indifferency, he perseuered obstinately in his deliberation, in so much as he whom they most suspected, and had most offended, ministred more to their helpe and safety, then he of whom they seemed to be best assured, and to whom they had done greatest pleasures, finding least safety where they reposed most confidence, and greatest perill; where they iustly expected their protection: for the Great Captaine desiring that the tranquillity of Italy should not be troubled, either because he would not should be broken the practises of peace begun of new betweene the two kings, or for that he nourished some deuise to appropriate to himselfe the kingdome of Naples, vsing the occasion of the death of the Queene, and the seedes of future discord betweene the father in law and the sonne: he vsed all diligence to induce Aluiano to reenter into the pay, and commaunded him as a vassall and soldier of his king to make no further proceeding (being now gone to Petillano to obey the Popes commandement to dissolue his companies, or rather to go out of the Church dominions) vpon paine of deprivation of the estates which he had in the kingdome of Naples, bearing a value in yearly reuenuue of seuen thousand duckats: he signified to the Pisans, whom a litle before he had secretly receiued into the protection of his king, and also to the Lord of Plombin, that they should not receiue him: and he caused to be told and offered to the Florentins, that he was content they should haue the seruice of his footmen that were within Plombin, whom he ordained to be commanded by M. Antonio Colomo their Captaine: he sent also to P. Petrucci, that he should in no wise support Aluiano, forbidding to follow him Lewis sonne of the Count Petillano, Francis Ursin and Iohn de Cery, who were in his pay. But notwithstanding all these inhibitions, Aluiano with whom were Iohn Lewis Vitelli, Iohn Conrad Ursin, three hundred men at armes, and five hundred footmen of good resolution, passed alwayes further though slowly (they of Sienna furnishing him with victuals) he came at last to the coasts of Sienna into the plaine of Scarlina, a towne subiect to Plombin, and a litle dayes journey from the frontiers of the Florentins: here came to him a messenger expresse from the Great Captaine, to command him estsoones that he go not to Pisa, nor offend the Florentins: to whom he answered, that he stood in his liberty, & had election to do what he list, for that the Great Captaine had not holden promise with him. From thence he went to lodge neare to Campilla, a towne of the Florentins, where was occupied a light skirmish betweene him and the Florentine bands that were asssembled at Bibona: he came afterwards vpon the territorie of Cornia betweene the confines of the Florentins and Sugeret, but with plots & hopes very vncertaine, finding euery day increase greater difficulties, both for that there came no victuals to him from Plombin, and also Iohn Pawle Baillon and the Vitelli, who were gouerned according to the trayne and issue of affaires, failed to refurnish him with such bands of footmen as they had promised: he saw in P. Petrucci a disposition wandring, and his fauours more doubtfull then before: neither was he assured that the Pisans, for feare to disobey the Great Captaine, would receiue them. For which reasons, ioyned to the continuall solicitation that was vsed to recouer him, wherein the hope was so much the greater, by how much he refused no more to rest contented with an hundred Launces: he retired to Signalò, a towne appertaining to the L. of Plombin, giuing out a bruite that he taried there to expect the last resolution from Naples. But the Pisans hauing in the meane while condescended to receiue him into their towne, he issued out of Signalò, where he had remained ten dayes: and early in the morning on the xvij. of August he appeared with his armie in battell aray a mile beneath Campilla, hauing an intention to bid battell to the

Florentine army, which was gone to incampe there the day before: but they having aduertisement by well assured espials coming fugitiue from the Campe of Aluiano, leauied their Camp the same night, & retired vnder the wals of Campilla, where Aluiano seeing an impossibility to assaile the but to his great disadvantage, he turned to the way of Pisa, by the tract that draweth to the tower of S. Vincent five miles from Campilla: and of the other part, the bands of the Florentins led by Hercules Bentiuolo, who (by the experience he had of the countrey) desired nothing more then to fight in that place by reason of the opportunity of his seat, tooke the way that goeth from Campilla to the said tower of S. Vincent, holding it better to adventure the battell in a place so fauourable by many aduantages, then by temporising, to make his enemy strong by his proper commodities. Here Hercules leuied the light horsemen into two bands, the one followed the army of Aluiano, charging alwaies vpon his taile and arcaregard, & the other went before to affront the enemy, holding the same way by the which the Florentine army came after: they being come to the tower before the bands of Aluiano, and being taken vp in skirmish with those that came first, by who they were easily repulsed, retired towards their army or main strength, which was now come within halfe a mile, where bringing tidings that the most part of the enemies had already passed the tower, Hercules marching lightly, arriued iustly vpon their taile hard by the ruines of the tower of S. Vincent, where their men at armes and footmen had made head: & when he was in full & absolute passage, he charged them resolutely on the flanke with the moytie of his army, making them bend after he had entertained the fight a good space of time. In this first assault their footmen were so broken and chased euen to the sea, that afterwards they neuer made head: but the horsemen which were withdrawne a bowshot beyond the ditch of the tower of S. Vincent towards Bibbona, being reassembled, aduanced eftsloones their Ensignes, and keeping themselves in a close and strong array, charged with great valour the regiments of the Florentins, and with the same vertue repulsed them euen to the ditch: by reason whereof Hercules caused to march on the residue of his people, and drawing thither from all parts the whole body and strength of the army, the fight became furious there for a good space of time, the victory as yet inclining to no part. Aluiano did in that action both the office of a souldier and a Captaine, bearing two estockados in his face, and laboured painfully to driue his enemies from that place, which if he had wonne, he had stood in great possibility of the victory, for that he had either turned to him the aduantages that fauoured his enemies, or at least made the place indifferent without respect of partiality, leauing things to the triall of vertue and fortune. But Hercules who many dayes afore had giuen himselfe assurance, that if the battell were performed in that place, the victory would fall on him, with industrie caused to be planted vpon the brinke of the tower ditch sixe salconets which he brought with him, with the which he began to batter the Campe, who not able to sustaine the furie of the artillery, began now to shake and fall to disorder. In so much as practising the occasion with the which he had alwayes promised himselfe the victorie, he set vpon them furiously in many places with the whole forces of his army: his light horsemen scowred towards the sea coasts, with his men at armes he occupied the high waies, and his infanterie or footmen executed along the playne by the wood, euery one ioyning vertue to his fortune, and with a generall industrie made the successe of that day happie, for that their fury running through the Camp of the enemies, they put them easily to the chase, Aluiano sauing himselfe with much ado with a very few of his lightest running horses flying with him to Montrotondo in the countrey of Sienna: all the residue of his people were almost taken and stripped betweene the tower of S. Vincent and the riuer of Cecina, hauing lost all their Ensignes: only such as escaped from the generall calamity of this battell, were a few horsemen, who found more safety in the swiftnesse of their horses, then in their proper vertue or fortune of the day. This was the end of the commotion or stirre of Bartlemew a' Aluiano, which expressed more apparances and greatnesse by the practises that were made of long time, & by his braue behauiour full of fury and threatnings, then by his forces or any other stable foundation which his enterprize had: A successe common to such who commit their doings wholly to fortune, and do reape for the most part the same issue that doth the mariner betaking his sayle to the wind, which driueth his ship not whither he would, but whither the wind shoueth her. Hercules Bentiuolo and Antonio Iaconino Campe-maister, rising into courage with the felicity of this victory, signified to the Florentins both by vehement letters & messengers well instructed, that it were good to ioyne action to the oportunitie, and approach the walles of Pisa, being

being carefull afore to furnish with diligence all those things that might be necessarie to take it. They confirmed their deuice with all those sortes of hopes which men in good fortune do vainly weene, not remembring that in fortune there is nothing more certaine, then that in all things she is vncertaine. They hoped, that for that the estate of the Pisans was enuironed on all sides with great difficulties, being now more desolate then before for the deprivation of the succours of Aluiano, & relying with all that all things ought to giue place to the reputation of conquerers: they thought they should easily cary it: entertaining withall a certaine intelligence with certaine of the townsmen in Pisa. But the Magistrate of the ten, called il Magistrato de dieci, appointed director of the matters of warre, calling a counsell with his other Citizens, communicants by custom in affaires of importance, that deliberation was with one consent reproued by generall voyce: for that they considered that in the Pisans was still recontinued their auncient resolution and obstinacie, and that being men of so long time experienced and trained in warre, the name or reputation of the victory which they had had against others, would not be sufficient to vanquish them, their forces being no way diminished by it: rather it stood them vpon according to the examples of times past, to set vpon them with a resolute force, which men of warre did onely feare. Besides, their counsell was full of apparant difficulties, for that the Citie of Pisa enuironed aswell as any towne in Italy with most firme wals rampired and fortified, and withall defended with bodies adtiue and resolute, could not be forced but with a great & puissant army compounded vpon souldiers not inferiour to the Pisans in valour, which yet would not be sufficient to cary it by assault or short siege: and therefore more necessary to encampe in the places about it for many daies, to the end to approach it with more surety, searching out aduantages, and rather tiring & wearying them, then to suppress them by force or violence; That that the reason wherein they were was contrary to those things, not being able suddenly to erect an army of footmen, of other bodies then such as should be leauied in haste: and much lesse to approach it with any intention to make long aboade there, both for the inclemency of the ayre corrupted with the winds of the sea, which being become pestiferous through the vapours of the pooles and marshes, were harmfull to armies, as was well experienced when Rawle Veselli encamped there: And also for that the countrey of Pisa beginneth from the moneth of September to be subiect to raines, which, by reason of the basenesse or lownesse of the place, do so ouerdowne it, that it takes away all oportunities for an army to remaine there: That in such an vniuersall obstinacy there could be no assured foundation reposed in practises or priuate intelligences, for that such things being for the most part either dissembled or suborned, or at least managed by persons vnable to execute that they promise, bring with them so many imperfections, that the fruite of the expectation will not answere the time that is taken to entertaine them. Besides, notwithstanding there had bene no publike faith giuen to the Great Captaine, yet Prosper Colonne (but of himselfe) almost vnder their secret consent, had signified and promised, that for that yeare there should be made no approach with artillerie to the walles of Pisa. In which regard they ought to hold for certaine, that aswell for that disdain, and for the promises he had many times made to the Pisans, as also for that this successe of the Florentines was nothing profitable for his affaires, he would oppose himselfe against this enterprise: A matter verie easie for him to do, for that he might in few houres put into Pisa the Spanish bands of footemen which were at Plombin, as he had often times assured them to do when soeuer there was preparation to besiege them: That it were better to vse the occasion of the victorie, there, where albeit the profit were lesse, yet things without all comparison should be found of farre more easie action, and yet not without a notable profite: That there was not one that had more opposed, nor did more continually resist their enterprises: not one that had more hindred the recouerie of Pisa, nor more procured to chaunge the present gouernement then Pandolfo Petrucci: That he had stirred vp Duke Valentino, to enter in armes vpon their lands: That he had bene the principall author and guide of the enterprise of Uicellozza, and of the rebellion of Arezzo: That by his counsell and solicitation, the Genouaies and Lucquois were ioyned with the estate of Sienna to support the Pisans: That it was he that had induced Consaluo to take the protection of Plombin, to intermeddle with the affaires of Pisa, and to make intrusion into the matters of Tuskane. To be short, that there was none other that had bene author or fauourer of this bursling out of Aluiano: That it was against him that they ought to turne their army, and to pill and ouerrunne all the countrey of Siena, where would be no resistance: That by the reputation of their armies, there might happen against him some commotion in the City, wherein he had already many enemies: at the least that they were not to want occasion to occupie any place of importance in that countrey, which they might hold in counterchange; or as a pawne to haue againe Montpulcian: wherein they hoped by this reuenge to do that which hitherto could not be accomplished with benefits and pleasures, that Pandolfe hereafter should not be so ready to offend them: That afterwards in the same manner, they should make incursions into the countreys of Lucquois, being verie harmefull to leaue them so long expected: Lastly, that by these meanes there was hope to draw some honour and profite of the victorie gotten; where if they went to besiege Pisa, there was to be reaped no other thing then expences and dishonour. These reasons, albeit they were alleaged with common accord, yet did they nothing abate the desire of the people (which for the most part runneth more guided by will then by reason) crying to plant the Campe afore Pisa, and being blinded with a iealous opinion they had taken of long time, that the recouering of Pisa was now hit pleasing to many of the principall Citizens for manie ambitious respects. In this sentence Peter Soderin Gonsalonier being no lesse cold then the residue, calling a great councill of the people, with whom they had not bene accustomed to communicate in matters of that nature, asked if they were of opinion that the Camp should go afore Pisa; whereunto euery one answering affirmatiuely, wisdome was surmounted with rashnesse, the authority of the better sort giuing place to the will of the greater part. And therefore there were present directions to make prouisions with a celerity incredible, euery one hauing desire to preuent no lesse the expected succours of the Great Captaine, then the daungers of the rainie seasons, in so much as the sixt day of September the army approched the walles of Pisa with fixe hundred men at armes, seuent thousand footemen, and sixteene Canons, with many other Artilleries of execution, the Campe being pitched betweene Santa Croce and San Michele, in the selfe same place wherein the Frenchmen had encamped before. And as the artilleries were suddenly planted in the night, so they battered the day following in great fury, all that was betweene the gate di Calei and the turret of S. Francis, where the walles make within, an angle: and hauing from the sunne rising (when the artillery beganne to play) till the xxj. hower, brought to the earth more then thirtie fadomes of wall, there was entertained where the ruine was most, a hot skirmish, but to very litle profit, for that there was not throwne downe so great a quantity & space of wall as had bene necessary, in a towne where the men presented themselues to the defence with their auncient valour and hardinesse: therefore the morning following, to the end to make a greater opening of the wall, they beganne another batterie in a place a litle remoued (that place of the wall which aforetimes had bene battered by the French, remaining betweene the one and other batterie) and after they had cast downe so much of the wall, as was thought sufficient, Hercules sought to aduance the footebands which were in battell to giue a rough assault both to the one and other breach; where the Pisans traueilling according to their customes, the woman no lesse venterous then the men resolute, had during the batterie drawne a rampier with a ditch afore. But there was not in the Italian footebands which had bene leauied in hast, neither that action nor that spirit that was to force such a resistance: for that Ensigne of footmen to whom by lot appertained the first assault, beginning to refuse through cowardise to go to the walles, neither the authority of the Captaine, nor presence of the Superintendent of Florence; neither the regard of their proper honour, nor the honour common of the men of seruice of Italie, were sufficient to vanquish their feare, nor to shew valour in an action so much importing: The example of whom, finding imitation and place in the residue that should haue followed them, all the regiments retired to their lodgings, hauing done no other thing then (by leauing the infanterie of Italie infamous through all Europe) defiling the felicity of the victorie obtained against Aluiano, and defaced the reputation of the Captaine and Campe-maister, which was great on the behalfe of the Florentines, If, content with the glorie they had gotten, they could haue moderated their proper fortune. When the souldiers were once retired to their lodgings, there was made no more doubt to leaue the Campe, chiefly for that the same day fixe hundred Spanish footemen of those that were at Plombin were entred Pisa, by direction from the Great Captaine: So that the day following the Florentine armie retired to Casina, drawing with with them more dishonour then either praise or profit, prouing in themselves that auncient tradition of the elders, that follie and rashnesse haue no societie with wisdom, nor fortune or aduerture any communitie with good counsell, since all those things are referred to a doubtfull issue, that are done by will and not by reason. Within few dayes after, there entered into Pisa fifteene hundred Spanish footmen, who, because the seruice had no necessitie of them, after they had in vaine giuen an assault to the towne of Bientina at the incitation of the Pisans, continued their nauigation in Spaine, whither they were sent by the Great Captaine, for that the peace was already established betweene the French king, and Ferdinand king of Spaine, to the which (all difficulties that earst hindered it, being now remoued, as both the regard of the honour of the French king, and the feare to make the Archduke his enemy.) the death of the Queene of Spaine had giuen perfection: for that both the French king, enuying much such a greatnesse of the Archduke, desired to disappoint his purposes: and also the king of Spaine, being aduertised that the Archduke disdainig the last will of his mother in law, had determined to take from him the gouernment of the kingdome of Castile, was constrained to make his stay vpon new alliances. For this cause the mariage was agreed vpon betweene him and Lady Germana de Foix, sisters daughter to the French king, with condition that the king should giue her in dowry that part of the kingdome of Naples that appertained to him, the king of Spaine binding himselfe to pay him within ten yeares seuen hundred thousand duckats in recompence of expences, and to indue the new married Lady with three hundred thousand duckats. This mariage being ratified and accompanied with the peace, it was agreed that the Barons of the faction of Aniow, & all such as had followed the French part, should be restored without any payment into their liberty, countrie, estates, dignities, and goods, and reestablished in the same condition and degree that they were in the day that the warres beganne betweene the French and Spanish, which they accompt to be the day that the Frenchmen ranne to Tripaldo: That all confiscations made by the king of Spaine, and by king Federike, should be holden for cancelled and voide: That the Prince of Rossana, the Marquis of Bisonto and of Gesualdo, Alphonso and Honorio of S. Seuerin, with all the other Barons which were prisoners to the Spanish in the kingdome of Naples, should be deliuered: That the French king should no more intitle himselfe king of Ierusalem and Naples: That the homages and fealties of the Barons should be made according to the conuentions afore sayd, and that in the same manner the inuestiture should be damaunded of the Pope: That in case the Queene Germana should die in mariage without issue, her part of dowrie should be transferred to Ferdinand, but if he died first, it should reuert to the Crowne of France: That king Ferdinand should be bound to aide Gaston Earle of Foix and brother to his new wife, to conquire the kingdome of Nauarre, which he pretended to appertaine to him, and which was possessed with a title royall by Katherine de Foix, and by Iohn her husband, son to Monsieur d'Alberr: That the French king should constraine the widdow of king Federike, with her two children that were with him, to go into Spaine, where should be assigned to her a competent portion to liue: And if she refused to depart, then the king should commaund her to issue out of his realme without making any further allowance to her or to her children by way of pension, or other meane to releue them: That neither one of the parties should enterprise any thing, against those whom any of them should name: and they named ioynly in Italy the Pope, and the French king apart named the Florentines: That for strengthning of this peace, there was meant to be made betweene the two kings perpetuall confederation for the defence of their estates, whereunto the king should be bound with a thousand Launces, and sixe thousand footmen: and Ferdinand with three hundred Launces, two thousand Jennitars, and sixe thousand footmen. After the peace was made and published, wherein the king of England promised obseruation for both the parties, the Barons of Aniow who were in France, hauing taken their leaue of the king, went almost all with the Queene Germana into Spaine, the king vsing towards them at their departure a very small gratulation of their seruices past. Isabell the widdow of Federike hauing her leaue, went to Ferrara refusing to put her childre into the power of the Catholike king. In this towne of Ferrara (Alphonso the son of Heracles being now succeeded in the Dukedome) there hapned vpon the end of the yeare, a strange and tragical accident: such one as had some similitude with the barbarous actions of the auncient Thebanes, but for far more light occasions, if the vnbridled fury of loue be lesse, then the burning ambition and desire to raigne. Such was the end of the yeare a thousand five hundred and fife.

THE ARGUMENT.

Many treaties are made. Pope Iulio the second takes the gouernment of Bologna. The Genoaies rebell against the French king. The king of Aragon meeteth with the French king and communicateth with him. The Diet is holden at Constance. The king of Romaines demaunds passage of the Venetians to go take the Crowne at Rome, he inuadeth their lands, and afterwards maketh truce with them.

Seedes of new warres.

THESE were the accidents of the yeare a thousand five hundred & fife, which albeit left apparant hopes that the tranquillity of Italy wold continue (the warres for the quarrell of Naples being now quenched) yet (such is the mutability of worldly affaires) there began to appeare in other places, seedes of new innouations and chalenges tending to many ciuill calamities: for Philip, which now tooke vpon him the title of king of Castillo, and was no lesse discontented that such a kingdome was gouerned by his father in law, inclined to the incitation of many Barons, and prepared himselfe to passe into Spaine against his will, pretending, as the truth was, that the late Queene had no power, either to dispose or to prescribe lawes, or to bequeath the gouernment of the kingdome after her death. The king of Romaines also taking stomack by the greatnesse of his son, solicited to passe into Italy. And lastly the French king, albeit the yere before he was much discontented with the Pope, for that he had disposed & inducted the benefices, which were void by the death of Cardinal Ashanius & others, in the Duchy of Millan, without his participatiō: and for that also in the creatiō of other Cardinals, he had refused to call the Bishop of Achx nephew to the Cardinal of Amboise, & the Bishop of Baieux nephew to Monsieur Trimonille, being earnestly solicited by the king, who in those regards had caused to sequester the fruits of the benefices which the Cardinal S. P. ad vincta & others of the Popes amity, possessed in the estate of Millan: yet the king on the other side, holding both suspected and feared the greatnesse of Cesar and his son, iudged it necessary not to nourish nourish occasions of reuenge, but to reenter into reconcilment with the Pope, to whom after he had released all the sequestrations, he sent in the beginning of this yeare the Bishop of Sisteron the Apottolical Nuncio, to negotiate with him many plots and offers against the Venetians, to whom he knew the Pope could not but continue to beare an ill will, with a hatred redoubled, for the desire hee had to recouer the townes of Romania: an humour which the Pope did so much the more dissemble, by how much vntill that day he had proceeded in all things so tractable and respectiue, that euery one tooke occasion to maruell greatly, that he, who in his estate of Cardinall had bene alway full of immoderate and aspiring thoughtes, and who in the time of Popes Sixtus, Innocent, and Alexander, had bene many times the instrument to trouble Italie, expressed now that he was become Pope (an estate for the most part administred with ambition and trouble some imaginations) to be more easie and abated in courage, then did well beare the ambitious profession which he had alwayes made to the contrarie, not making any shew or demonstration to remember old iniuries, or to seeme to be like to himselfe: So dangerous is dissimulation in the persons of great men, whose authoritie and place shadowing their dispositions, defendes all things from blame, though they haue nothing vnworthy of reprehension. For the intentions of the Pope were farre other wayes, then agreed with the propertie of his actions, for that hauing a determination to surmount the former opinion that was had of him, and to do more then was expected, turned all his wits, deuises, and labours, (contrarie to the custome of his auncient magnanimitie) to heape vp a wonderfull masse of treasure, to the end that to the will he had to kindle the warre, might be ioyned also the meane and power to sustaine it. And finding in that time, that he was furnished with sufficient treasures and money, he began euen then to discouer his thoughts, aspiring to right great things, suffering nothing to stay the execution of that which he had pretended with so great studie, secrecie, and hope. Therefore the Bishop of Sisteron being receiued and heard with a gladnesse agreeable to the nature of his desire, was dispatched and sent backe againe with diligence, to sollicite betweene them a new reunion and amitie: wherein the better to dispose the minde of the king and the Cardinall d'Amboise, hee promised by writ which the sayd Nuncio caried with him, the dignitie of the Cardinall to the Bishops of Acha and Bayeux, forgetting nothing that he thought might further the effect of those ambitions which he had nourished with so great care and trauell of minde. And yet notwithstanding in so great a heate and vehemencie of forwardnesse, he entred oftentimes into many doubts and difficulties, for that either for a certaine hate he had conceiued against the French king at such time as he fled into Fraunce, eschewing the ambushes of Pope Alexander, or for that it much discontented him to be drawen as it were by compulsion by the power and importunitie of the French king, to transerre to the Cardinall of Amboise, the legation of the kingdome of Fraunce: or lastly, for that he suspected least the said Cardinall (whose behaiours tended directly to the Popedome) not hauing patience to tarie for his death, would not seeke to aspire to his place by wayes finitter & extraordinarie. In regard of which impressions (more troublesome for the subtletie of the man, then that there was reason he should feare so farre) made him oftentimes wander in disposition, determining not wholly to foynne with the French king, and yet without his coniunction, he knew it was impossible that at that time any thing of consequence should succcede with him. For which reasons he sent (on the other side) to Pisa, Baltasar Blasquo a Genoway, Captaine of his Galleis, with commission to arme two light Galleis which Pope Alexander had caused to build there: but it was thought that it was to this end, to be more ready to deliuer Genes from the gouernement of the French, in case the king who yet remained vexed with reliques of his dis ease, should happen to dye.

Thus matters hanging in such an estate of suspence; the first action of this yeare 1506. began by the embarking of king Philip to sayle out of Flanders into Spayne with a great armie by sea: and to reduce his going to a more facilitie and safetie (for he feared least his father in law by the ayde of the French, would hinder his passage) he practised the Spanisch subtelties, and agreed with him to leaue vnto him the managing and pollicie of the most part of affaires, and that they should take in common the title of king of Spayne, according to the example in the Queenes time: and lastly, that the reuenues and tributes should be deuided in an order certaine and indifferent. By reason of which accord, his father in law, notwithstanding he was not assured of the obseruation, sent him into Flanders many ships to furnish his voyage: with the which, hauing embarked his wife and Ferdinand his second sonne, hee tooke his course into Spayne with forward winds, which, within two dayes turning cleane contrarie, after his nauie had run a dangerous fortune, and made a wearie resistance against the furie of the sea, his ships were cast vpon sundrie coasts of England and Brittain, his owne person with two or three ships being driuen with manifest perill vpon England into the hauen of Southampton: whereof Henry the seuenth then king of that Nation being aduertised, sent to him with speed many Barons to do him honor, and desire him to come to his Court, then at London: a request which Philip could not deny, the king of Englands demaund being no lesse honorable, then his owne estate full of necessitie and nakednesse. He remained in the Court of England, vntill all his Nauie was reassembled and shippes rigged, making in the meane while betweene them new capitulations: wherein albeit Philip in all other things held him selfe vsed as a king, yet in this one thing he complained, that he was constrained, as a prisoner, to consent to redeliuer into king Henries handes the Duke of Suffolke, whom he held prisoner within the Castle of Namur, and whom the king of England desired much to haue in power, for that he quarelled the title of the Crowne, pretending the right of the kingdome to appertaine to him: onely the king of England assured Philip by the faith and word of a king, that he would not put him to death, which he did as iustly performe as he had honorably promised, keeping him in prison so long as he liued, and afterwards was beheaded vnder the raigne and commandement of his son. King Philip sailed afterwards with a more happie nauigation into Spaine, where almost all the Barons flocked to him, bringing in their countenances apparant signes of gratulation and gladnesse of his comming, and in their minds assured resolution to aduance him. Inso much as his father in law, who was not strong enough of himselfe to resist him, and lesse confidence that in the French promises was any suretie of foundation, seeing himselfe almost abandoned of euery one, and the articles of the first accord disallowed, and finding withall a verie hard and painfull access to his sonne in law, was constrained to agree to new conditions, such as were offered to him, nothing respecting the former: wherein notwithstanding they proceeded not rigorously for the good nature of Philip, but much more for the perswasions of those which had shewed themselves great enemies to Ferdinand: for that being in continuall doubt, that by his wisdom and authoritie, together with the facilitie of Philips disposition, he would not get better fauor, and in the end winne gouernment with his sonne, they solicited as much as they could his departing out of Castillo. It was accorded, that Ferdinand should giue ouer the gouernment which his wife had left to him by testament, together with all that he could pretend in that right: and that he should speedily depart out of Castillo, with promise to returne no more: That Ferdinand should possesse the kingdome of Naples as his owne, notwithstanding there were that alleaged that it appertained to Philip, for that it was conquered with the armes and power of the kingdome of Castillo: which was the same reason (and haply more iust) by the which Ferdinand was wont to pretend the said realme to appertaine to him, as being wonne by the treasures and forces of the state of Aragon. The tributes of the Isles of India were reserued to him during his life, together with the three great Maisterships of S. James, Alcantara, and Calatrana. It was also agreed, that he should take euery yeare xxv. thousand duckats of the reuenues of the realme of Castillo. As soone as this contract was resolved and passed to publication, Ferdinand, whom hereafter we will call either the king Catholike, or the king of Aragon, went forthwith into Aragon, with intention to passe by sea to Naples with all the diligence he might, not so much for the desire he had to see that kingdome, and to reestablish it, as to remoue the Great Captaine, against whom since the death of the Queene, he had conceiued many suspicions, either that he aspired to transferre to himselfe the kingdome, or at least that he had inclinations to giue it rather to Philip then to him: So iealous is the condition of imperie and dignitie, that against those for the most part is most possibilitie of suspicion, whose vertue hath best deserued in confidence and fidelitie. But by so much lesse had the king of Aragon occasion to repose in him, by how much more he had found him alwayes intractable to leaue Naples, from whence as he had often summoned him in vaine to returne into Spaine (which he excused & delayed, alleaging many impedimets,) so he feared that if he went not thither in person, he should not easily remoue him from the gouernment, notwithstanding since the last contract, king Philip had charged him to transferre wholly hereafter all his obedience to the king of Aragon.

In this time the French king, beginning to rise somewhat into health, was trauelled with many diuerse and contrarie thoughts: for, both he was discontented with the Venetians, disdaining them since the times of the warre of Naples, for the desire he had to recouer that which was of the an-

gent appertenances of the Duchie of Millan, & for an opinion that through diuerse accidents, their power and greatnesse might sometimes hurt him; the which, among other respects, had induced him to make confederation with the king of Romains and Philip his sonne: and on the other part, the descending of the king of Romains into Italy, was nothing agreeable to him, knowing that he prepared to furnish his iourney with very strong forces: a matter which he feared more then afore, for the power which he might put to king Philip (successor to such a greatnesse) specially being in doubt that whilest he was in England, he did not contract with the king there certaine new and strait alliances: and for that also one of the principall occasions for the which he had entred confederation with them, was ceased and cut off by the peace made with the king Catholike, by reason of the which he had dissolued and left there all his thoughts & impressions touching the kingdome of Naples. But whilest he stood wauering in this varietie and incertaintie of mind, the Embassadours of the Emperour Maximilian came to signifie to him, their maisters deliberation to passe into Italy, and to summon him to giue order for the fūe hundred launces which he had promised to furnish in his fauour, and to performe the residue of his word touching the restoring of the banished men from the estate of Millan, and to put him in remembrance lastly to aduance payment of the money which should be due to him within few moneths. To these demandes albeit the French king had no great will to condescend, yet he made semblant of the contrarie, neuertheless onely for the regard of such as for that time required but words, expressing how much he desired that the articles of accord should be executed, offering for his part in due season a ready accomplishment of all things he was bound vnto: only he refused with many excuses to aduance the money. On the other part, the Emperour reposing also as litle in the will of the French king, as he did in his, and desiring vehemently to passe to Rome, chiefly to take the crowne Imperiall, & to chuse afterwards his sonne king of Romains, studied in the same time by what other meanes he might archieue the effect of his expectations. Therefore both he solicited the Swissers to knit with him, who, after many counsels and disputes among themselves, determined to obserue the alliance which yet remained two yeares, with the French king: & also he demanded passage of the Venetians through their lands, who being loath for their own particular to graunt him passage with an armie so mighty, (the offers also of the French king inciting them ioyned with him to let his passage) tooke courage to answer him in termes generall: and the French king, shewing himselfe openly estranged from the confederation made with him & with Philip, gaue in mariage the Lady Clauda his daughter, to Frauncis Lord of Angulesme; to whom belonged the succession of the Crowne after his death without issue male: he made as though he had bene drawn to that action, by the importunities of his subiects, hauing aforehand ordained for that effect, that all the Courts of Parliament and principall townes of his kingdome, should send Embassadours to beseech him as in a matter most profitable to the Realme, since the hope to haue issue male diminished in him daily more & more. This he signified with speed to king Philip by expresse Embassadours, excusing himselfe that he had no power to resist so great a desire of his whole Realme & comunitie of his subiectes. Besides these, he had sent bands of men to the succours of the Duke of Gueldres, to turne Maximilian fro passing into Italy, who of himselfe had left & giuen over those cogitations: for that vnderstanding that Launcelot king of Hungary was very sicke, he drew neare the confines of that kingdome according to an ancient desire of his father, to make himselfe king, for the right which he pretended to it: for Launcelot, otherwise called Ladislao, king of Hungaria and of Boheme, sonne of Albert, which was brother to the Emperour Federike, dying many yeares before without sonnes, the peoples of Hungaria, who pretended that their king dying without heire masculine, the succession of the next in blood could haue no place, had chosen for their king (hauing regard to the merites & vertues of his father) Matthias, he who afterwards to the great reputation & glorie of so litle a kingdome, vexed oftentimes the mightie Empire of the Turkes: he, to auoyde in the beginning of his reigne, warre with Federike, agreed with him to take no wife, to the end that after his death the kingdome might diuolue to Federike or to his children: which albeit he did not obserue, yet he dyed without issue, and for all that Federike had not the accomplishment of his desire, for that the Hungarians chose of new for their king, Launcelot king of Polonia, by occasion whereof new warres being eftsoones raised against them by Federike and Maximilian, they agreed at last (the Barons of the kingdome taking a solemne oath) that whensoever Launcelot should dye without issue, they should receiue Maximilian for their king. In so much as he then aspiring to this succession, after he was aduertised of the infirmities of Launcelot, he drew neare to the borders of Hungaria, leauing behind him for that time all his thoughts for Italy.

The Pope desireth to win agayne Bologna.

But whilest those things were debated betweene the Princes of beyond the Mounts with so great diuersitie, the Pope, knowing that without the aydes of the French king he could not moleest the Venetians, and hauing lesse patience that the yeares of his Pontificacie should so passe away & consume without profite or honour, prayed the French king to helpe him to recouer to the obedience of the Church, the Cities of Bologna and Perousa, which belonging of antiquitie to the Sea Apostolike, were now tyrannized, the one by John Paule Baillon, and the other by John Bentiuole, whose predecessours in the times of ciuill warres, rising from priuate Citizens to be chiefe of a faction, after they had chased or slaine all their aduersaries, were not onely become absolute Lords of the Cities, but also stood not restrained by any other thing to take the title of lawfull Princes, then for the regard which they had to the Popes, who in the one and the other Cite retained somewhat more then the simple name of Lordship, for that they tooke a certaine part of the reuenues, albeit very litle, and ordained gouernours in the name of the Church, who serued rather as shadowes and apparances, then to rule or commaund (the power and deliberation of all things of importance resting in the authoritie of others:) but the towne of Perousa, either for her more nearnesse to the Citie of Rome, or for other occasions, was longer time entertained in the obedience of the Church then Bologna: for that Citie did oftentimes change in the aduersities of Popes, sometimes being gouerned in libertie, sometimes oppressed by the Citizens, sometimes running to the obedience of strange Princes, sometimes reduced to the absolute subiectiō of Popes, & lastly returning in the time of Pope Nicholas the fift, vnder the rule of the Church, but with limitations certaine, and such communion of authoritie betweene the Pope and them, that with tract of time the name and demonstration of things remaining onely to the Popes, the effect and substance of the policy and gouernement rested wholly in the power of the Bentiuoles: of whom, John Bentiuole who commanded for the present, hauing by litle and litle drawen all things to him, and embased those mightie families which had bene contrarie to his elders and him in the first stablishing of his tyrannie: and being also grievous for the insolencies and intollerable expences which his foure sonnes made, (an occasion making him hatefull almost to euery one) ruled now more by crueltie and armes, then with clemencie and affabilitie, leauing very litle place to equitie and innocencie. But the Pope was most of all pushed forward to this enterprize, by a burning humour and desire of glorie, wherein he had determined (albeit vnder the shadow of pietie and zeal to religion) to reconquer to the sea Apostolike, all those places, of what nature soeuer, that had bene vsurped vpon the Church. And in this inclination to vse the sword hee had a particular motion to recouer Bologna, for a hatred newly kindled against John Bentiuole, for that in the times of his aduersities when he durst not remaine at Rome, and seeking safetie in Cento a towne of his Bishoprike in Bologna, he was driuen to steale away by night, hearing a bruite published at randon, that there was a resolution to apprehend him prisoner at the instance of Pope Alexander:

Malice is infinite in her actions.

So infinite is malice in her operations, that what heart she hath once embraced, she neuer ceaseth to ouercarie by degrees, till a reuenge be executed, and that for the most part in a qualitie farre aboue the nature and merite of the offence. And (as was well expressed in the humours of this Pope) malice in wise men hath no suddaine apparance, but rising with their greatness of place and calling, into more furie and rage, the blow comes so much the more redoubled, by how much the matter hath bene nourished with tract of time, not sayling to execute as soone as oportunitie doth offer. This request of the Pope was to the good liking of the king, who tooke it for an apt occasion to keepe him in his amitie: for knowing how much it did preiudice his affaires, that the Pope had alliance with the Venetians, hee began to grow into feares that he would suddenly reuolt, holding him also in suspition to haue communitie in a certaine practise which Ottavian Fregoso had made to depriue him of the iurisdiction of Genes. Besides, hee esteemed Bentiuole (albeit he was vnder his protection) more inclined to Cesar then to him. To these doubts hee adioyned also the disdain which he had against John Paule Baillon, for that he had refused (notwithstanding he was possessed of the foureteene thousand duckats) to go and ioine with his army being vpon the riuer of Garillan, together with his desire to offend Pandolfe Perucci, vnder an occasiō to send men into Tuscanie, for that he had both failed to pay him the money he had promised, and also had wholly followed the fortune of the Spaniards. So that he made ready ready offers to the Pope to aide him, and the Pope for his part, gaue him the writs of election to Cardinals for the Bishops of Achx and Bayenx, with power to dispose of the benefices in the Duchy of Millan in the same fulnesse that Lodowike Sforce had vsed before. These practises being resolued and concluded by the solicitation of the Bishop of Sisteron newly endued with the Archbishoprike of Achx, the only and immediate interposer betweene them; yet the execution was not so ready, for that as the Pope deferred for certaine moneths to put the enterprize to action, so it happed in that meane while that Maximilian, who having begun the warre against the king of Hungary, had estraunged his thoughts from Italy, made now a new peace with him, renewing the accord touching the succession, and returned into Austria, making signes and preparations as though he would eftsoons passe into Italy: and desiring that the Venetians should not oppose against his intention, he dispatched foure Embassadors to aduertise that state, that he was determined to go to Rome to take the imperiall Crowne, desiring them to giue him liberty of passage together with his armie: he assured them to march through their regions without grieving them or theirs in any sort: and desired, by protestation, to be vnited with that common weale, wherein the meane might easily be found, not only with surety, but also with augmentation and exaltation of both the parties, couertly inducing vnder this perswasion, that it wold make for their common profite to conspire together against the French king. The Venetians, after they had long debated in counsell, returned a very gracious answer, expressing how much their common weale desired to be conformable to his will, & to satisfie his requests in all things which they might without their proper preiudice, which in that case could not be neither greater nor more euident, for that the regions of Italy being made desperate by so many calamities which they haue suffered, were drawne into an vniuersall mutinie at the only brute of his descending with so mightie an armie, standing generally resolued to take armes to cut off occasions & opportunities of new troubles, and that the French king was to do the like for the suretie of the estate of Millan: that by that meane, his comming into Italy with an army displayed, was no other thing then to giue occasion to the communalities of Italy to leaue armes to make mightie resistance against him: an action of no litle importance and danger against them, for that if they should consent to his passing, all the Potentates and powers of Italy, together with the French king, would iudge of them none otherwise, then of such as had not esteemed of the common benefite in respect of their proper interests. That it wold be more assured for all, and in the end most honorable for him, comming to an act pacificable & agreeable to euerie one, to passe disarmd into Italy, where the imperiall Maestie shewing himselfe no lesse gracious and affable, then mightie and terrible, should find an vniuersall fauour with all regions, peoples, and communalities: That hee should (to his perpetuall glorie) beare the honorable reputation to be the protector of the tranquillity of Italy, proceeding to his coronation in the same forme which his father and many his renowned predecessors obserued afore him; in which course they were, and would vse to him, all those oblations, obseruances, and offices which he could desire.

These apparances of armes and other things practised by Caesar, were the causes that the Pope resolued fully to execute the enterprize of Bologna, and had sent to summon the French king to his promise, was friendly aduised by the king to haue regard to the estate & disposition of things, and considering well of the nature of times, to deferre the action of the enterprize to another season, least the vntimely breaking out of such an accident did not onely bring all Italy into commotion, but proue preiudicial euen against his proper intentions: for that he feared least in this action he should kindle against him the minds of the Venetians, who had already signified to him that they were resolued to take armes for the defence of Bologna, if the Pope wold not first indue the with the graunt of those patronages and rights of Faenza which appertained to the Church. But the Pope, who of nature was impatient and sodaine, sought out still all the means he could, by the which (notwithstanding all difficulties and impediments) he might aspire to that he desired: wherein he proceeded with moods furious and violent, calling together into the Consistorie all the Cardinals, afore whom deducing in forme of a languishing complaint, how iustly he was touched with desire to deliuer from the hands of tyrants the Cities of Bologna and Perusia, members so much importing the Sea Apostolike, he signified that he would assist the enterprize in person: he assured them, that besides his owne forces, he should be aided by the French king, by the Florentines, and many other Potentates of Italy, and that God that was perpetuallie iust, would neuer leaue abandoned such as with so holy intentions sought to reestablishe and restore the Church. As soon as this deliberation was published in Fraunce, it seemed such a matter to be laughed at to the king, that the Pope should promise himselfe a succour of his people without intelligence or community with him, that making it a iesting talke at his table, and imposing withall vpon the Pope his notorious drunkenesse, he said it could not be but the Pope was well bewitched with wine: not discerning as yet that that sodaine deliberation did constrain him, either to come to manifest controuersie with him, or else to giue him of his men against his will. But the Pope not expecting anie other resolution, issued out of Rome with five hundred men at armes, and sending afore Anthonye dal Monte to signifie his comming to the Bolognais, with direction to commaund them to make prouision to receiue him, and to bestow in the countrie five hundred French Launces. He marched slowlie, hauing determined not to passe Perousa, till he were well assured whether the French bands would come to his succours, foreseeing now those inconueniencies which the immoderation of his mind would not afore suffer him to discern in his heate and furie. Iohn Paule Baillon occupied with no small feares of his comming, by the counsell of the Duke of Vrbis & other his friends, & vnder their assurance went to meet the Pope at Oruieto, who receiued him into grace and fauour, after he had wholly submitted himselfe to his discretion, with promise to follow him in person with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, and also to render vp into his hands the fortresses of Perousa and Perousin, and the guard of the City, giuing for obseruation his two sonnes in hostage to the Duke of Vrbis. Vnder this composition the Pope entred without any strength into Perousa, being in the full power of Iohn Paule Baillon to make him prisoner with all his court and traine, if he would haue made sound throughout the world in a matter of such greatnesse & waight, that disloyalty, which had already made his name infamous in things more inferiour and of farre meaner qualitie. At Perousa the Pope gaue audience to the Cardinall of Narbona, sent to him from the French king, to perswade him to put o-uer and deferre the enterprise till another time, and to protest the kings excuses, in that (contrary to his desire) he could not send him men, for that, by the considerations for Cesar, and the great suspitions he had of his doings, it was not conuenient for him to leaue disarmed the Duchie of Millan. This Embassage albeit it stirred vp in the Pope many shewes of perplexities and alterations, yet his wisdom held his affections suppressed, and making no apparance that he had any inclination or will to chaunge aduise, he began to leaue new bands of footmen, and increaseth all his prouisions. And yet many beleueed, that what by the difficulties that appeared, & the ea-sinesse of his nature to be appeased vpon yeelding or submission, if Bentinole, who offered by his Embassadors to send in his foure sons, had disposed himselfe to come to him in person, according to the example of Iohn Paule, he had found some tollerable forme for his affaires: but whilest he spent time in temporizing (the aspect & estate of his businesse making him irresolute) or, as some say, whilest he was holden in suspence by the contradiction of his wife, he had aduertisement that M. de Chaumont had receiued directiō frō the French king to go to the succors of the Pope in person with five hundred Launces: an aide which albeit the king (in the absence of the Cardinall Amboyse) had no inclination to send him, yet the Cardinall returning to the Court, vsed perswasions to hold the king firme in his promise, hauing not only made voluntarie offers in the beginning, but also by many degrees since, had as it were vrged the Pope to vse the seruice of his men. The Cardinal had power to make the king to change aduise, wherunto he was so much the more easily induced, by how much the demonstrations of Maximilian began now to waxe cold according to his custom, & the Pope also (somewhat to leaue the king satisfied) was content to make promise, not by writing, but in the mouth of his holinesse & honor, that he would not molest the Venetians for the townes of Romania: & yet notwithstanding the Pope, not able to abstain frō disclosing what a selected desire he bare that way, going frō Perousa to Cesena, he took the way of the mountain: for that if he had marched along the plaine, he should haue bin constrained to passe vpo the lands of Rimini, which the Venetians held. As soon as he was come to Cesena, he admonished Bentinole to depart frō Bologna vnder most grieuous cēsure & paines spirituall & tēporall, stretching the out against all such as should hold any cōuersation or cōfederacy with him. And receiuing intelligēce in this place that M. de Chaumont marched with sixe hundred Launces & three thousand footmen, all paid of the Church treasures, he took courage, & recōtinued his way without deferring. And turning frō the wayes & territories of Faenza for the same respects he refused Rimini, he took the way of the the mountaine, notwithstanding it was troublesome & full of incommodities: & so drawing along the townes which the Florentines possessed beyond the Appenin, he went to Ymola, where his armie assembled: wherein, besides many bands of footmen which he had leauied, were foure hundred men at armes in his pay, an hundred and fiftie led by Iohn Paule Baillon, an hundred lent by the Florentines vnder the guide of M. An. Colonio, an hundred lent by the Duke of Ferrara, many bands of Estradiots leauied in the kingdome of Naples, and two hundred light horsemen brought thither by the Marquisse of Mantua, deputie Lieutenant of the armie. At Bologna on the other side, Bentinole and his factiō omitted no preparation that might respect their surety, nor forbore to arme all those bodies which they esteemed to carie ability to their defence, hoping that if they were not defended, at the least they should not be offended by the French: for that the king being called vpon to aide them, according to the contract of protection, had answered, that albeit he could not with armes oppose against the enterprise of the Pope, yet he would forbear to minnister either men, or other nature of aide against them. An answer wherein they tooke great comfort and confidence to be able with ease to resist the armie Ecclesiasticke. But all their hope was turned into feare by the coming of Monsieur de Chaumont, who, albeit as he marched had made diuerse answers to their people, yet the same day he arriued at Castelfranco vpon the territories of Bologna, (being the same day wherein the Marquisse of Mantua with the Popes regiments made himselfe Lord ouer the Borough of S. Peter) he sent to signifie to Bentinole, that the king foreseeing not to faile of that he was bound vnto by the capitulations of protection, had an intention not only to make safety and preservation of his goods, but also to procure him such further grace and fauour, that resigning to the Church the gouernment and policie of the Citie, he should with suretie remaine in Bologna with his children, so that within three dayes he submitted himselfe wholly to the obedience and commandements of the Pope. Necessitie is mighty to bend those hearts that are inuincible against all other means, and men compounded of humors transitorie and fraile, beare their ordinarie mutations of mind and counsell, according to the alteration of occasions and accidents. For, Bentinole and his sonnes, who with great threatnings afore had published to all the world their ableness and disposition to defend themselves, became now chaunged in resolution and courage: & not remembring with what vpbraidings they had exclaimed against Peter de Medicis, for that without effusion of blood he had forsaken Florence: made answer, that they would referre themselves to his arbitration, beseeching him to be a meane that, at the least they might obtaine conditions tollerable. Therefore, being now come to the bridge, de Rene three miles from Bologna, interposing with the Pope, he made an agreement, that it should be lawfull to Iohn Bentinole and his sonnes, with Geneure Sforce his wife, safely to go out of Bologna, and remaine in the Duchy of Millan in any place at their best liking and election: That it should be lawfull for them either to sell or carie away from Bologna, all their goods moueable, and not to be molested for their immoueables which they possessed with iust title. By the benefite of which accord ratified and confirmed, they departed with speede and securitie out of Bologna, hauing obtained of Monsieur de Chaumont, to whom they gaue twelue thousand ducats, a verie large safeconduct, with promise subscribed, not only to see obserued all that is contained in the articles of protection, but also that he and his familie should continue in suretie in the Duchie of Millan. As soone as the kinred of the Bentiuoleis were departed, the people of Bologna addressed with diligence their Embassadors to the Pope, to put into his hands the absolute iurisdiction of their citie, to demaund pardon & absolution of the Censures, and to require order that the French should not enter into Bologna. But they being of nature insolent, could hardly beare to be regulated, specially in a time when their own strength & common fortune of the armie fauoured their intentions, they made their approaches to the walles with an vniuersall disposition to enter: but the strong resistance of the people, compounded of a resolute valour to defend their libertie, kept them from executing vpon the walles, and compelled them to encampe neare the bulwarks betweene the gates of S. Felix and Saragosse, vpon the channell which drawing from the riuer of Rene passeth through Bologna, and from thence is nauigable to Ferrara. Be-like they were ignorant, that it was in the power of the inhabitants of Bologna by plucking vp a sluice of the channell that entreth the Citie, to drowne all the countie about: their ignorance in a matter so needfull of consideration, brought sodaine incommodities vpon them, for that the people of Bologna, raising the sluice, the channell that afore was swelled with water, brake forth and overflowed the low places where were encamped the French bands, who leauing their apparell in the water, and much of their baggage, retired in great tumult and disorder to the bridge of Rene, where they remained till the Pope entred into Bologna, which was on Saint Martins day, confirming his entrie with all pompe and ceremonies Pontificall. Thus fell into the power of the Church with a great felicity of the inhabitants, the City of Bologna, which with good right beareth name & reputation amongst the most noble and flourishing cities of Italy, as well for the infinitie of the dwellers, as for the fertilitie of soyle and oportunitie of situation. And albeit the Pope did institute new Magistrates by the example of antiquitie, leauing in many things great signes & apparances of liberty, yet, touching the effect, he brought it wholly to the obediēce of the Church, expressing many honourable liberalities, in releasing diuerse exemptions, wherein he made himselfe mighty in the opinion of the people, and (vsing the like in all other cities) he laboured to allure the multitude to an amity and liking of the Church gouernment. He gaue to Monsieur Chaumont, who returned immediatly to the Duchy of Millan, eight thousand duckats, with ten thousand to be distributed in liberalities amongst his regiment, and he confirmed vnder Bul subsigned, the promise he had made before to create Cardinall, his brother the Bishop of Alby, and yet (turning all his wits and studies how he might annoy the Venetians) to leaue quicker motions in the French king and Cardinall Amboise to aide him, he would not at that time publish Cardinals the Bishops of Achx & Baieux, according to the solicitations that were made, and writs which were already subscribed.

The death of king Philip.

About this time the king of Aragon passed by sea into Italy, and embarking at Barcelona there came to him a Gentleman from the Great Captaine, who offered himselfe prepared to receiue the king, and giue him all obedience: To whom in recompence of his fidelitie and merits, the king ratified not only donation of the Duchy of Saint Ange, which king Federike had giuen him, but also all his other profits which he possessed in the kingdome of Naples, amounting to twenty thousand duckats in yearly reuenuē, together with the office of great Constable of the kingdom, and promise to be great maister of Saint James, both subsigned vnder the kings owne hand. The king embarking at Barcelona with no lesse contentment of the present, then better hope hereafter, was honourably receiued with his wife, in all the ports of Prouence, according to the French kings commandements, and with the same oblation and reuerence was welcomed into the haven of Genes, where he was expected by the Great Captaine, who was gone thither to meete him, not without the admiration of many, for that not onely the popular sort, but euen the Pope himselfe, nourished an opinion, that as well for his disobedience past, as for the present suspicion which the king had in him, he would passe into Spaine, fearing to stand in the presence of the king. The king of Aragon departing from Genes, remained many dayes at Portofino, both for that the wind was contrary, and also he held it not conuenient to be far from the shore with his light gallies. Whilest he sojourned at Portofino, he was aduertised that king Philip his son in law, yong in yeares, and well disposed in body, had chaunged this life for a better within the towne of Burgos: his infirmitie was a feuer raging with violent motions, but of very few daies continuance, hapning in the very ripenesse & full reputation of his age, & in a season wherein he was lifted to his greatest felicity, as oftentimes is wonderfully expressed in the variation of fortune: neuerthlesse the king, in whom it was beleueed that for the desire he had to recontinue in the gouernment of Castile, wold eftsounes turne saile to Barcelona, kept on his first way, & entred the port of Caſſa the same day that the Pope marching to Bologna, made his entrie into Imola: from whence he was conueied to Naples, and receiued into that City (which was wont to reioyce in kings of Aragon) with no lesse magnificence, maiestie, and honour of the Nobles, then vniuerfall desire & expectation of the commonalty, for an opinion they had that vnder a king so glorious for the many victories he had obtained as well against the infidels as the Christians, and no lesse reuerenced for his high wisdom and temperance of spirit, ioyned to the generall report of his singular iustice, by the which he had guided his Realmes in tranquillitie: he would also restore and relieue the kingdome of Naples, of so many afflictions and oppressions, and reduce it into an estate peaceable & happy, with restitution of the ports which the Venetians held there, to the great displeasure of the whole kingdome. There came to him to Naples from all parts of Italy many Embassadors, not only to congratulate and honour so great a Prince, but also for many practises and occasions, euery one being perswaded that with his authority and wisdom, he wold readresse things, and giuing a new form to affairs, he would be the even ballance and counterpoise for many matters: for that both the Pope, who held himself ill contented with him, for that he had not honored him with legation and embassadours according to the custome, studied to kindle him against the Venetians, thinking that for the desire to recouer the ports of Powilla, he had reason to wish their declination and embasing. And the Venetians of the contrarie solicited for many good respects to be reconcined in his amitie: and also the Florentines, with the other peoples of Tuskane, negotiated with him diuersly for the regard of Pisa, which this yeare was lesse molested then others with the incursions of the Florentines (not hindering their haruest) either for that they were wearie of the charges, or else that the experience of the yeare passed made them esteeme it a thing vaine & without fruite, knowing that the states of Genes and Lucque had agreed together to support that citie for one yeare with a determinate and certaine charge, whereunto Pandolfe Petrucci had prepared them before, offering like portion of contribution on the behalfe of the Siennesis: notwithstanding on the other side (being a man dissembled in all his intentions) he obtained of the Florentines, by disclosing the estate of the negociation, and to the end to separate himselfe from the rest, that the truce which yet continued betweene the Florentines and Siennesis, should haue prolongation for three yeares, with an expresse couenant, that it should not be lawfull to the Siennesis, nor to Pandolfe, to minister any aide to the Pisans: with which excuse forbearing to leaue any expences for them, he refused not to fauour them with all the counsels and actions he could in all other sorts.

About this yeare there happened a new and strange accident of the tragedy which had bene begun before Ferrara: for Ferdinand brother to Duke Alphonso and Iulio, whose eyes the Cardinal had violently caused to be pluckt out (but by the readie helpe of Phisitions were restored without losse of his sight:) conspired together with the said Iulio, the death of the Duke. Ferdinand, who was next in succession after the Duke, was moued to this conspiracy by an aspiring desire to occupie that state, the humour of dominion and rule carying him into dispositions of bloud contrarie to honor, nature, and humanitie: and Iulio embraced the treason with so much the more affection, by how much he iudged that Alphonso had not ministred sufficient iustice to the wrong that was done him, being withall out of hope to be able otherwise to wreake his reuenge vpon the Cardinal. To these counsels they called as a partie, the Count Albertin Boschet, a gentleman of Modona, with whom albeit they had wonne and corrupted certaine fellowes of base condition gouerning much the person of Alphonso, for that they were his fauorites in matters of sport and delight, and had many times sundrie oportunities to kill him: yet, being withholden by a certaine fatall timorousnesse, they let passe alwayes the oportunitie. In so much as (so it happeneth for the most part when the execution of conspiracies is deferred) the treason being detected, Ferdinand with the other conspirators were imprisoned, and Iulio, who was fled to his sister at Mantua, was by the direction of the Marquis, sent prisoner to Alphonso, being assured by his promise and fidelitie, that he should not be touched with death: but a litle after the Count Albertin being condemned iudicially, was quartered with the others that were found guiltie, & the two brethren passed ouer to perpetuall prison in the new castell of Ferrara.

of the historie
of Iulio d'Este*

In this place of the historie it is not inconuenient to touch somewhat of the audacitie and industrie of Duke Valentinois, who being suttlyly slided downe by a cord, out of the rocke of Medina de Campo, fled into the kingdome of Nauarre to king Iohn brother to his wife, where (to the end the historie cease to speake any more of him) after he had remained certaine yeares in base condition, the French king confisking both the Duchie of Valence, and the pension of twenty thousand franks which he gaue him in supply of reuenue, and also would not suffer him to go into Fraunce, because he would do nothing that might discontent the king of Aragon, he was at last slaine by the conspiracie of an ambush, commaunding ouer the men of warre of the king of Nauarre in the campe at Viano, a litle place in the said realme.

Vpon the end of this yeare, for that the yeare following should not begin without matter of new warres, the Genoways rebelled against the French king, hauing no other incitation then of themselves, the matter taking his foundation not of anie desire to rebell, but rather of the ciuill discords, which caried men further then their former counsels and deliberations, rebellion being of a condition to increase in occasions, as the fire is redoubled in heate by the fresh matter which it embraceth. The Citie of Genes, a Citie seated in a place most apt to command the sea, if so great an oportunitie were not hindered by the pestiferous poison of ciuill dissensions, is not as many other great townies in Italy, subiect to one particular diuision, but is deuided into manie parties and factions: both for the reliques of the ancient quarels betweene the Guelfes and Gibelins yet remaining there: and also for the seeds of contention still growing betweene the gentlemen & populars, by the which the whole nation of Italy hath bene much afflicted, but specially many Cities in Turkane haue bin brought to extreme ruine: for, the communaltie not able to beare the pride of the Nobles, bridled much their authoritie and power by many rigorous lawes: and amongst others, suffering them to communicate with all other offices and honors, they excluded them particularly from the dignitie of Dukedome: a supreme estate which was giuen for life to any other that was chos. x. notwithstanding by the inconstancie of that Citie, few or none were suffered to continue in that place till they died, the seate of dominion being alwayes iealous, but most casuall where it diuolueth by election, which by his proper ambition nourisheth for the most part a secret subiection to alteration and fall. No lesse great is the diuision betweene the families of the Adorni and Fregosi, who from base condition and popular houses, being risen to the dignitie of Capellaci (so do the Genoweyes call such as are aspired to any great potentacie) contend together for the dignitie of Duke, which for many yeares hath continued for the most part in one of those two families: for the gentlemen of the Guelfes and Gibelins, not able to ascend to the place for the impediment of the lawes, fought to make it fall to such of the populars as were of their faction. And as the Gibelins fauouring the Adornes, and the Guelfes the house of Fregosa, time hath made those two families more noble and mightie, then those of whom afore they followed their name and authoritie. So neuerthelesse all those diuisions are so confounded, that oftentimes they that be of one part against the partie opposite, are in them selues deuided into diuerse parts, and of the contrarie conioyned in one with those that follow another faction. This yeare began to kindle betweene the gentlemen and commons, a debate, which breeding at the first vpon the insolencies of certaine of the Nobles, and working by litle and litle the most part of the minds of both the one and other side ill disposed, it chaunged qualitie ere it were long, and of priuate contentions, conuerted it selfe into the nature and habit of publike discords, easie enough to kindle in Cities so abounding in riches as did Genes at that time. These quarels rose increasing so farre, that the people possessed with furie, drew into tumult, and made violent slaughter of one of the families of Oria, with certaine other gentlemen: wherein offering all things to spoile and ruine, they obtained in that mutinie more by force then free will of the Citie, that the day after it might be ordained in the publike Councels (wherein were assistant very few of the Nobles) that of those offices which afore were deuided equally betweene the Nobles and commons, there might bee hereafter distribution made of two partes to the people, and one onely reserued to the Nobles: to which deliberation Roccaber guiding the Citie in the absence of Philip Rauastin then gouernour for the king, consented for feare of greater perils: neuerthelesse the populars not being quieted for all this, but ouercaried with their mutinous humours, stirred vp within few dayes after a new tumult, and put the Noblemens houses to sacke: an outrage that compelled most part of the Gentlemen to abandon the Citie, finding no estate of suretie in their naturall regions. These mutations being estoones signified to the gouernour, caused him to returne with speed out of Fraunce to Genes with a strength of an hundred and fiftie horse, & seuen hundred footmen. But neither with his authoritie, his perswasions, his presence, nor with his forces, could he reduce things to a better estate: so irregulate is a communaltie or multitude once drawne into mutinie, and their barbarous furie inuincible against all reason, order, or good prescription. No, oftentimes he was compelled to apply himselfe to the will of the people, and making his authoritie rather to be plausible to the multitude, then to punish their mutinies, he passed ouer things with sufferance, and obeyed the necessitie of the time, commaunding to retire and returne certaine other troupes that were appointed to come after him out of Fraunce. These beginnings gaue courage to the Commons to become more insolent, and (as it hapneth often in Cities declined to sedition) the gouernement, contrarie to the will of manie of the best sort of the Commons, fell almost absolutely into the power of the dregges of the people, who in their furie created to the selues a new magistracie or office of eight men of the populars with a great authority: and they, the rather to keepe the whole incensed by the dignitie of their name, were called Tribunes of the people. These, vnder this forme of pollicie, or rather apparant mutinie, occupied with armes the towne of Spetie, with certaine other townes of the riuer of Leuant, whereof Iohn Lewis de Fiesquo was gouernour for the king. This gouernour complained to the king of those insolencies, both in the name name of the whole Nobilitie, and for his particular interest, wherein he recommended to his Maiestie the manifest danger to loose the iurisdiction of Genes, seeing the insolent libertie of the commons had caried them so farre, that besides other oppressions & harms, they aspired (proceeding directly against the authoritie of the king) to manage the townes of the riuer: That vsing expedition, there might be raised remedies conuenient to repress so great a furie, seeing it was as yet but in the nature of a popular warre, without the protection of anie greater Prince: where if he ioyned negligence to the oportunitie, and became slow in leauing the prouisions that were necessarie, the euill would more and more resolue, and take with tract of time more firme roote, for that both the importance of Genes was such by sea and land, that it would easily allure some forreine Prince to nourish such a diuision, so hurtfull for his estate: And also the commons comming to know that which at the beginning was perhaps but in the qualitie of sedition, would in the end change ha-bite, and turne into rebellion, and so become a pray to any that would giue hope to defend it. But on the other part, the Embasiadors sent to the king from the Commons of Genes, laboured to iu-stifie the action, and to make their cause be found good: They declared, that no other thing had disaltered the people, but the pride of the gentlemen, who, not contented with the dignities and honors conuenient to nobilitie, aspired to higher degrees, seeking to be redoubted as Lords and Princes: That the people had long borne the yoke of their insolencies, but at last feeling outrages not onely in their goods and generall callings, but also in their persons and estates most priuate, their patience was now overcome with the weight and violence of their pride: And yet albeit by these compulsions, they were no longer able to containe themselves: they were not for all that proceeded to any other actions, then such as without the which their libertie could not be assured: for, seeing the gentlemen communicated by equall part in the offices and iurisdctions, there was no possibilitie by the meane of courts and iudgements, to resist their tyrannie: And Iohn Lowis commaunding ouer the townes of the riuers, without the traffike whereof Genes stood as it were besieged, there was no safetie for the Commons to entertaine traffike and conuersation there: That the people had bene alwayes most deuout and faithfull to the kings Maiestie, and that the mutations of Genes had in all times more proceeded of the ambition of the gentlemen, then infidelitie of the people: That they besought the king to pardon those offences, which during the heate of the contentions, certaine particulars had committed against the vniuersall will and consent, & that he would confirme the law made for the distribution of offices, and suffer the townes of the riuers to be managed vnder the name publike: Lastly, that by that meane, the gentlemen enioying honorably their degrees and dignities, and the populars also possessing their libertie with suretie, and all things being reduced by his Maiesties authoritie into such an estate of tranquillitie, they should be bound to honor perpetually the clemencie, goodnesse and iustice of the king. The king was much troubled with these tumults, either for that the licentious behauiours of the commons were suspected to him, or perhaps for the honorable inclination which the French do commonly beare to the name of gentlemen: in so much that he could haue bene disposed to haue punished the authors of these insolencies, and reduce all things to their first degree, sauing that he feared least if he should vse sharpe remedies, the Genoways would haue recourse to Cesar, whose sonne was not yet dead.

 For which cause, making conference of things, more according to the necessitie and consideration of the time, then agreeable to the estate and merite of their doings, he determined to proceed with clemencie and tolleration, and therefore called into pardon and forgiuenesse all their offences they had committed, and ratified their new law for disposing of offices, so far forth as they would put into his hands the townes of the riuers which they occupied: wherein the better to encline and dispose the people, he sent to Genes doctor Michael Ruccio a banished man, to perswade the Commons, that they were better to vse and embrace the occasion of the kings clemencie, then (adding to their faults, contumacie and hardened obstinacie) to driue him to proceed against them with se-ueritie. But discretion hauing no societie with rashnesse, nor follie anie communitie with wisdom, their minds seemed to stand blinded with immoderate ambition and couetousnesse: for the people and Tribunes (notwithstanding the lawfull Magistrates were of the contrarie opinion) would not onely not render the places they occupied (nor accepting the softnes and tractabilitie of the king) but rising into thoughts of worse nature, they determined to assaile the borough of Monaco, which Lucian Grimault possessed, either in regard of a common hatred borne against all Gentlemen of Genes, or else for that the borough is of great importance for the Citie, hauing his situation vpon the sea in a place of great conueniencie: or at least for certaine particular hatreds, since he to whom falleth the power and gouernement of that place, abstaineth verie hardly from piracies & robbing by the sea, the situation giuing fauour and oportunitie to such actions: & lastly, because (as they suggested) that borough appertained rightfully to the common weale. In which regards, notwithstanding the importunities of the gouernour to the contrarie, they sent thither many bands both by sea and land to besiege it: the same driuing Philip de Ranastin, who knew that he taried there vnprofitably, and, by the accidents that might happen, not without suspicion of daunger, to depart, & to leaue in his place Rocabertin. The king for his part, despairing that temperance was vnable to raunge things to a better forme, and iudging withall that if he should consent that they continued in that estate, it might be preiudiciall to his dignitie and suretie, and lastly, fearing that if he gaue longer sufferance to things, the daunger would be so much the greater: he began openly to make preparations both by sea and land, to reduce the Genowayes to his obedience. Which deliberation was the cause, that matters which were negociated betweene the Pope and him against the Venetians, were dissolued & broken: enterprises much desired by the king, who for the death of king Philip, found him selfe well deliuered of the suspicions which he had taken against Maximilian: but much more wished for by the Pope, by reason of the townes which they occupied in Romania, and did dispose of the Bishopricks vacant in their iurisdiction, without any respect to the sea Apostolike, and lastly did intrude them selues into many things appertaining to the lawfull authoritie of the Church. By reason whereof bearing a setled inclination to entertaine amitie with the king, he solicited him to passe into Italy, and to haue conference together; whereunto the king consented, the Pope hauing afore in gratification of the kings requests, consecrated Cardinals the Bishops of Bayeux and Achx. But (the affections of Princes suffer alterations according to times and occasions) the Pope vnderstanding afterwarde how the king had determined to take armes against the Commons of Genes in fauour of the Gentlemen, tooke it to great discontentment, for that hauing of long time frowned vpon the Gentlemen, he had alwayes borne fauour to the dispositions of the people: wherein he made great instance to the king to be contented, without chaunging the estate popular, to haue that Citie in his obedience; and perswaded him as much as he could to abstaine from armes, alleaging many reasons, but chiefly the daunger, least by that meane some great alteration kindling in Italy, the warres which they had determined against the Venetians, were not cut off or hindred. The king bearing no inclination to these demaunds, the Pope, either ouerruled with anger or sorow, or else for that the old suspicion of the aspiring mind of the Cardinall of Amboise did eftsoones stirre in him, either by the naturall operation of him selfe, or by the subtil suggestion of others (which made him feare to be retained by the king when they should meete in one place) and perhaps aswell for the one as the other occasion: he published on the sudden, in the beginning of the yeare 1507, against the expectation of euery one, that he would eftsoones returne to Rome, not for other reason, then that aire of Bologna was contrarie to his health, and that his reuenues were much diminished by his absence from Rome. This alteration of counsell brought no litle maruell to euery one, but specially to the king, for that without occasion he would leaue vnperfect the practises he had so much desired to aduance, and breake of himselfe the interview and conference which he had so much required: and therefore calling into consideration the estate and intricate disposition of things, he laboured what he could to draw him from that new counsell, and make him change opinion: wherein his paines were more hurtfull to him then vaine, for that the Pope entring into a greater suspicion for the request the king made, made eftsoones an obstinate confirmation of his first counsell, and departing from Bologna vpon the end of Februarie, he expressed how litle he could dissemble the contempt he had conceived against the king. Afore he issued out of the Citie, he set with vnfortunate signes the first stone of the Castle which was made there by his commaundement, neare the gate which leades to Ferrara, in the selfe same place where Philip Maria Viscount Duke of Millan had aforetime erected another with no lesse ill fortune. And his new anger against the French king hauing in some sort qualified his auncient hatred against the Venetians, and not minding to turne out of his right way, he determined to passe by the Citie of Faenza, new controuerfies happening from time to time between the French king and him, both for that here required that the familie of the Bentiuoleu might be expelled the Duchie of Millan, notwithstanding they were referred to that habitation by his consent: & also for that he would not render to the Pronotorie the possession of those benefices which

He had promised by his proper accord and consent (so often preuailed more in him the contention of his mind and his wilfull election, then either reason or equitie.) Which disposition the king laboured not to appeale with any art or diligence, but standing aggraued for so great a variation, and entring withall into suspition, least (as the truth was) he gaue secret encouragement to the people of Genes, he forbare not to threaten him openly, and to obiekt with iniurious words, his infamous place and birth, the Pope being descended of a verie base place, and trained for manie yeares in verie vile estate. And resolving more and more in his first deliberation touching the affaires of Genes, he prepared his armie with great diligence to go thither in person, hauing well experienced by his former successes in the kingdome of Naples, what difference there is to administer a warre in proper person, and to recommend it ouer to the doing of Captaines.

These preparatiōs amazed nothing the Genowayes being busie to take Monaco, about the which they kept employed many vessels, and fixe thousand men leauied of the Communalities and generall multitudes of the countreys of Genes. These bands were led and commaunded by Tarlato a Captaine of the Pisans, who, together with Peter Shortlegge and certaine vniuerfall souldiers, had bene sent by them in fauor of the Genowayes. And at Genes, as they perseuered in their first offences, adding alwayes some new transgression, the Captaine of the Castell, who till then had expressed no action, nor had not bene molested by the conspirators, vpon the sudden made many of the Commons prisoners, and began to vex the hauen and Citie with his artilleries. This was either by the kings commaundement, or vpon his owne authoritie ioyned to a desire to make pillage: by reason of which, Roccaberti in conferring with the common daunger of the towne, the priuate feare he had of his owne person, went his way, not whither he would (for extremitie leaues no libertie) but whither the necessitie of his fortune suffered him, the footbands of the French which were set to guard the publike Pallace, retyring into the Castell. A litle after, the siege which had remained afore Monaco many moneths, tookē end and brake vp; the reason was, that such as were encamped afore it, vnderstanding that Tues d'Alegre and many gentlemen were at hand to succour it with a strength of three thousand footmen of their owne pay, and certaine other bands which the Duke of Sauoy had sent, had leauied the siege, hauing no courage to abide the armie that marched. Besides, the bruter an, that the maine armie appointed for the king, passed continually into Lumbardie: by reason whereof, those men rising into increase of furie, who ought to haue bene the authors of better counsels, the Commons that till that day had dissembled with words the rebellion which they had exercised in deeds, & neither forbearing to call vpon the name of the French king, nor once touching his Armes, nor remouing his ensignes nor banners out of the publike places, created Duke of Genes one Paule de Nove a silke dyer, a man for his vertues, of no merite, and for his birth and descending, of very base place and condition; declaring themselves in this, manifest rebels, for that to the creation of Duke was ioyned a declaration, that the Citie of Genes should beare no subiection to any Prince: the same so stirring the king to greater anget, together with the relation of the Nobles, that they had deposed his Armories, and in their place had exalted the ensignes of Cesar, that he redoubled the preparations which he had prouided afore: wherein he was also so much the more kindled to reuenge and wrath, by how much Cesar, at the perswasions of the Genowayes, and haply by the Popes secret setting on, had written to him that he ought not to molest Genes as a towne of the Empire, offering so to labour, that the people should be raunged and reduced to all things iust and reasonable. The Duke and Tribunes were somewhat nourished in their rash boldnes, by certaine prosperous successes they had had on the coast of Leuant: for, Ierome the sonne of Louis de Fiesquo, hauing reconquered Rapallo with two thousand footmen & certaine horse, as he went by night to surprise Recqua, encountred the bands that were sent from Genes to succour it: and whether it were by any disaduantage of the place, or for any other peculiar respect of feare or daunger, he forbare to entertaine the skirmish, and without comming to short weapons, he fell disorderly to flying. Whereupon Orlandin nephew to Iohn Louis, which was marched as farre as Recqua with another regiment, did the like, hearing the noise of the chase. By this fortune the Duke and the Tribunes became more insolent, and in those glorying humors proceeded to besiege Castellaccio, an ancient Castell which the ancient Lords of Millan builded in the mountaines about Genes, at such times as they were commanders ouer that Citie, to serue as a helpe that those companies which they should send out of Lumbardy, might haue oportunitie to approach neare Genes, and succour the Castell, which containing a verie small garrison, they forced it and tooke it easily: for that the French bands that were there, yeelded vnder faith to haue their goods and life preserved, which, according to the infidelitie of a composition, was not obserued, those that were the executors of such outrages, returning to Genes with bloudie hands and great reioycings, as tokens of their glorie and triumph. At the same time also they began to batter with their artilleries, the Castell and the Church of Saint Francis ioyning to it, their fortune making them blind against discretion and reason, as men more mightie in felicitie and chaunce, then in force or good experience. And albeit the king was already passed into Italy, and reenforced his armie continually to assaile Genes without delay: and the king Catholike, notwithstanding he wished their conseruation, would not shew himselfe deuידed from the French king, but furnished him with foure light galleys. And lastly, albeit the Pope durst not otherwise disclose his intentions the in giuing them secret hopes, & that they were desperately abandoned of all succour, he had but onely three hundred footmen forreiners, not one Captaine or commaunder experienced in warre, and great lacke of munitions: yet were they resolute, and continued in their obstinacie, reposing much for themselves in the straights of their countrey, and that by the difficulties and sharpnesse of wayes and passages they might easily let the enemy for comming neare Genes: and as men esteeming certaintie in the winde, they despised, in regard of these vaine hopes, the admonitions of manie, and specially the counsels of the Cardinall of Finale, who accompanying the French armie, perswaded them by many messengers and letters, to offer vp themselves to the kings will, giuing them hope to obtaine pardon and conditions tollerable. But the armie marching by the way of the borough of Fornaro and Serauallo, the vanitie of the enterprises of the Genowayes began to appeare, being not measured nor layed out by men trayned in warre, but followed with clamours and vaine braggings of a base and ignorant multitude. In so much as the courages of men nothing answering in a present perill, to that which they had promised when they were without feare, sixe hundred of their footemen set to guard their first straights, being charged by the Frenchmen, fled cowardly; by whose example, the residue that kept the other passages, abandoned their places and retired to Genes, leauing all the straights open to the French, whose armie hauing passed ouer without impediment the toppe of the mountaines, was now descended into the vale of Pozzennero within seuen miles of Genes: A matter that did not a litle amaze and maruell the Genowayes, for that contrary to their vndiscrete expectations, they saw their armie so hardie, as to encampe in that valley frontired with troublesome mountaines, and in the middest of the enemies countrey. At the same time also the kings nauie which contained eight light galleys, eight gallions, with many Fusts and Brigantines, presented themselves before Genes, and from thence sailed towards Portonenero and Spezia, pursuing the Genoway nauie being seuen galleys and sixe barks; which not daring to keepe the hauen of Genes, were withdrawn into those places. From the valley of Pozzennero the armie drew to the borough of Riuarola two miles within Genes, and neare to the Church of S. Peter d'Arene, which is ioyning to the sea: and albeit as they marched, they met in many places with diuerse footbands of the Genowayes, yet they all being of one resolution, and possessed with one pusillanimitie of minde, fled afore them, their feares being greater then their daungers. This day arriued in the armie the person of the king, and was lodged in the Abbey of Bosbet, right ouer against the borough of Riuarola: he was accompanied with the most part of the Nobles of Fraunce, with many numbers of Gentlemen of the Duchie of Millan, and with the Marquis of Mantua, whom not many dayes before the king had declared chiefe of the order of Saint Michael, and giuen vnto him the standerd, which had not bene giuen to any since the death of king Louis the eleuenth. In the French armie were eight hundred Launces (the king considering the difficulties of the countrey, had left the others in Lumbardie) a thousand and eight hundred light horsemen, sixe thousand Swissers, and sixe thousand footmen of other nations. It is to be vnderstood, that the Genowayes (because they would not leaue free that way which leades by the mountaines to Castellaccio, and so to Genes, a shorter way then by Saint Peter d'Arene, and ioyning to the sea) had builded a bastillion on the top of the mountaine called the Promontorie hill, betweene the borough of Riuarola and Saint Peter d'Arene, from which bastillion the way lay from Castellaccio by the backside of the rocke. The armie then that lay encamped at Riuarola, marched the same day to the said bastillion: and on the other part, there issued out of Genes eight thousand footmen, guided by Iacques Corse Lieutenant to Tarlatin: for Tarlatin & the souldiers of the Pisans which were enclosed in Venimiglia when the

The campe was leaued from before Monaco, albeit they were reuoked by the Genowayes, who for their conduction sent them the ship of Demetrius Iustinian, could not returne to Genes by land for the impediment of the French, nor by sea, for that the winds were contrarie. But the French being now to issue and ascend, discouered the foot-roopes of the Genowayes, who being ascended to the mountaine by that side of the valley that leades to the bastillion, and afterwarde the most part of them being descended, had made head aboue a rocke which is the halfe way of the mountaine: against whom Monsieur de Chaumont sent many gentlemen with a good strength of footemen. The Genowayes as well for their oddes in numbers, as the aduantage of the place, made a valiant defence, and that to the great damage of the French, who making a contempt of their enemies, for that they were bands compounded vpon artificers and people vniuersall, went gallantly to charge them, without considering the strength and situation of the place: and as Monsieur de Paliffa was hurt in the throate, but with no perill of life, Monsieur Chaumont seeking to driue them from thence, caused to be mounted on high two Cannons, which beating them in flanke, constrained them to retire to the mountaine, where the residue of their strength remained. The French following them in good order of warre, those that garded the bastillion (albeit for his seate and fortification, they might with suretie abide the Cannon) fearing least vpon them & such as were vpon the mountaine, might fall some of the French bands, they left it abandoned, to their great infamy; by meane whereof, such as from the rocke had begun to retire towards the bastillion, seeing their way was cut off, returned eftsoues to Genes by ditches and cawseys, leauing the ordinary pathes, and loosing in the retraite about three hundred bodies. These successes brought an incredible feare ouer all the Citie, which depending wholly vpon the willes of the inferiour multitudes, neither directed by counsels of warre, nor ruled by ciuill wisdom, sent two Embassadors to the Armie, to sollicite to render them selues vnder couenants conuenient: they could not haue audience nor access to the king, but were referred to be heard by the Cardinall of Amboise, who made them answer, that there was no disposition in the king to accept them, if they did not make a free and generall offer of their liues and goods to the kings absolute discretion, sparing to intromit all motions of capitulations or couenants, they that in the offence had not respected his Maiestie, nor their fidelitie. But during the parley with the Cardinall (it is hard to moderate a multitude giuen ouer to nutinie) one part of the Commons not enclined to reconciliation and peace, going out of Genes by heapes, displayed their ensignes with many other footebands, vpon the rockes and side of the valley which leadech from Castellaccio: they approached within a quarter of a mile of the Bastillion, ioping to recouer it, and entertaining the skirmish for three houres with certaine of the French bands that came against them, they retired at last to Castellaccio, neither reioicing in their fortune, nor leauing to their enemies any aduantage. All which meane while, the king more fearefull of a greater stirre, then well assured of the conquest, remained alwayes armed on horsebacke in a plaine betweene the riuer of Pozzenero and the place where the armie was encamped, his minde waueing, and his expectation not satisfied. Neuerthelesse the night following the Genowayes, whose counsels were now desperate, as the brute was common, that certaine principals of the people had secretly conspired and compounded with the king euen from the time he entred Ast, and the Commons ioyning to their declining condition, many complaints that they had bene abused: the Duke, with many of those that knew that no submission was worthy of place, nor their faults meet to be dispensed withall, together with all the regiments of Pisans, departed to go to Pisa, leauing the Citie to discretion, as themselves were driuen to follow their fortune. The morning following by the appearing of the day, the same Embassadors returned eftsoues to the campe, and consented to giue vp the towne to the kings discretion, not hauing sustained the warre aboue eight dayes: a notable example of the ignorance and confusion of multitudes and people, who grouning their doings vpon fallible hopes & vaine expectations, are furious when the danger is far off, very irresolute when peril approacheth, not temperat in their counsels, irregulate in their actions, for their cōmon affections, most dissolute & immoderate. The accord being made, the king with his army approached neare Genes, the footmen being bestowed in the suburbs, who became almost tractable, specially the Swissers, whom there was much to do to restrain fro entring the towne, & to make pillage of the goods: so sweet a pray is the spoile of a Citie, & so vnbridled is the mercenarie souldier that serueth but for his hire, bearing for the most part very negligent respects to equity, order, or conscience. After this Monsieur Chaumont entred into Genes with the most part of the other regiments, having first furnished Castellaccio with garrison. The Genowayes delivered vp to him all the armes as well publike as priuat, which were immediately bestowed in the Castell, with three peeces of artillerie brought thither by the Pisans, & afterwards reconueyed to Millean. The next day being the xxix of Aprill, the person of the king made his entrie into Genes, with all the companies of men at armes and archers of his guard. And as he was alighted vnder a stately arch, holding in his hand a naked sword, and himselfe all attired in white garments, there appeared afore him the familie of the Amians accompanied with many honorable Citizens, who falling at his feete with teares, sorow and submission, and all other arguments of offenders, the one of them in the name of the whole, after silence was graunted, besought the king in this sort:

*The submission of the rebells of

We come not here vpon our knees (right mercifull king) to debate the transgressions we haue done, but to offer our selues guiltie in as many faults as it shall please you to heape against vs: our rebellion so late and apparant testifieth how little we hold of innocencie, and our aggriued minds shew forth how much we are humbled by the remorse and conscience of our proper disobedience. The innocent man finds words to speake, but to the offender it is hard to keepe a temperance in his tale, specially where the greatnesse of the fault exceeds the expectation of mercie or forgiuenesse. None can better iudge of sorow then such as are afflicted, nor any further off to speake for pardon then the minds that stand heauily loaden with the burthen of their proper transgressions: it takes away their libertie of speaking, and makes them more ashamed to confesse a fault then to do it, confounding the nature of the offence with the remorse of conscience that followeth, which mans frailtie cannot suppress. If we would be silent, our humilities yet speake for vs, attired with all those demonstrations of dolour which nature in any sort can disclose in hearts desolate and abandoned. And albeit (most Christian Prince) in the beginning of our commotions against our gentlemen, we may assure that most part of the Commons were chiefe actors; yet touching things that haue bene insolently done, but chiefly the contempt and disobedience to your commaundements, they haue proceeded from the dregs of the most base and inferior sort of people, whose rashnesse, the reuerent authoritie of the best sort of this Citie could not restraine. And therefore the punishment that shall be imposed either vpon this towne, or vpon vs, it will afflict the innocents, without hurting the authors or parties to so hainous transgressions, who neither possessed of goods nor place in the Citie, are not esteemed with vs in the Societie of men, and much lesse of Citizens; neither do they hold this wretched Citie for their patrimonie and countrey. But our calamity hauing no conformitie with excuses, our intention is not to alleage reasons, but referring vs to the same iustice which we confesse we haue offended, we come accompanied with no other hope then such as may yet remaine in the magnanimitie and mercie of so great a king, not reasoning how farre it may be stretched, but reposing simply in it, and most humbly beseeching the same, that as not long since the offenders of Millean found fauour in your eyes, you will also vse the same propertie of grace and forgiuenesse vpon this Citie, which within these few moneths was one of the most happie regions in the world, and now lyeth at your Maiesties feete the very example of all desolation and miserie. If the clemencie you vsed then, ran through the world, with reputation ioyned to a perpetuall glorie of your name, it cannot be lesse honorable to confirme it now in this action, vsing equal pietie and compassion. You beare a title of right Christian, which deriueth his beginning of Christ redeeming mankind; by whose example, clemencie and mercie are recommended to you, as next vnder him appertaining properly to your name and title. There are faults so great which may not be either pardoned or excused; and for the offences we haue committed against your Maiestie, though in the respect of vs they are abominable, and for their owne nature hatefull, and in the iudgement of the world irreparable, yet can they not be more great, more vile, nor more odious, then that your clemencie is not sufficient to qualifie them, nor beare such intollerable respects as cannot be raunged by your pitie, bountie, and perpetuall religion. Your Maiestie representeth amongst vs with your dignitie and power, the image of the great God, and you are bound no lesse to represent him with the semblance and similitude of will and working, whereof there is not one more glorious, none more agreeable, nor any that makes his name more wonderfull, then the action of mercie. In cases of offence and trespassse, by how much the fault is great & grieuous, by so much more religious is the nature that pitieth, but farre more worthy the clemencie that forgiueth, since to fall and erre is familiar to frailty and humanity; but to pardon & dispence is a propertie inspired of the liuing God. These speeches were followed with the lowd voyces of euery one, ore, crying, Mercy, mercy. But the king passed on without giuing any answer, bidding them neuertheless to rise, and deliuering his naked sword which he held in his hand; he shewed some tokens of a minde more inclined to compassion then to crueltie: hee ascended immediatly to the great Church, wherein infinit flocks of women and children of both kinds, fell prostrate at his feet, crying vpon his clemencie and mercie with weeping and wringing of hands, and other demonstrations of humilitie, expressed also in their vniuersall attire of white. This was it that most moued the king, notwithstanding the others were not without their particular impressions, in so much that albeit he was determined to depriue the Citie of all gouernement and authoritie, and to confiske the reuenues which vnder the name of S. George belonged to many persons priuate, and lastly taking from them all forme and image of liberty, to reduce them into the same state of subiection which he had done the townes of Millan; yet considering afterwarde, that by this maner of proceeding, not onely many innocentes should be punished, but also the mindes of the whole nobilitie estranged, and that it would be more easie to him to gouerne with remission and sweetnesse, then with rigour & seueritie, he reconfirmed the auncient gouernement, & left it in the same forme wherein it was before the seditions. And yet, to temper his mercy with some iustice, and somewhat to accompany his clemencie with seueritie, hee condemned the communaltie in a hundred thousand duckats for the penaltie of the offence, with aggrauation of penaltie of two hundred thousand duckats more, payable within a certaine time, both to defray the charges he had sustained, & also to edifie a Citadell in the place where is the towre of Codisa not farre from Genes, & standing vpon the sea about that suburbe which leadeth to the valley of Pozzennero and S. Peter in Arena: which Citadell, for that it may commaund the hauen and whole Citie, is rightfully called the bridle. He ordained also that they should furnish a greater garrison then they were wont, & keepe continually armed in the hauen for his seruice, three gallies, and fortifie the Castell and Castellaccio: he brake all the capitulations and couenants that had bene made afore betweene the Citie and him, graunting to them againe all the same things, but in forme of priuiledge, and not in nature of couenant charter, to the end he might alwayes stand in power to depriue them: he defaced out of their moneys and coynes their auncient stampes, causing them for afterwards to beare his standers and stamp in signe of absolute superioritie. To these actions was added the death of Demetrius Iustinian, who was beheaded, disclosing in his examination all the practises which the Pope had made, together with the hopes hee had giuen them. Within few moneths after was beheaded Paule de Nouo lately made Duke, who sayling from Pisa to Rome, was betrayed by a pirate that had bene his souldier, & sold to the French men: A death not much lamented of any, for that aspiring to his creation not by descent or merite, but by rash election, there was left to him no power to exercise the humours of a Prince: and to himselfe so much the lesse grieuous, by how much the short continuance of his imperie cut from him those delites which dominio do breed, loosing with litle sorow the thing which he had got with litle paine, & of the which his fortune gaue him no oportunitie to tast the very first and greene fruites. After the king had ordained these things, solemnly receiuing of the Genowayes an oath of fidelitie, and giuing pardon to all, except to three score whom he committed to the disposition of the law, he went to Millan, disperfing immediatly after this conquest, his armie, with the which continuing the course of victorie, he might easily haue oppressed in Italie whom he had list, all the Potentates there standing more in feare of his power, then any way provided to resist perils. But hauing regard to the estate of things, and promise he had made, he dissolued his armie, the better to assure the Pope, the king of Romanes, & the Venetians, who were not without fearefull suspicions, that his discending into Italie was for some other cause then to range the rebels of Genes, and reduce the towne to a policie.

But nothing could appease the fretting minde of the Pope, who taking all things in the worst part, complained effsoones (not temperatly) of the king, as if it had bin by his meane, that Anniball Bentiuole with fixe hundred footemen leuied in the Duchie of Millan, did assay in those times to enter Bologna, assuring that if he had preuailed in that action, the king would yet haue declared himself more against the estate Ecclesiastike. Wherewith the Pope being wroth, notwithstanding he had before with great difficultie published Cardinals the Bishops of Achx and Bayeux, he refused to raise to that dignitie the Bishop of Albie, complaining chiefly that by Monsieur de Chaumont his brother, the Bentiuoleis had sufferance to dwell in the Duchie of Millan: yea (which was of greater consequence) the Pope ouerruled indifferently with hate & suspition (two violent passions in a minde placed in authoritie) when the king first published that he would reduce the nowayes to obedience by armes, signified by his Nuncios and peculiar letters to the king of Germanes and Electours of the Empire, that the French king prepared to passe into Italie with a most mightie armie, vnder colour to reappease the tumultes of Genes, which he might redresse with his authoritie, his intention being to oppresse the estate of the Church, and vsurpe the dignitie of the Empire. The Venetians also ioyned with him in this certificat, hauing the same feares of the coming of the French into Italie with an armie so well addressed: which aduertisements being communicated with Maximilian, whose inclination embraced naturally new things, and being at the instant newly returned from Flanders, where he had practised in vaine to take the gouernement of his little sonne: he assembled in the towne of Constance, the Princes of Germanie and the free townes (those are called the free Cities, which acknowledging by certaine tributes and determinate payments the authoritie of the Empire, do gouerne them selues notwithstanding in all things by their owne lawes, not seeking to amplifie their territories, but to preferue their libertie.) At this assemblee appeared all the Princes, Barons, and communalities of Germanie, perhaps with more readinesse and in greater numbers then had bene seene long time before in any dyot: for thither resorted in person, all the Electors and Princes of Germany both Ecclesiastike and Secular, except such as were restrained by lawfull impediments, in whose places were sent either their sonnes, their brethren, or some very neare kinred to represent their personall presence. All the free townes in like sort sent thither Embassadours: in which generall assemblee & aspect of the vniuersall body of Germany, Caesar caused to be publikey read the Popes writ, with many other letters signifiatorie from diuerse places, some of them expressing that the French kings intention was to aduaunce the Cardinall of Amboise to the supreme sea of Rome, & to receiue of him the Imperiall crowne. These aduertisements breeding no small murmure in the mindes of the audience, ran through the Princes & Barons with great variety of iudgement, some of them fearing indeed the ambition of the king, but the most sort disdayning much so great an indignitie against the maiestie & crowne Imperiall, wherein as euery particular began to prepare himself to make knowne with words and speeches his opinion & affection, Caesar cutting off that inclination by his authority, spake to them in this sort: You see now (my Lordes) what effectes, the long patience we haue hitherunto vsed, hath brought forth, what fruites “ are gathered of the small reckening that hath bene made of my former complaints expressed in so “ many dyots. And now your owne eyes do behold that the French king, who heretofore durst not “ offer himselfe against any thing that appertained to the sacred Empire, but vpon occasions vrged & “ colours very apparant, is now in preparation with an open force, not to protect our rebels as he was “ wont, not to vsurpe any particular place which reasonably apperteineth to the Empire, but, taking “ the oportunitie of the time, turning our patience into mockery, and forming an aduantage and oc“ casion vpon our long setled negligence, he draweth his sword to dispoile Germanie of the Imperi“ all dignitie, so honorably gotten, and so long time continued, by the vertue and valour of our an“ cesters: he is not entred into this boldnesse, by any coniecture or perswasion that either our forces are “ diminished, or his powers encreased, neither can he be ignorant by how much the region of Ger-“ manie is mighty aboue the nation of Fraunce, both in maiestie of imperie, in grauitie of counsell, in “ agilitie of bodies, in multitude of Princes, in obedience of subiectes, & generally without all com“ parison in valour of Captaines, and resolution of souldiers, in moneys, in munitions, in disciplines & “ directions of warre, with all other furnishings requisite to defend a violence and offend a proud “ enemy. But he is caried into this ambitious enterprise onely by a hope, that according to the expe“ rience of things past, we will still dwell in securitie and negligence, and that our proper dissensions “ and ciuill factions preuaile more with vs, then the prouocations of glorie, yea then the considera“ tion of our particular safetie: he thinketh that the same respectes for the which we haue suffered

 “ he hopeth that the same sufferance, securitie, and solemne negligence, will likewise keepe vs lulled “ asleepe to endure that by him should be rauished from vs the dignitie of the Empire, and the glory “ and felicitie of this nation transported into Fraunce: it would be a thing lesse infamous to our com“ mon name, and to me in particular lesse grievous and intollerable, if it were knowne to the world, not

not continued the same vertue which in all ages, in all actions, & in all fortunes was found to beare reputation about the valour of the French: for the damage should afflict me lesse then the infamie, since at the least, things should not be imputed to our negligence & indiscretion, which might proceede either of the condition of times, or of the malice of fortune. What greater calamitie can happen? what miserie more, then to be reduced to these termes, either to wish to be lesse mightie, or to make a willing election of a great damage, onely to auoyde (since otherwise it can not be) the perpetuall infamie and dishonour of our name? The magnanimitie of euery one of you so many times experienced in matters particular, your resolute courage proper & naturall to this nation: and lastly, the memorie of the ancient vertue and triumphes of our elders (the very terrour heretofore of all other realmes and kingdomes) do giue me both hope and assurance, that in an action of so great importance, your inuincible mindes will be awaked and receiue new life and spirite: for here is now no question of the alienatiō of the Duchie of Mullan, nor of the reuolting of the Swissers, in which actions of so great consequence there was made no great account of my authoritie, both in regard of the affinitie I had with Lodowik Sforce, and for the particular interests of the house of Austrich. But now my Lords, what excuse may we pretend? what colour or couerture may be giuen to our ignominie? what merite can we challenge in the world, or what maiestie can we hold at home, when it is euen now in question whether the Almaines, who stand possessed of the Romaine Empire, not by the hand of fortune, but by their proper vertue, and whose name and armes heretofore hath sounded feare and terrour to most Princes in Christendome, should now cowardly depose the selues of so great a dignitie, & remaining the perpetuall exāple of infamie, of the most ancient, most glorious, and most inuincible Monarchie of men, to become the most reuerfed, most despised, & most dishonored region that stādeth vnder the view and face of the skie? If these reasons, if these interests, if these disdaines will not moue you, what can be further obiected against your securitie & negligence? if these respectes, if these contemplations of perill, infamie, and perpetuall ruine, can stirre vp no life in you, what can be sayd in more importunitie? what can kindle in you the seedes of the valour and resolution of your elders, if your mindes be not inclined to the consideration of these aduersaries? In ages and posterities to come, with what sorow shall your children & descendants remember your names, if you leaue not vnto them the name of Almaines in the same degree of greatnesse, authoritie, and reputation, wherein your fathers left it transferred to you? But let vs fall from those sortes of comfortes & perswasions, for that it is an office inconuenient in me, whom you haue lifted to the height of this place, to vse such libertie of wordes, but rather to recommend to you deedes and examples. I am determined to passe into Italie, vnder pretence to receiue the Imperiall crowne; a solemnitie as you know more full of ceremonie, then of substance, for that the authoritie and dignitie Imperiall depend wholly vpon your electiō. But my principall intention is, to breake the necke of the wicked purposes and plots of the French, and to chase them out of the Duchie of Mullan, seeing we haue no other suretie against their insolencies. I hope there resteth in none of you all any difficultie, to accompanie me according to your custome with other Emperors going to be crowned, neither doubt I, that carying with me your harts & affections, ioyning with all your forces to mine, I shal not passe a journey victorious, marching with such felicitie, as the most of the potentates and communalities in Italie will meete me as petitioners, some to confirme their priuiledges, some to implore our iustice against the oppressions they suffer, and some to appease with a deuout submission, the ire of the victor. I doubt not, but the French king will giue place at the first brute of our comming, that nation bearing yet in memorie, that being but yong and almost an infant, I brake with true valour and magnanimitie, the armie of king Lows, the eleuenth neare Guinegaste, since which time that kingdome refusing to make experience of my armes, haue neuer fought with me but by ambushes and conspiracies. Consider with that reputation and magnanimitie, which so long hath liued inuested in the name of the Almaines, whether it agreeth with your honour, with your renowne, and with our common perill, in a case so extraordinarie, to make extraordinarie prouisions. The glorie and greatnesse of our name, to the which this hath bene alwayes proper and peculiar to defend the dignitie of the Popes of Rome, and the authoritie Apostolike, & which now are wickedly defiled by the ambitiō & impietie of the Frēch king, calleth vs, I say, with the common decree of all Germany, to draw our swords & turne our scepters to so holy, so iust, & so reuerent a protection. It is an interest that is wholly yours, seeing I haue sufficiently acquitted the ductie I owe, in making so ready assembly of you, to lay afore you the common daunger, vrging you with the exāple of my deliberation. The resolution of courage shall not war. I me to communicate with you in all daungers, & lesse shall you lacke the disposition of my person, be-custumed of long time to endure paine and trauell, neither is my counsell in conducting a warre so insufficient, either by greatnesse of age, or doubtfulnesse of experience, as, in this enterprise you may haue want of a leader worthy of so great an honor. And by how much you shall honor & set forth the greatnesse of your king with fulnesse of authoritie, by how much you shall honor him with an armie mightie and appointed, with so much the more facilitie and your perpetuall glory, shall you be protectours of the libertie of the Church of Rome our common mother, & leaue exalted to heauen, together with the reputatiō of the Almaine name, the Imperiall dignity, comon to you all in greatnesse and amplitude, and particular onely to this nation in iust office of procection.

This speech wrought maruellously in the mindes of the assistants, being now ashamed that in the other dyots his complaints found no better passage and fauour: and as it is easie to set on fire those mindes that are already kindled: so euery one hauing a vehement disdain, that by their negligence the maiestie of the Empire should be translated into other nations: they begā with a great vnitie, to treat vpon articles necessarie, holding it conuenient to leaue a most mightie armie, and of such a sufficient appointmēt as (though the whole regions of Italie would oppose against them with the French king) to be able to renew and recouer in Italie the auncient rights of the Empire, which had bene vsurped either by the disabilitie, or other infirmitie of the Emperours past: for so required the glorie of the name of the Almains: such a preparation worthy the assemblie of so many Princes and free townes: And that at last it was necessarie to shew to all the world that though in the willes of the Almains had remained a long diuision, & their mindes not reconciled for many yeares, that yet the nation was not lesse mightie, nor their spirites depriued of that magnanimitie which in other worldes had made their aunceltors terrible to all estates and principallities of men: by the meane of whose vertue, both there was diuolued in generall to the nation of Germains, a liberall glorie with the dignitie Imperiall, and in part particular, many noble personages had aspired to much greatnesse & dominion, many of the best houses in Italie hauing by long prescription raigned in estates gotten by their valour. These things were begun to be debated with so great for-wardnesse and inclination, that it is manifest no dyot to haue assembled of long time, wherein was expectation of so great euent, the multitudes perswading them selues vniuersally, that besides the strength of all the other reasons, the Electours with the residue of the Princes, exprest a more quicke readinesse to the enterprise, for a hope they had, that (for the minoritie of the children of king Philip) the Imperiall dignitie which had successiuelly continued in Albert, Federik, and Maximilian, all three of the house of Austrich, would at last be passed into an other familie.

By these resolutions and agreements, the French king was induced to dissolue his armie immediately after the action of Genes, both to take away the occasion of so great a suspition, & to leaue e-uery partie satisfied of the integritie of his intention: yea his owne person had eftsoones repassd ouer the Mounts, had it not bene for a desire he had to speake with the king of Aragon, who prepared to returne into Spaine, altogether disposed to resume the gouernement of Castile, for that Jane his daughter was vnable to so great an administration: not so much for the imbecillitie of her sex, as for that by a superabundance of melancholie, growen since the death of her husband, she was become somewhat estranged from her vnderstanding, & also for the minoritie of the children common betweene king Philip and her, whereof the eldest had not yet attained ten yeares. Besides, he was pushed forward by the desires of many, which called him to that gouernement by a remembraunce that they had bene iustly gouerned, and that those kingdomes had flourished vnder him by a long continuance of peace, the diuisions already begun amongst the great Barons, together with the manifest signes of troubles to come, much encreasing this desire: but his coming was no lesse desired of his daughter, who, wandring in minde in all other actions, was neuertheless constant in this, that she desired the returne of her father, refusing obstinately against the perswasions and im-portunities of many, to subscribe with her owne hand to any expedition, without which subscription, according to the custome of those realmes, the affaires occurrent had not their perfection. For these reasons, the king of Aragon departed from Naples, where he remained but seuen moneths, leauing vnstatisfied the great expectation that was had on him: not so much for the shortnesse of time which runnes in a voluble motion without respect, nor for that it is hard to answere the colliceptions of men, which for the most part are inconsiderate and not measured with due proportiōs:

As for the many difficulties and impediments that opposed against him, by reason whereof he did nothing deserving memorie for the vniuersall benefite of Italie, nor any thing worthy of monument for the particular profit of the kingdome of Naples: for such was his desire to returne efts-oones to the gouernement of Castillo (the principall pillar of his greatnesse) that he reserued no oportunitie to thinke of the affaires of Itale: onely he turned all his studies to deuise to keepe him selfe in amitie with the king of Romains and the French king, to the end the one vnder colour to be grand-father to the idle children of the dead king, and the other with the oportunitie of his power giuing courage to who would oppose against him, should giue no impediments to his returne. And the obligation wherein he was bound by the treatie of peace made with the French king to restore the estates that had bene taken from the Barons of Aniow, and distributed either by couenaut or by recompence to such as had followed his faction, hindred him to redresse and gratifie the kingdome of Naples: for seeking not to estrange from him, the mindes of his good seruauents, he was constrained to recompence those of Aniow either with estates of equall reuenue (which he must buy of others) or with readie money (whereunto his Courts of faculties and treasures would not suffice) in which respectes he was compelled not onely to raise improuementes vpon his reuenues, and to refuse, according to the custome of new kings, to distribute grace and exemptions, and exercise any sort of liberalitie: but also with the incredible complaint of euery one, to taxe his peoples, who expected to be discharged of their intollerable burdens. The complaints made by the Barons of both the one and other part, were nothing inferiour, for that to such as were possessed, besides that they resigned their estates with ill will, necessitie made their recompences short and limited, and touching others there was restrained as much as was possible, the benefite of restitution in all things, wherein hapned any difference, for that how much lesse was restored to those, by so much lesse was the recompence of others. The great Captaine departed with him leaving behind him a good will incredible, and a renowne nothing inferiour, of whom besides his merites and prayles in other times, his present liberalities then were most notorious, promising and disposing giftes of great valour, for the which hee sold a great part of his owne estates, caring lesse to make himselfe poore, then to faile in such an action of honour. But the king of Naples departed verie ill contented with the Pope, for that demanding the inuestiture of the kingdome, the Pope refused to giue it him, but with those taxations and tributes wherewith it had bene giuen afore times to the former kings: he made instance that there might be made to him the same diminution which had bene made to Ferdinand his cousin, and to his sonnes and nephewes, demanding the inuestiture of the whole realme in his owne name as successour of the old Alfonso, in which forme whilest he was at Naples, he had receiued oath and homage, notwithstanding in the capitulations of peace made with the French king, it was disposed that touching the land of Lauora and Abruzzza the name of the Queene should be ioyntly acknowledged. It was thought that the refusall which the Pope made of the inuestiture, was the cause that Ferdinand would not speake with the Pope, who remaining at the same time in the rocke of Ostia, it was sayd he tained there to expect his passage. But how soeuer the truth was, the king of Aragon tooke his course to Sauona, where it was agreed that he should haue enteruiew and speech with the French king, who staying for that cause in Italy, was come thither from Millan as soone as he vnderstood he had taken passage from Naples.

In this enteruiew and conference, the demonstrations on all sides were manifest, free, and full of confidence, and such for the libertie thereof, as in no memorie had bin seene in any meeting or communication of like Princes: for that other potentates, betweene whom were either priuate enuies, or anciēt quarrels, were wont to meete with such order, that the one was not in the power of the other, where this suffered neither restraint of companies nor exception of place: for when the ships of the king of Aragon were within the hauen of Sauona, the French king being in their seeming descended vpon the wall of the hauen, passed by a bridge of wood made for the nonce vpon the poope in the galley of the king of Aragon, with a very small trayne of Gentlemen, and without any gard at all: where, being receiued with a ioy agreeable to the honor that was in him, and with a common gladnesse of the king and Queene his neece, spending some time there in deuises of mirth and curtesie: they went out of the galley by the same bridge, & made their entry on foot into the citie, hauing much to do to passe through the presse of so many multitudes of men & women as were drawn thither from the townes there aboutes. The Queene went accompanied with her husband on the right hand, and her vnckle on the left, being preciously attired in stones of price, and other sumptuous array: the Cardinall of Amboise and the great Captaine marched after the two kings: after them followed the young Ladies and Gentlemen of the Queenes Court, all set forth with glorious shewes: and before and behind were the Courts of the two kings appointed in an incredible pompe of rich and gorgeous ornaments. With these companies the king and Queene of Aragon were conueyed by the French king to the Castell, which was appointed for their lodging, hauing his prospect vpon the sea: that part or halfe of the towne which appertaineth to it was appointed for their trayne: and the French king was lodged in the Bishops houses right against the Castell; a spectacle truly worthie of memorie, to see together two of the most mightiest kings in Christendome, not long afore cruell enemies, and now not onely reconciled and conioyned by parentage, but also setting apart all signes of hatred, and memories of offences past, did euery one commit to the arbitrement of the other his proper life, with no lesse assurance and confidence then if they had bene lineall brethren: a manner of behauiour which gaue occasion to such as were present to dispute, whether of the two kings had shewed the greater confidence. Many referred much to the fidelitie of the French king, who was the first that put him selfe in the power of the other, hauing no other assurance then the bonde of faith: And to the other was transferred a greater occasion of shame, for that faith was kept to him first, and it was a suspition more likely that Ferdinand desired to be assured of him, the better to establish him selfe in the kingdome of Naples. But the most sort gaue greater reputation to the confidence of Ferdinand, who exceeding the example of the French king, put him selfe in his power, not for a moment or few houres, but for many dayes and long time. And hauing dispoyled him of so great a kingdome, with so many harmes and damages to his peoples, and so late a slander of his name, he had to feare that the French kings hatred was no lesse mortall, then his desire of reuenge iust. Besides, it was also to be doubted in whom was greater the profit of the disloyaltie: for, to make the French king prisoner, Ferdinand could reape no great commoditie by it, since the estate of Fraunce is managed vnder such a policie of lawes and customes, that to keepe the king restrained, could not much diminish the forces and authoritie of the kingdome. But there hanged other perils vpon the person of Ferdinand, for that if he had bene made prisoner, it was not to be doubted, that both for the minoritie of his heyres that then were very young, and the realme of Naples being to him a new kingdome, and also for that his other states, and singularly the realme of Castile were through many accidents disordered amongst them selues, the French king should not haue receiued of long time any impediment by the power and armes of Spayne. In this enteruiew and honorable spectacle of great Princes, the consideration of the great Captaine ministred not the least occasions to debate and commune vpon: vpon him were occupied the thoughts and eyes of euery one, no lesse for the renowne of his naturall valour, then for the memorie of his many victories: Considerations which so entised the mindes and affections of the French men, that notwithstanding they had bin so often vanquished by him, and were wont to hold his name in common hatred, yet his very aspect and presence confirming the opinion and image of his vertue, tooke another habite in the mindes of the French, for that they could not be satisfied to behold and honour him, making discourse to such as had not yet bene in the kingdome of Naples, sometimes with what incredible celeritie and shift of warre he inuaded in Calabria the Barons encamped at Laine, sometimes with what patience and resolution of mind he endured so many difficulties and aduersities, when in the middest of pestilence and hunger he was besieged in Barletto: sometimes with what diligence and efficacie he kept retained the mindes of men, and amid a penurie and want of money entertained long time his souldiers without pay: with what singular valour he managed the battell at Sirignola: & with what greatnesse of courage, with what industry of a souldier, & with what vnexperienced stratagemes amid so many difficultes, with an armie vn timer, and farre inferiour in forces, he kept his ground, and obtained the victorie vpon the riuer of Garillon: and lastly, how vigilant he had bene alwayes to embrace oportunities, and make his profite vpon the disorders of his enemies. But that which drew men into most wonder and admiration of him, was the excellent maiestie of his presence, the stately representation of his wordes & gestures, full of grauitie, affabilitie, & mildnesse, equall to those effectes and actions which had alwayes flowed from his right worthy & excellent excellent vertues : aboue all the rest, the French king, who desired that he might sup at the same table with Ferdinand, the Queene, and him, and by commaundement was placed neare to Ferdin- and, was as it were raiued with contemplation and deuising with him, finding in the action of his countenance and speech, a confirmation of those singularities and merites which he had afore expressed in so many worthie examples of his naturall valour and vertue. In so much that in the iudgement of euery one, that day was no lesse glorious to the great Captaine, then when he entred with his victorious armie into the Citie of Naples, honoured with all those ceremonies of triumph which are wont to be exercised vpon conquerours. But as time nourisheth a law of dissolution and forgetfulnesse of things worldly and transitorie, so those were the latest triumphant dayes of the great Captaine, for that departing no more out of the kingdome of Spaine, he had afterwarde no meane to exercise his vertue, neither in warre, nor in things memorable for peace. The two kings had conuersation together for the space of two dayes, wherein were holden betwene them many discourses both long and secret, and Cardinall de S. Prassida the Popes Legat not admitted to that conference, nor honoured but generally : but by that that might bee comprehended by generall coniecture, and also by the manifestation of things afterwarde, they passed a recipro-call promise the one to the other, to entertaine together a ioynt and perpetuall amitie and intelligence, and that Ferdinand should labour to reconcile Maximilian and the French king, to the end that being all reunited, they might declare and protest quarrell against the Venetians: wherein, to expresse that they were no lesse carefull for things common, then for such as concerned themselues in proper and particular, they published an intention to reforme the estate of the Church, and to that end to call a Councell. Neuerthelesse Ferdinand proceeded not with sinceritie, but seeking to nourish in that hope the Cardinall of Amboise, who thirsted much to be Pope, he lulled him so much by that abusing meane, that (with no litle damage to the affaires of his king) he perceiued too late, and that by many signes and demonstrations, what difference were betwene the wordes and workes of that Prince, and what subtleties and euasions were in his counsels. They communed together touching the cause of the Pisans, wherein the Florentins had entertained negocia-tion both with the one and other of them during the whole yeare: for whē the French king prepared his armie against the Genowayes, being discontented that the Pisans bare fauour to the rebellions of that people, and foreseeing how much it would be for the commoditie of his affaires to haue the Florentins to recouer that Citie, he gaue them hope, that as soone as he had repressed the mutinies of Genes, he would conuert his armie to the deuotion of their seruice, expressing in that promise, as also appeared in the generall inclination of the Court, that the auncient good will which had bene afore time borne to the Pisans, was for this occasion turned into hate. But euen as the counsels of Princes haue their variations and imperfections, so in their promises oftentimes is found litle certaintie, bearing more regard to the trayne and euent of times, then to accomplish the wordes they speake: for the French king hauing performed his enterprize vpon the Genowayes, chaunged his determination with the Florentins, both for the same reasons which made him dis-misse his armie, and also for that he would not offend the minde of the king of Aragon, who assured him that he would so dispose the Pisans, that they should willingly returne to the obedience of the Florentins, from whom the French king hoped by that meane to draw no small quantitie of money. To this the king of Aragon disposed himselfe, but for many sundry occasions, and albeit it had bene more agreeable to him that the Florentins should not recouer Pisa, yet knowing that it could not be long kept without great expences & difficulties, and fearing withall least they should obtaine it by the French kings working, he hoped when hee was at Naples; to haue bene able to induce the Pisans by his authoritie, to returne vnder honest conditions, to the obedience of the Florentins, who promised (so farre forth as the action were accomplished) to confederate with him, and to giue him within a certaine time, an hundred thousand duckets: but not finding in the Pisans that conformitie and deuotion which hee expected, to let that the gratification and recompence should not remaine onely to the French king, hee then protested openly to the Flo- rentine Embassadors, that if they should attempt in any sort to reconquer Pisa without his ayde, hee would manifestly obiect his power against them, and the French king (to turne him from those thoughtes which hee had to manage that enterprize by armes) hee entertained cunningly with deuises full of varieties, sometimes perswading that he hoped to draw them in the end to some composition, and sometimes he iustified that the Pisans were vnder his protection: a matter no

lesse false and contrarie, then his deuises were vaine and fabulous : for albeit the Pisans had made many solicitations to him, with offers to indue him with the absolute iurisdiction of their towne, yet entertaining their requestes with hopes, and keeping his intentions dissembled, he alwayes forbore to accept them, knowing what it was to take vpon him the protection of a warre popular and confused. But this matter being more particularly debated in Sauona, they concluded that it were good and necessarie, the Pisans should returne vnder the iurisdiction of the Florentins, so farre forth as either of them might tast of the profit : the same being the cause that the Florentins (fearing to stirre too much the mind of the king of Aragon) forbore to giue the spoyle that year to the harvest of the Pisans: an action wherein they had reposed a great hope, for that what by the want of victuals, and weaknesse of forces in the towne, the Florentine souldiours ouerran to the whole countrey euen to their gates : and the peoples of the maine countrey, more mightie in numbers within the towne then the proper Citizens, grievung much to loose the fruite of their trauell for the whole year, began to abate much of their accustomed obstinacie. Besides, their generall cause was no more succoured by their neighbours as before, for that the Genowayes ouergriued with so many calamities, had no more the same thoughts, Pandolffe Petrucci made wearie betweene importunitie and suspition, found also the charges intollerable: and they of Lucquois, albeit they ministered secretly to their wants, yet their abilitie was no more sufficient to beare out so great a burden, being for the present no lesse heauie and intollerable, then in expectation, ielousie and full of perill. The two kings departed from Sauona the fourth day, with the same demonstrations of concord and amitie: the one tooke his course by sea to Barcelona, and the other returned by land into France, leauing the other affaires of Italie in the same degree, but with a greater discontentment of the Pope, who taking of new his occasion vpo the stirre made by Anmball Bentiuole, had made instance by Cardinall de S. Prassida to the king at Sauona, to deliuer vp to him as prisoners John Bentiuole and Alexander his sonne, whom he kept retained in the Duchie of Millan: he alledged that since they had broken the contract made in Bologna by the interposing of Monsieur de Chaumont, the king was at libertie & no further bound to keepe his faith, offering withall that if his maiestie would satisfie his desire, he would send the Cardinall cap to the Bishop of Alby. The king answered, that albeit he could discern in them no sufficient apparance of fault or crime, yet for that he would somewhat bridle and restraine their dispositions, he had kept retained many dayes in the Castell of Millan, John Bentiuole, but not finding good matter wherein they had offended, he ought to haue no lesse regard to the innocencie of the parties, then to his proper honour, vnder the which hee stood bound to keepe his faith: and yet to gratifie the Pope and leaue him satisfied of his inclination, he sayd he was disposed to suffer him to proceede against them with curses and paines, as against the rebels of the Church, euen as he had endured without complaint that in Bologna in the heate of that stirre, their Pallace was destroyed euen to the foundations.

The Dyot of Constance continued still with the same expectation of men wherewith it was begun, which Cesar forgat not to nourish with diuerse sleighes and gallant wordes, publishing that hee would passe into Italie so accompanied, that farre greater forces then the armies of Fraunce and all Italie ioyned together, should not be able to resist him. And to giue greater value and authoritie to his cause (alwayes protesting that he had onely fixed in his intention the protection of the Church) he aduertised the Pope and Colledge of Cardinals, that he had declared the French king rebell and enemie to the sacred Empire, for that he had descended into Italie to transerre into the person of the Cardinall of Amboise the supreme dignitie pontificall, and to set vpon his owne head the crowne Imperiall, and lastly to driue the whole region of Italie into one seruite subiection: That he prepared to come to Rome onely to take the crowne, and to establish a common suretie and libertie: And lastly, that in regard of his Imperiall dignitie being protectour of the Church, and for his proper pietie verie deuout and desirous to aduance the Sea. Apostolike, it was not conuenient he should tarie to be required or prayed, knowing well inough, that the Pope for feare of perill and harmes was fled from Bologna, and that the same feare kept restrained both him and the religious Colledge from communicating their daungers, or sending to demanda succours. Thus the matters which were treated in Germanie being by manie intelligences signified into Italie, and the brute that was spread surpassing the truth of things, together with the generall preparations which the French king made, being causes enforcing more credit and testimonie of the publike publike rumours, for that it was beleueed that he feared not without occasion. These things (I say) inquired much the mindes of euery one, some for desire of new things, some for hope, some for feare, some for respectes generall, and some for their priuate and particular interestes: In so much as the Pope sent as Legate to Maximilian, the Cardinall of Saint Crosse, and the Venetians, the Florentines, with all other Potentates in Italie, (except the Marquis of Mantua) that were absolute and depended vpon themselves, addressed to him messengers speciall; either in the name of Embassadours, or vnder some other nature, euery one foreseeing for his safetie according to the lealousie of the time. These things troubled much the minde of the French king, being verie doubtfull of the will of the Venetians, and more uncertaine of the disposition of the Pope, as well for many reasons and experiences of things past, as especially that he had elected to this legation Cardinall Saint Crosse, in whom had remained an auncient and partiall inclination to further the greatnesse of Maximilian. But touching the will of the Pope, much lesse that it was manifest to others, seeing it was scarcely knowen to himselfe: for, having his minde full of discontentments and suspicions against the French king, sometimes (to bee at libertie from those humours wandring and troublesome) hee desired the coming of Cesar: and eftsloones the memorie of auncient quarrels betwene the Popes and Emperours, disaltered and amazed him, the same occasions remaining, and the same propertie of spirits working. In which incertaintie and frailtie of minde, he deferred to resolute himselfe, expecting first what would be determined in the Dyot: and therefore proceeding in termes generall, he had instructed the Legate to perswade Cesar in his name to passe into Italie without an armie, offering to him greater degrees and proportion of honours then euer had bin done by any Pope at the crowning of Emperours. But a litle after (the counsels of men obey occasions and times) the expectations that were had of the resolutions in the Dyot, began to diminish: for when it was credibly vnderstood in Germanie, that the French king had dissolued his armie immediatly after the victorie of Genes, his person also returning with the same fidelitie & obseruation of promise ouer the mounts, the heate of the Princes and peoples began to abate, and their fierie inclinations to resolute to smoke and fume, the feare being ceased that he came not to vsurpe the Popedome and the Empire. Besides (as it often hapneth) publike respectes fell not so strongly in consideration, but they were ouercaried with interestes priuate; for that, besides all other reasons, there was a generall and auncient desire in all Germanie, that the greatnesse of Emperours should not be so absolute, as the other estates should be compelled to obey them. And the French king omitted no diligence that might giue aduancement to his cause, for that he sent to Constance, men expresse, who forbearing all publike practise, but working secretly, laboured by the hidden fauours of the Princes that were his friends, to appease the mindes of the residue, purging the infamies that had bene imposed by testification and euidence of the effects, since as soone as he had ranged Genes, he did not onely disperse his armie, but also returned in person into Fraunce, with that speede that was agreeable to a personage of his greatnesse: they affirmed besides that he had not only abstained in example and action from offending the Empire of Rome, but also in all confederations, contractes, or bondes, he did alwayes protest and except that he would bee bound to nothing that was contrarie to the rights of the sacred Empire: wherein neuertheless they reposed not so much in these iustifications, but that they laboured with great diligence and many liberalities to abate the fierce mindes of the Almains with the engine of gold and siluer, whereof that nation is not a litle couetous: A batterie of no litle force, to make breaches into the mindes of most sortes & properties of men, that beare more inclination, to corruption then to vertue. The Dyot at last determined and brake vp the twentieth day of August, in the which was agreed, after many disputations, that there should be deliuered to Cesar to follow him into Italie, eight thousand horse, & xij. thousand footmen, payed for six moneths, and to furnish the expences of the artilleries, with other charges extraordinary, six thousand Florins of Rhein to be continued so long as the artillerie was in seruice: the bands and regiments to be in the field and assemble neare Constance about the middest of October. It was published at that time, that they would happily haue furnished him with a greater proportion of men & money, if Maximilian had consented that the enterprize (alwayes vnder his gouernment & counsell) had bin managed wholly in the name of the Empire, & that the election of Captaines had passed by order from the Empire, and distribution of the places that should be conquered to be made according to the determination of the Dyot: but Maximilian retaining still a singler ambition in this iorney, would admit no companion or communitie of name or authoritie (albeit all went vnder a generall title of the name of the Empire) and much lesse suffer that the rewardes of the victorie should apperteine to any other then to him and his: in so much as standing better contented with the aide they deliuered to him in this sort, then to go better accompanied, with an authoritie assitant, there was made no other resolution. And yet albeit it answered not the expectation that men had conceived afore, yet ceased not for all that the feare that was in Italie of his discending: for it was considered that the souldiers which his subiectes would giue him, with such as he would leaue of him, being ioyned to those bands that were erected in the Dyot, he would come appointed with a very mightie armie, compounded of bodies resolute and trayned, and furnished with sundry naturcs of artilleries: a matter so much the more to be feared, by how much Maximilian, for the disposition of his nature, and long exercise in armes, was very able and sufficient in martiall discipline, and could well beare, with the labour of his body and faculty of his minde, all aduersities and difficulties whatsoeuer: a sufficiencie for the which he merited more, and caried away greater reputation then had bene giuen to any Emperours many ages before. He laboured besides, to leaue and bring into his pay ten thousand Swissers, whereunto albeit the Bailife of Dion and others sent by the French king, did oppose and object with great instance in the Dyots of that nation, reducing to memorie the alliance continued for so many yeares with the crowne of France, and estfoones lately confirmed by the king raigning, together with the many sortes of profites which their peoples receiued by the conuerlation of France: and on the other side, they preferred their old and settled quarrels with the house of Austria, their grieuous warres they haue had with Maximilian, and lastly what indifferent perill and preiudice the greatnesse of the Empire brought to them. Yet all these notwithstanding, in the Parliaments and Dyots of the Swissers, appeared a manifest inclination and desire to satisfie the demaundes of Caesar, or at the least not to take armes against him, for that (as was supposed) they would not offend the generall name & state of Germanie, which it seemed was intangled and ioyned to this action. For this reason many doubted that the French king, if he were abandoned of the Swissers, or that the Venetians sayled to ioine with him, being not furnished with a sufficient strength of footemen to resist the footbands of the enemies, and hoping that the furie of the Almaines entring into Italie as a landflood, would vanish and dissolue for want of money, would retire his army into townes; the likelihood whereof was already manifest in this, that with a wonderfull diligence he fortified the suburbes of Milan, with many other places in the Duchie of greatest importance. In regard of which alterations and preparations, the Venetians were trauelled in no lesse perplexitie of minde then the other regions of Italie, and by how much their deliberations and counsels were of greatest consequence, by so much more busie, and greater were the paines and diligence that euery one tooke to haue them ioine with him: for Caesar from the beginning, had addrested to them three Embassadors of great authoritie, not only to sollicite that he might haue free passage through their dominions, but also to induce them to contract with him a straiter alliance, wherein should be agreed that they should participate in the rewardes of the victorie, protesting to them on the contrarie, that it was in his power to accord to their preiudice with the French king, with the same conditions that so often had bene offered to him at diuers times. On the other side, both by his Embassadors, and the Oratour of Venice that was resident in his Court, laboured to perswade them to oppose with maine hand against the comming of Caesar as a matter of equall preiudice both to the one and other, offering for his part the seruice of all his forces, and to remaine their perpetuall confederate. But in those dayes the Senate was not contented that the tranquillitie of Italie should be troubled, neither were they caried into humors of new tumultes, by the hopes that were offered to enlarge their dominions: for they had proued by a smarting experience, that the benefite and spoile of the conquest of Cremona, did not counteruaile the suspitions and daungers wherein they had bene continually holden, since they had the French king so neare a neighbour. They could willingly haue bene contented to be newters, but being pressed with the importunities of the Emperour, they stood in a necessitie either to refuse or graunt him passage: if they refused him, they feared to be the first that should be vexed: and in gratifying his demaundes, they offended directly the French king, being expressely forbidden in their reciprocal confederation, to graunt passage to the enemies of the one or other: and they were not ignorant, that beginning once to offend him, it would be great indiscretion after Maximilian were past, to be idle beholders of the issue of the warre, and expect the actions of the Princes, whereof the

the one would be an enemy to the name of the Venetian, and the other hauing receiued no other measure then libertie of passage, had no great occasion to be their friend: Respects which wrought much with the Senate, that it was necessarie to sticke openly to the one or other parties, but to whether of them, their opinions, for the importance of the matter, were very different: and therefore, being no longer able to temporise in a cause so earnestly laboured by the Embassadors of both Princes, they made it at last a counsell matter in the Senate house of the Pregati, where Nicholas Poskarin vsed this forme of reasoning:

If it were in our power to set downe a resolution, by the which might be continued the peace and tranquillitie of our common weale amid so many conspiring deliberations of these great Princes, I am sure there would be amongst vs no varietie of opinion and counsell, & much lesse should any hope or offers leade vs inclined to a warre of so great expences and perill, as is like to be this, which standes now in preparation. But seeing in regard of the reasons and causes so often debated amongst vs in our late assemblies, there is no expectation to entertaine that common tranquillitie: the principall reason whereupon we are to establish our deliberation, is to consider whether we may beleue that betweene the French king and king of Romains (dispaireing once of our amitie) may be contracted an vnion: or whether the hatreds betweene them be so mightie & resolute, as to let them from ioyning together in one sociable vnitie: for if we were well assured of such a danger, it were to be proued that we ought not to depart from the amity of the French king, both for that our forces being ioyned in good faith and meaning with his for a common defence, we should easily protect our estate, and also it would be more honorable to continue the confederation we haue with him, then by light euasions to shift vs from it without euident occasion. Besides, we should enter with more recommendation and fauour of the world into a warre which should beare the title and name of the protection of Italie, then to ioyn with those armies and powers which we know manifestly to be leauied to stirre commotions and troubles. But if we set before our eyes the daunger of this vnion, I thinke it will not be denied that there is not great necessitie to preuent it, since it would be more profitable about all comparisons to ioyn with the Emperour against the French king, then to tarry till both the one and other be vnited against vs. And albeit it is hard to iudge certainly which of the two will happen, for that it is a thing that not onely dependeth of the will of others, but also is subiect to many accidents and occasions, which scarcely will leaue this resolution in the power of those that ought to execute it: yet, for that the experience of times past is a true instructour of things to come, and that matters that are to succede can not be comprehended but by coniecture, we may discern that in this is more perill then profite, lesse suretie then confidence, & an action whereof we ought to haue great suspicion and feare. For, as touching the king of Romains, it is not like that he shall finde any great impediments, considering with what feruent desire he aspieth to passe into Italie, which he can not do with any conueniencie or reason, vnlesse he ioyn with the French king or with vs. And albeit he soliciteth much our alliaunce, yet if we refuse him, who doubteth but necessitie will driue him to seeke confederatiō with the French, hauing no other meane to accomplish his purposes. Touching the French king, it seemeth there are farre greater difficulties for this vnion: but yet I hold them not such, as vnder them we may promise to our selues any suretie: for that he may be caried to that deliberation by suspicion & ambition, two mightie motions in the mindes of great Princes, either of them in his singler nature, being able to driue on those thoughts that are already raised to dominion: he marketh well the instance that Cæsar maketh to enter vnitie with vs, and measuring (albeit with false weightes) our intention and desire, he may doubt that the same suspicion that we haue, not to be preuented by him, induceth vs to preuent him, knowing also that we haue good intelligence of those things which so long time they haue consulted together against vs. Lastly, he may feare that we are allured by ambition, looking into the liberalities and offers that may be made to vs; & from this feare there can be no meane sufficient to assure him, seeing there is nothing that naturally breeds more suspicion then matters of estate. And besides suspicion, he may be driuen on by ambition, hauing a desire as we know to the Citie of Cremona, wherunto he shall be the more kindled by perswasions of the Millanois, and no lesse for a thirst to occupie all the auncient estates of the Viscounts, which he pretendeth to be his inheritance as well as the Duchie of Millan: to these he can not hope to aspire, if he first seeke not confederacie with the king of Romains, for that our common weale being mightie of it selfe, if the French king assaile vs alone or of his proper forces, it will alwayes stand in our power to ioyn with

 " the king of Romains, he is to thinke that in preuenting vs, he shall not onely put himselfe out of " daunger, but also shall stand in securitie. And though he do not feare this vnion, yet he may happily " iudge it necessarie to confederate with him, to deliuer himselfe from the troubles & daungers which " he may suffer by him, either by reason of the aides of Germany, or by other alliances and occasions.
 " And albeit greater daungers may happen to him if the king of Romains begin once to set foote in " Italy, yet it is the common nature of men to feare most the daungers that be nearest at hand, to " esteeme more then is necessarie things present, and to hold lesse reckning then they ought of such " as are farre off and to come, seeing that to the same are referred many hopes of remedies, as well by " the fauour of times, as benefite of accidents: but be it that it were not profitable for the French king
 " to make this vnion, we are not assured for all that, that he will not do it: the mindes of men are sub-
 " iect to many mutations, sometimes altered by feare, and sometimes blinded by couetousnesse: we " know that the nature of Frenchmen is light, and ready to embrace any new enterprises, and whose " hopes are neuer lesse then their desires: we are not ignorant, with what perswasions and offers (suf" ficient to kindle any minde) the French king is stirred against vs by the Millanois, the Pope, the " Florentins, the Duke of Ferrara, & by the Marquis of Montua. It is not giuen to all men to be wise " and foreseeing, no it is a gift that rarely discendes, and that but to a few; but who will prognosticate
 " what will be the deliberations of another, let him (if he will not deceiue himselfe) not so much con" sider those things which by similitude and likelihood would make a wise man, as what is the spi-
 " rite and nature of him that is to make the deliberation: And therefore if we will iudge of that the " French king will doe, we are not to regard so much what belongeth to the office of discretion and " wisdom, as to consider the naturall humours of the French, light, wandring, and oftentimes accu" stomed to proceede more with furie and rashnesse, then with counsell or foresight: We must con" sider that the natures and inclinations of great Princes are not like to ours, neither so moderate in " their affections, nor so easie to resist their appetites as priuate, for that by how much more they " are accustomed to be honored in their kingdomes, and absolutely obeyed, by so much more are " they made not onely imperious and insolent, but raising their will aboute reason or law, they " can not endure not to obtaine that which they hold for iust: and that seemes iust to them which " they desire, being perswaded that they haue power to make plaine with a word both hilles and " mountaines, to remoue all impediments, and to surmount the nature of things: yea they hold " it a shame to restraints their inclinations for any difficulties, and measuring commonly great things " with the same rules wherewith they are wont to proceede in actions more inferiour, their coun" sels haue lesse communitie with discretion and reason, then with will and arrogancie: vices which " aboute all other Princes, haue most societie and participation with the French nation: the same be" ing confirmed with the late example of the kingdome of Naples, where the French king induced " by ambition and indiscretion, consented that the moytie of the kingdome should diuolue to the " Spaniard, not seeing how much he weakned his power (afore absolute and supreme amongst all the " Italians) to bring into Italy another king equall to himselfe in authoritie, and nothing inferiour in
 " might. But why proceede we by coniectures in things whereof we haue a certaintie: we are not " ignoraunt of that which the Cardinall of Amboise treated at Trent with Maximilian himselfe to:
 " ching the diuision of your estate: And we know well enough that to the same practise, they ioyned
 " also a conclusion in the towne of Blois, and the Cardinall going for the same cause into Germany, " brought backe the oath and ratification from Cesar. And albeit I confesse these practises brought " forth no effectes in regard of certaine difficulties that hapned, yet who can assure vs, that there will " not be found some meane to range or remoue those difficulties, which haue bene impediments to " their common desire: since their principall intention remaineth alwayes one. These be the reasons " that make me conclude, what necessitie we haue to consider with diligence, the imminent perils, the infinite charges, and perpetuall infamies, which on all sides do offer to darken and deface the auncient reputation and wisdom of this Senate, if measuring vnadvisedly the condition of the affaires present, we suffer that another put vs in feare, and come to Inuade vs with those armes which be offered to vs for our suretie and augmentation of estate. Let vs consider (for the benefite of our countrey) what is the difference betweene mouing warre to another, and to expect till another inuade vs, to dispute how to diuide the estate of another, and to temporise till the same perill fall vpon vs; and to be accompanied against one onely, or to remaine alone against many: for, if these two kings knit and draw to conspiracie against vs, they are sure to be followed with the assistance of the Pope, by reason of the townes in Romagnia, to haue many commodities from the king of Aragon, by reason of the ports of Naples, & to finde many friendships through all Italie, some seeking to recover, and some to be assured. Lastly, being not ignorant how mightily the French king hath conspired against vs, & for so many yeares communicated with Cesar to our preiudice: I thinke that if we arme our selues against him that hath sought to surprise and beguile vs, much lesse that we shall merite imputation, or be touched with the crime of faith breakers, but of the contrarie, the world will respect vs as fathers to our countrey, prouident, wise, and iust, and vpon his head shall be broken the brand of that perill and daunger, which euerie one knoweth hee kindled to haue consumed vs.

To the contrarie of this opinion, Andrea Gritti a personage of great valour and vertue, rose vp and reasoned in this sort:

If it were conuenient that in one selfe matter, the counsels and opinions of men might be referred to voyces doubtfull, I confesse my aduise should haue no other reference, the present matter drawing on all sides such varietie of reasons, that the nature and consideration of them leades me into confusion: But for that there is necessitie of resolution, which can not be made vpon foundations and suggestions incertaine, it behoueth vs, paying well the reasons that impugne both the one and other, to embrace those which draw nearest to a likenesse and similitude of truth, and earie most mightie coniectures: which when I distinguish and examine, I can not finde that the French king, neither for suspicion to be preuented of vs, nor for desire of townes which earst appertained to the Duchie of Millan, will agree to bring the king of Romains into Italie against vs: for the daungers and harmes which such an enterprise draweth with it, are farre more manifest & great, then the perils that may happen by our vnite with Cesar, or the profits that he may hope for by that resolution: seeing, besides the other natures of iniuries & hatreds betweene them, there is concurrence of dignitie and estates, a matter able to set diuision betweene the best established friends among mortall men: In so much as the French king, calling into Italy the king of Romains, may be thought to do no other thing, then in place of a common weale peaceable, and remaining alwayes in good deuotion and friendship with him, to desire rather the neighbourhood of a king ambitious, iniurious, and nourishing a thousand occasions to quarrell with him, as well by reason of his authoritie and estate, as in regard of disdain and reuenge. Let no man say, because the king of Romains is poore, disordered, and vnfortunate, that the French king feares not his neighbourhood, seeing that for the memorie of the auncient factions and inclination of Italie, which remaine yet kindled in many places, and especially in the Duchie of Millan, an Emperour of Rome can not haue so litle a nest in Italie, which will not spread and multiplie to the great preiudice and daunger of others, but chiefly on the person of this man hangeth greatest feares and ielousies, being a Prince of high stomacke, of great conduit and experience in warre, and to whom may be ioyned the interest of the children of Lodowik Sforce, a ready meane to stirre vp the mindes of many: he may also hope to draw to him in any action of warre against the French, the powers of the Catholike, though for no other respect, yet at least for that both their estates are to descend to one heire. The French king is not ignorant, how mightie is Germanie, nor how easie it is to vnite either the whole or part when the way shall be made open in Italie, and the hope of pray and spoile layd afore them. And we haue well seene what feare he hath alwayes had of the descending of the Almans, and the king of Romains, how poore and disordered soeuer he be, who if he were in Italie, it were not reasonable to thinke that he should haue with him any other thing then a warre full of perils and aduersities, and a peace ill assured, and yet dearly bought. It may be he thirsteth to recover Cremona and happily all the other townes, but there is no conformitie or likelihood, that he will embrace a great daunger, to get a thing whose value is lesse then the aduenture. No, it is more cre"dible that he will proceede in this case rather with discretion then rashnesse, seeing by the consi"deration of the errors heretofore imposed vpon that king, we shall find that they proceeded of no "other infirmity then of his great desire to make his enterprises with surety: wherein I referre you

 "to his examples in the actions of Naples and Cremona; being induced to make partition of that
 "kingdome, and to deliuer to vs the city of Cremona, for no other reason, then to make more easie
 "the victory of those warres: so that it is more credible that euen at this present he will rather follow "his custome and wise counsels, then be caried with aduises sudden and rash, seeing withall he re"maineth not altogether depriued of hope to accomplish his expectations with the fauour of ano"ther time, in more surety, and with better occasion; which is a thing which mortall men are wont "to promise to themselves easily, the error being lesse to promise a change and reuolution of world"ly affaires, then to perswade that they are alwayes firme and stable: neither doth that much a"maze me which I sayd, those two kings haue treated so often amongst themselves, for that it is a "custome with the Princes of our time to entertaine one another artificially with vaine hopes, and "dissembled practises: which, for that in so many yeares they haue brought forth no effect, it can"not be that they were other then faire shewes, fictions, and shadowes of things, or else nourished
 "in themselves such difficulties as they could not be resolued, the very nature of the affaires resisting
 "to take away the distrusts that are betweene the, without which foundation they haue no meane
 "to come to that coniunction. So that I cannot feare that for the couetousnesse of our townes, the "French king will throw himselfe headlong into so indiscrete a deliberation, and much lesse will he "attempt an action so casuall for any suspicion he hath of vs, for that besides the great knowledge "and experience he hath of our intentions, hauing no want of perswasions, and occasions to leaue
 "his alliance, the same reasons by the which we are assured of him, wil interchangeably hold him as"sured of vs, for nothing can be more preiudiciall to vs then the king of Romains to haue any estate "in Italy, no lesse for the authority of the Empire, ouer whose amplification and greatnesse we ought
 "alwaies to stand feareful & ielous, then for the ambition of the house of Austria, pretending interest
 "to many of our towns, but most of al for the neighborhood of Germanie, whose inundations canot
 "but be too perillous for vs & our dominio, we bearing withal a brute to haue all our counsels ripe & "measured, & to erre more in being too hard & slow, then to proceede with too much rashnesse and "credulity. I denie not but things may fall out contrary to the opiniõ of men; for that worldly actions "oftentimes draw with them effects strange, and farr above the expectations and wisdomes of mor"tall men, & therefore who could set down any warrant or surety, were not of the least merite or co"mendation: but since that cannot be done without entring into most huge dangers and difficul"ties, we must consider that oftentimes vaine feares are no lesse hurtful then too great confidence &
 "credulity: if we enter confederation with the king of Romains against the French king, the warre "must necessarily be begun and continued with our monies, which we must also aduance to furnish "all his prodigalities and disorders, otherwise he will either accord with the enemy, or retire into
 "Germanie, leauing vpon our shoulders the whole burden and peril of the quarrell: we must susteine, "a war against a most mighty king of France, Duke of Millã, Lord of Genes, a Prince enuironed with "many regiments of men at armes, and no lesse mightie in artilleries and prouisions, & at the brute of "whose payes and money will draw to him from all nations infinite bands of footmen. Besides, what "hope of good successe can be nourished in this enterprife, seeing we cannot but feare, that in all "those of Italy which either pretend against vs, or that we hold any thing of theirs, or at least stand "ielous ouer our greatnesse, will not be a dispositiõ to draw into cõspiracy against vs, but especially "the Pope, to whom, besides his disdaines towards vs, the power of the Emperour in Italy will ne-
 "uer be acceptable, for a naturall hatred that hath alwayes bene betweene the Church and the Em"pire, the same making the Popes to haue no lesse feare of the Emperors in things temporall, then "they haue of the Turkes in matters spirituall. And this coniunction haply may be more dangerous "to vs, then the vnion which we feare betweene the king of Romains and the French king: for that "where is society of many Princes, which pretend to be equall, there commonly do kindle suspiciõs "and debates, by which oftentimes it hapheth, that those enterprises which haue bene begun with "no small reputation, slide easily into many difficulties, and lastly into dissolution and ruine: neither "ought we to make this a last consideration, that albeit the French king haue entertained certaine "practises contrary to the alliance which we haue with him, yet we haue scene no effectes, by the
 "which we may say he hath dealt vnjustly with vs, and therefore to leaue warre against him, would be

be no other thing then to merite imputation of infidelity & faith breaking, on the contrary whereof this Senate ought to build his principall foundation, as well for the honour as profite of the affaires which we haue euery day to manage with other Princes. Neither can it be profitable to vs to nourish & continually augment this opinion, to seeke to oppresse dayly all our neighbours, & to aspire to the whole monarchy of Italy. I would in God, we had intimes past proceeded more considerately, for almost all the suspitions that at this present are heaped against vs, haue no other beginning then that heretofore we haue too much offended them, and it will not be beleeued, that feare draweth vs to a new warre against the French king our auncient confederate, but rather that we are caried with certaine ambitious and couetous inclinations (ioyning with vs the king of Romans) to win vpon him one part of the duchie of Millan, as we won vpon Lodowike Sforce, being ioyned with him. In which time if we had gouerned our selues more moderately, and not feared too much suspitions vaine and light, neither should the affaires of Italy stand presently in such trouble and alteration, neither we, in whom should haue bene preserued a renowne of greater modestie and grauity, should not now be constrained to enter into war either with this Prince or that Prince, more mighty then our selues. Into which nature of necessity, seeing we are false, it cannot but be more to our wisdom and profite, not to depart from the confederation we haue with the French king, then ouerruled with a vaine feare, or hope of benefits vncertaine and hurtfull, to embrace a warre, which alone and of our singular power, we should not be mighty enough to support, and in those confociates and assistants which we should haue, would be found more burden and charge, then aduantage or profite.

The opinions of the Senate were diuerse in so great a variety of reasons: but in the end prevailed the memory of the inclination which they knew the king of Romans had long entertained, to recouer vpon occasion the townes holden by them, which he pretended to appertaine to the Empire, or to the house of Austria. Their resolution was to graunt him passage if he came without an army, but comming armed with a power, they determined to denie him liberty to march, and in the answer they gaue to his Embassadors, they seemed to perswade, that that conclusion was made more by necessity, hauing regard to the condition of the time present, and confederation which they had with the French, then by any disposition of will to leaue him discontented for any matter. They alleaged, that albeit they were constrained by the same confederation to ayde him in the defence of the duchy of Millan with a proportion of men expressed in the same: yet in this action they would proceede with a greater modesty, without exceeding in any sort their limites and bounds; and, except they were compelled to any action for the defence of Millan, they would not oppose against any other his aduancement, according to the true meaning of their affection, who so farre as their power would stretch, would neuer fayle him with those oblations and reuerences which became the Senate of Venice to beate to so great a Prince, with whom they neuer had any thing then a perpetuall amitie and alliance: in commemoration whereof, they sought not to enter into new confederations and bonds with the French king, but desired to communicate as little as they could with the warres that should be betweene them, hoping that Maximilian (not to increase his owne difficulties) would at least leaue their frontiers in peace; and embracing their affections according to the simplicity and innocency thereof, to turne his armies either against Burgundy, or the Duchy of Millan. But as enterprises of high importance are full of imperfections, and draw with them their proper impediments, so Cesar being out of hope to ioyne with him the Venetians, many other difficulties began to fall vpon him, which albeit he labored to surmount with the greatnesse of his spirit and conceptions, apt to promise him dayly more hopes then impediments, yet they delayed much the effects of his resolutions and purposes: for that, both of himselfe he had not sufficient money to leaue his proportion of Swissers, and furnish the other expenses necessary for so great an enterprise, and also the treasures that were promised to his aide in the Dyot, were not sufficient to furnish the least part of the substance and body of the warre. And the foundation whereupon from the beginning he had layde his greatest hopes, that the communalities and iurisdiccions of Italy would for terror of his name and comming, offer composition and contribution of money, grew euery day lesse and lesse: for, albeit in the beginning many shewed a certaine deuotion, yet the conclusions of the Dyot of Constance not answering the expectation that was conceiued, that the enterprise should rather be of the whole Empire, and almost of all Germanie, then his owne in peculiar, and seeing haply into the mighty preparations of the of the Venetians.

French king, and the new declaration of the Venicians, euery one remained in doubt, not daring (in ministering to him things whereof he had most neede) to offend so greatly the French king. Neither were the demandes of Maximilian such in the time when he was most feared, as with their facility they might induce him to administer to his helpe: for, according to his conditions, he demanded much of euery one, wherein his rates imposed vpon the Duke of Ferrara (whom he pretended did owe to Blanche his wife the dowry of his sister Anne dead many yeares before) were excessive, and his porportions to the Florentins no lesse intollerable, vpon whom the Cardinall of Brexe, managing his affaires at Rome, and hauing power to compound with them, demanded fise hundred thousand duckets: which demaund, for the immoderation thereof, was the cause that they resolu'd to temporise with him, till they discerned better what traine his affaires wuld take, and withall (foreseeing not to offend him) they protested excuses to the French king demaunding men, which they sayd they could not accomplish for the impediments of the waste and spoyle to be giuen this yere to the Pisans in great preparation, and for that the Genouaies and other neighbours beginning eftsoones to administer new succours, they were constrained to stand continually prepared against them. In these regards, the Emperour sayling (contrary to his hope) to haue his turne serued with the money of the Italians (hauing only fixe thousand duckets of them of Siena) he made request to the Pope, that at the least he would suffer him to take the hundred thousand duckets which had bene afore leauied in Germanie vnder colour to make warre vpon the Turkes, and being for that effect preferred in that prouince, they could not be conuerted to any other vse, without licence of the sea Apostolike: he offered him also, that where he could not satisfie his demaund not to passe into Italy with an army, that neuerthelesse, after he had restored to the Duchy of Millan the children of Lodowike Sforce (the protection of whom he protested, both to make the peoples of the state more fauourable, and his passage more easie and lesse hatefull) he would go on to Rome without armes, to receiue the Crowne Imperiall, leauing all his bands in the duchy of Millan. But the Pope, in whom appeared no more affection to the one then to the other, refused also to satisfie him in this demaund, alleaging that in such a condition and estate of affaires, he could not without his great daunger prouoke the armes of the French king against him. And yet Maximilian, according to the property of his inclination being carefull, credulous, & quick to execute all things of himselfe with paines incredible, amidst so many difficulties forgot nothing that might entertaine the brute of his discending, and causing to march the artilleries towards many places of frontiers of Italy, he recontinued the practise to haue the twelue thousand Swissers, who demanding many things, and propounding strange exceptions, gaue him not any certaine resolution: he solicited the bands that were promised him, and traueilling in person from one place to another for diuerse expeditions, he brought mens mindes into many confusions, their iudgements varying more through all Italy then earst had bene seene in any other action: for in some the opinion of the enterprise was greater then euer, and others supposed it to be already in an estate declining, which incerteinty of mind was increased by himselfe, who being of nature secrete and particular, did seldome communicate his thoughts with others, and to the end his intentions should be lesse priuate in Italy, he had ordeined that the Popes Legate nor other Orators of the Italians should not followe his person, but keepe a parte in places remoued from the Court.

Now was come the day appointed for the assembly of the Almain companies, of whom notwithstanding there mustred at Constance but a very small crew, neither was seene any other preparations on his part, then remouing of artilleries, and studying by what meanes he might recouer money. In so much as being vncertaine with what forces, in what time, and on which side he would enter: such as doubted him made mighty prouisions in many places: some supposed he would make his entry by Friul, and others thought he would march by Trent into the countrey of Verrona, others iudged that comming by Sanoy, or by Coma, he would assaile the Duchy of Millan hauing many of the exiles of that state in his campe: others stood in some doubt least he would make some stirre on that side to Burgondy. In regard of these fearts, the French king sent to the Duchy of Millan many bands of horsemen and footemen, and besides other preparations leauied for the defence of that state, he dispatched two thousand fise hundred Spanish footemen, vnder the fauour of the king Catholike, to whom Cesar complained grieuously of such a suffrance. Monsieur de Chammont doubting the faith of Boromei, surprised in the same time Arona, a Castell

Castell belonging to that familie standing vpon the lake Maior: into Burgundie the king had also sent five hundred Launces, vnder Monsieur Trimonille gouernour of that Prouince. And to draw away in many places the thoughts & forces of Cesar, he succoured continually the Duke of Guel-dres, who molested the countreys of Charles the little sonne of the Emperour. Besides all this, he had sent to Verona Iohn Idoues de Triauce with foure hundred French Launces, and foure thousand footemen, to the succours of the Venetians, who had also sent to Rouera the Count Pettilano with foure hundred men at armes, and many bandes of footemen, to the end to remaine there for the repressing of those stirres that might arise towards Trent: and to Friul were sent eight hundred men at armes vnder Bartlemew Aluana, who long time before was entred into their payes. But the first danger appeared on that side which was least doubted, for that Paule Baptista Iustinian and Fregosin exiles of Genes, led to Casola, a towne belonging to Lodowike Confagua feodar of the Empire, a thousand Almaine footemen, who marching secretly and with great diligence ouer the mountaines and impassible places of the Venetian territorie, had an intention to go to Genes, after they had passed by the riuier of Po along the mountaine of Parma. This expedition being doubted of by Monsieur Chaumont, he dispatched suddenly to Parma many horsemen and footmen, to give impediment to the enemy, which so cut off all hope from the Al-mains, to be able to execute any thing against Genes, that they returned into Germany by the same way, but not with the same diligence & danger, for that the Venetians, respecting their comon benefite, made a secret consent to their retreating. There were at the same instant, many of the exiles of Genes in the towne of Bolonia, which draue the king into a suspicion, that this matter had bene wrought by the consent of the Pope, of whose inclination and will, many other things put him in doubt, both for that the Emperour was solicited to march by the Cardinall S. Cresse, notwithstanding more of his proper mores & disposition, then for any other occasiō: & also the exiles of Furly being by chace issued out of Favara, & allying one night to enter into Furly, the Pope complained that it was a matter compact betweene the French king & the Venetians. To these was added the conspiracie of a Monke, who being prisoner in Mantua, had confessed that he had practised with the familie of Bentiuole to empoison the Pope, & that he was solicited from M. de Chaumont to performe all his promises to the Bentiuolen: by reason whereof the Pope proceeding by examinatio in forme authentike, sent it to the king by Achilles de Grassi, Bishop of Pefera, and afterwards Cardinall, to make request that the truth might be knowen, proceeding to the punishment of such as should be found guilty in so great a wickednes. In so much as Alexander Bentiuole, being suspected more then the residue, was adiourned by the king to appeare & answer in Fraunce to such things as he was to be charged withall. With these actions and incertainties, ended the yeare 1507.

But in the beginning of the yeare following, the traueilling mindes of them of Bologna, no longer disposed to nourish their tranquillitie, drew into conspiracie, and being led by Annaball and Hermio Bentiuole, who had intelligence with certaine young Gentlemen of the familie of the Pepolies, with others of race and yeares equall, they approached vpon the sudden Bologna: an enterprize not without perill, for that the conspiratours to the end to let in the residue, had occupied the gate of S. Mamila. But as it became to repress a violence in the beginning, so the people taking armes in fauour of the estate Ecclesiastike, the young men abandoned the gate with more feare then valour, and the Bentiuolen retired, finding onely that safetie in their aduentures. This inuasion rather abated then inflamed the minde of the Pope against the French king, for that his Maiestie shewing great tokens how much it did discontent him, commaunded Monsieur Chaumont to be ready to succour Bologna, and all that depended vpon it, in all necessities and occasions: he gaue order besides, that from thenceforth the Bentiuolen should not be receiued into any part of the Duchie of M. Ma. By which restraint, Iohn, one of the chiefe of them, dyed about that time of displeasure, for that much lesse that he had bene accustomed afore he was expelled Bologna to seeke the aduantages or bitter blowes of fortune, seeing he had bene the most happie of all the other tyrants of Italie, seruing a long time as an example of prosperous fortune: for, in the course of fortie yeares, during the which he commaunded as he would in Bologna, much lesse that he was touched with any heauie affliction, seeing in all that race of time he felt not so much as the death of any his friends: he had alwayes for himselfe and children, pensions, appointments, and great honours of all the Princes in Italie, being followed withall with this felicity to escape easily out of all waightie and dangerous affaires: for all which graces and good succceedings, he seemed (besides the convenient situation of that Citie) to be principally beholding to fortune, for that according to common iudgement, he could not merite any thing by the propertie of his wit, or by his wisdom, and much lesse by any valour that was in his person.

Cæsar now minding no more to deferre the mounting of armes, dispatched a Herald to Verona, to publish his resolution to passe into Italie to take the Imperiall Crowne, and to require lodging for foure thousand horse. Whereunto the gouernours of Verona, having first communicated with the counsell of Venice, answered him, that if he would passe for no other occasion then to receiue the crowne, they would honour him with all the offices and obseruances they could, but they saw effects contrarie to his perswasions, having already brought & bestowed vpon their marches so great proportions of men at armes and artilleries. In regard of which answer, measuring by them the deuotion of others, Maximilian as soone as he was come to Trent, to giue beginning to the warre, made a solemne procession the fourth of February, which he assisted in person, hauing before him the Heralds of the Empire, and the Imperiall sword naked, and in the end of the solemnitie, his Secretarie M. Lango afterwards Bishop of Garce, being mounted in to a high seat or theater, published in the name of Cæsar his determination to passe in warlike array into Italie: he named him no more king of Romains, but Emperour elect, as are wont to be intituled the kings of Romains when they come to take the Crowne: And forbidding the same day that none should issue out of Trent, after he had caused to be baked a great quantitie of Bisket, and made baskets of wood, and sent by the riuer of Adice sundry boates and lighters laden with prouisions, he went out of Trent the night after a litle before day with a thousand five hundred horse, and foure thousand footemen: not of those regimentes which were agreed to him in the Dyot, but of the peoples of his Court and proper estates, taking the way that leades by those Mountaines to Vincenza. At the same time the Marquis of Brandebourgh marched towards Rouero with five hundred horsemen & two thousand footmen of the same countrey bodies, with whom he returned the day after, with no memorie of other action then that he presented himselfe before Rouero, and demaunded in vaine to bee lodged in the towne. But the Emperour elect being come to the mountaine of Siagne, the foote whereof draweth within twelue myles of Vincenza, after he had taken the landes of the seuen communalities (a people so named dwelling in the top of the Mountaine vnder many exemptions and priuiledges of the Venetians) and after he had filled vp many trenches which they had cast for their defence, and to stop the way, hee caused to bee drawn thither many peeces of artillerie. Here it seemed that either his intention had imperfection, or his fortune was contrarie to the disposition of the time, for, as mens mindes entertained a wonderfull expectation of some good successe, hee retired from this place the fourth day after he departed from Trent, and returned to Bolsana, a towne further remoued from the confines of Italie, then Trent: wherein as it gaue occasion to euery one to wonder at so great an inconsideration, or rather inconstancie: so, so weake a beginning reuiued effoones the mindes of the Venetians, in so much that as they had already entertained many bandes of footemen, so they called to Rouero the French companies which were at Verona with Triumice, and beginning to make great preparations, they stirred vp the French king to do the like, who marching towards Italie, sent before an armie of five thousand Swissers of his payes, and three thousand payed by the Venetians, that Nation (for that Maximilian was not able to minister pay to them) being runne without any regard to the intertainment of the French: and yet after they were departed and payed, they would not go vpon the landes of the Venetians, alledging for their reasons, that they would not serue the French king in any other action, then for the defence of the estate of Millan.

A greater stirre, but farre more wretched and vnhappie, as wherein was nourished the beginning of greater things, was kindled in Friul, whither did passe by the way of the Mountaines, and by Cæsars appointment, foure hundred horse and five thousand footemen, all bodies commaunded in his countrey of Tirol. As soone as they were entred into the valley of Caorsa, they tooke the Borough and Castell, wherein was a verie slender garrison, together with the Magistrate of the Venetians that was within, which being vnderstood at Venice, they commaunded Aluano and George Cornaro Superintendent remaining vpon the landes of Vincenza, to make speedily to the succours of that countrey; and to keepe occupied the enemies on that side, they sent towards Trent foure light galleys with certaine vessels of other nature. And at the

At the same time Maximilian, who was marched from Bolsano to Brunich, and turning to the way of Frinl for the oportunitie of the passages, & largeness of the countrey, ran through certaine valleys more then fortie myles within the territories of the Venetians, with a strength of six thousand footmen leauidd in those quarters: and after he had taken the valley of Cadora which leadeth to Trenisfa, leauing behind him the borough of Boltauero lately appertaining to the Patriarkes of Aquilea, he tooke the borough of S. Martin, the borough of Pienna, & the valley which was kept by the Comtes of Sauonina, with other places adioyning. He performed these incursions rather in the proprietie of an intrepid Captaine, then in the person and maiestie of a king, more contented with victories of men in persons & places, then seeking after actions of importance according to the expectation of his name and vertue. And after he had spent some dayes in these trifling seruices, he commaunded his companies to draw to Trenisfa, and returned himselfe vpon the end of Februarie to Ispruch to lay Jewels in pawne, and make other prouisions for money, wherof being rather a prodigall waster, then a temperate distributor, no reasonable quantitie could suffice to furnish the necessitie of his affaires: for that his wants could not be satisfied with the abundance of things, since he measured not his sufficiencie according to the kinde of neede, but after the rage of his opinion and prodigality. But vnderstanding on the way that the Swissers had taken the pay of the French, he was not a litle discontented with them, and so went to Vilma a Citie of Swauia, to induce that ligue to ayde him as they had done in times past in the warre against the Swissers: he made also vehement instance to the Electours, that the aydes promised in the Dyot of Constance, might be yet recontinued for sixe moneths more, alledging that the action of great enterprises require a long and deliberate time. And about this season the regimentes of the estates which were abyding at Trent to the number of nine thousand bodies as well footemen as horsemen, had battered the Castell of Baioquo, and ranged it to discretion within three dayes: it standes right ouer against Ruero on the right hand, vpon the high way that leades from Trent into Italie, and betweene it and Rouero which is on the left hand, runneth the riuier of Adica.

Aluiano departed in great diligence to succour Frinl, and passing along the mountaines laden with snowes, he came in two dayes neare to Cadora, where expecting his trayne of footemen, who could not march with the same speede and swiftnesse, he occupied a passage not guarded by the Almaines, by the which is made the entrie into the valley of Cadora: and as in a generall perill a litle comfort profiteth much, so at the comming of Aluiano, the men of the countrey affected to the iurisdiction of Venice, taking new courage, commaunded the other passages of the valley by the which the Almaines were to retire: who seeing themselves inclosed, and no hope of safetie but by the sword, and iudging by the disposition of Aluiano that he would dayly strengthen himselfe, marched out against him in great furie: hee refused not the offer of the fight, taking no lesse courage in the oportunitie of the enemye, then in the innocencie of the quarrell, whereupon began betweene both parties a most cruell fight, wherein the Almaines, who fought with great rage, more for desire to dye gloriously, then that there was hope to saue their liues, and casting themselves in a grosse squadron, their wiues in the middest, made a valiant defence for certaine houres: but as in actions of battell God oftentimes giues the victorie, not to those that fight best, but to such as he fououreth most, so the Almaines; not able to make long resistance, both for the numbers and vertue of the enemies, were in the end vanquished, more then a thousand of them remaining dead on the place, and the residue falling to be prisoners according to the aduenture and fortune of the fight. After this victorie Aluiano ioyning diligence and expedition to his felicitie, tooke the Castell of Cadora, which he assaulted on two partes, Charles Malatesta one of the auncient Lordes of Rimini being slaine with a quarrell shot out of a tower: and following still the streame of his fortune and good luckesse, he tooke Porto Nauona, and afterwarde Cremonsa situate vpon the height of a hill, & so discented to encampe afore Gorissa, standing at the foote of the Alpes of Iulian, strong by situation, and no lesse mightie by the munition it containes, and hath a Castell of very hard access: and taking first the bridge of Gorissa, and planting afterwarde his artilleries before the towne, he caried it the fourth day by composition, being in great necessitie of weapons, water, and victuals. After the towne was commanded, the Castlekeeper and companies within the Castell, eschewing their proper calamities by the examples of their fellowes, came to rendring after they had receiued foure thousand ducets. The Venetians erected there forthwith many fortifications to serue as a bulwarke & bridle against the Turkes, and to hold them in feare for passing the riuier of Lisono, since with the oportunitie that place there might be easie impedimentes giuen to their retraites. From Goritia Vilquiano marched to encampe before Triesta, a Citie at the same time much molested by the sea, which he tooke easily, not without the discontentment of the French king, who gaue counsell not to pro- uoke so much the king of Romains: but for that it stood vpon the gulse of Venice, and by that rea- son very conuenient for their traffikes, they made proud by the prosperitie of their fortune, could not be discourtelled to follow the course of their victorie: in so much as after the action of Triesta and the Castell, they tooke Porton, and afterwards Fiume, which is a towne of Esclanon, in the prospect of Ancona, which they burned, for that it was the retraite of the ships which would passe by the sea Adriatique, without paying the customes that were imposed: & afterwards, passing the Alpes, they tooke Possionia, which is vpon the marches of Hungarie.

These were the enterprises that were done in the countrey of Friul: But on that side towardes Trent, the Almaine armie which was now come to Calliana, a towne famous for the harmes of the Venetians, for that twentie yeares afore Ro. S. Seuerin a notable Captaine of their armie was ouerthrowen and flaine, charging vpon three thousand footmen of the Venetians, left for the garde of the mount Bressonia, who notwithstanding they were sufficiently fortified, fled suddenly into the next mountaine, fearing more then was necessarie the perill that was farre off and doubtfull, which made the Almaines, scorning the cowardise of the Italian footemen, rise into more violent actions, burning many houses, and after they had reuerled many of their trenches & defences made in the mountaine, they returned to Calliana. By this successe, the Bishop of Trent taking stomacke according to the fortune of the time, went with an armie of two thousand footmen, appointed with part of the people that were at Calliana, to besiege Rina Trent, which is a great borough standing vpon the lake of Garde, whither Triunice had already sent a sufficient garrison: and after he had for two dayes battered the Church of Saint Francis, and in the meane while made certaine incursions vpon the villages that are about Lodrona, two thousand Grisons seruing in the Almaine campe, fell into mutinie for a quarrell of small importance concerning their pay- mentes, and made pillage of the victuals of the campe: by reason whereof, all things being in disorder, and most of the bandes of the Grisons forsaken the campe, the remainder of the armie containing seuen thousand men, was constrained to retire, the same ministring oportu- nitie and courage to the Venetian regimentes to make inuasions vpon the next villages; of whom as three thousand went in troupes to burne certaine townes of the Count d'Agreste, they were charged and broken by the Paisantes, and three hundred of them cut in peeces, not remem- bering that in matters of enterprise it is an office as necessarie to foresee perils to come, as to exe- cute when occasion is giuen. For the retraite of the Almaines which were before Rine, almost all the bandes being separate, and the horsemen (containing a body of twelue hundred) being re- tired from their lodgings of Calliana to Trent, the regimentes of the Venetians, on Easterday morning assailed Pietra, a place within sixe myles of Trent: but assoone as the strength that was within Trent issued out to their succours, they retired, and afterwards assailed the Roche of Crest, which is a peece of importance, and yeelded before the succours that came from Trent were arriued: the same being the cause that the Almaines, hauing esloones reassembled and re- ordained their footemen, returned with a thousand horse and sixe thousand footmen to Calliana, distant from Pietra the shot of a Crossebow: and two hundred horsemen of the Duke of Wit- temberg being gone from them, the Venetians with foure thousand horsemen, and sixteene thousand footmen, came and encamped before Pietra, planting there a proportion of sixteene peeces of artillerie. Pietra is a Castell seated at the foote of a mountaine, on whose right hand the way leades from Romera to Trent, and out of the same comes a very strong wall containing in length the shot of a Crossebow, and stretcheth euen to the riuier of Adice, and in the midst of the same is a gate, of the which who is not maister, can hardly hurt Pietra. The two armies were with- in a myle one of another, and they both had before them the Castell and the wall, and on the one side the riuier of Adice, and on the other the mountaines, and either armie hauing at their backs, places of sure retraite. And for that the Almaines had the Castell and the wall in their power, they might when they list driue the Venetian armie to fight, which was impossible to the Vene- tians, who for that they were inferiour in numbers, much lesse that they durst commit things to aduenture, seeing they deuised onely to raise impedimentes that the enemies should not carie the Castell which was continually battered by their artilleries. But the Almains, in whom was indifferrent the vertue of celeritie & courage, perceiuing one day that their artillerie was slenderly garded, gaue a furious charge vpon it, & putting to flight the footemen that garded it, they won with great valour two peeces, & drew them to their lodgings. This accident abated the stomackes of the Vene- netians, who now indging it but lost time to entertaine the action of Piedra, which had deuoured many of their peoples, brake vp and retired to Rouero, and the Almains returned to Trent, where within few dayes after most part of the armie disbanded and were dispersed: and the regimentes of the Dyot, which neuer contained aboue foure thousand (for all those in substance that asssembled at Trent and Cadera, were of the countreys thereabout) returned to their houses, their terme of sixe moneths being ended, by whose example also most part of the footemen that were leauied, brake vp the seruice and departed. Maximilian himselfe who was much troubled in going from one place to another to leaue prouisions and practise, could neuer be present at those actions, but for that the Dyot of Ulma was referred to a time more conuenient, being confused in him selfe with the multitude of affaires, and shame of his successes, withdrew himselfe to Cologne, not being acknowen for many dayes where he was: and being not strög inough, neither in men, munia-tion, nor money to resist so great a storme, hauing lost all that he held in the countrey of Friul, with the other peeces affronting, he found himselfe abandoned of all succours, and in greater perill to be depriued of Trent, if in the French bandes had bene any disposition to ioyne with the Ve- netian armie. But Trinulce, who by the kings direction was resoluéd rather to pacifie then to prouoke, would passe no further then was necessarie for the defence of the Venetians: holding it as iust and honourable in the office he had, to forbear to afflict further the Emperour, as to protect the Venetians.

Maximilian standing thus abandoned, and desiring by some meane to put himselfe out of Truce between daunger, sent, since the ouerthrow at Cadera, one of his Gentlemen to Venice, to demaund truce Maximilian for three moneths, of which the Senate made no account, hauing no disposition to make truce for and the Vene- lesse then a yere, nor yet to giue any consent, if the French king were not comprehended in it.
But his daungers rising in encreasing for the losse of Triesta, and his calamities altering things into worse condition, the Bishop of Trent, as of his peculiär motion, perswaded the Venetians to truce, alleaging by that meane and foundation, a ready possibilitie and expectation of peace: The Venetians answered, that their mindes were not estraunged from it, so farreforth as they were not alone in the action, but that there were libertie for the French king to communicate. In so much as after this beginning there drew to conference together the Bishop of Trent and Serentane Se-cretarie of Maximilian, and for the French king Trinulce, and Charles Geffray President of the Parliament of Millan, and for the Venetians Zacharia Contarin Embassadoir particularly appointed for that action. They agreed easily for other conditions, seeing, as touching the time, they were resoluéd that it should last for three yeares, and euery one to retaine that he possessed at that present, with power to build and fortifie such places as they commaunded. This onely was the difficultie, that the French would haue had a generall truce, wherein should be comprehended such confederates as euery one had out of Italie, and especially the Duke of Guelldres; but the Agents of the Emperour stood obstinately against it, for that he had determined the ruine of the said Duke.
They alledged besides, that the warre being managed wholly in Italy, it was neither iust nor neces-sarie to communicate of any other things then such as touched Italie. Wherein albeit the Venetians did what they could to haue satisfied the desire of the French king, yet seeing litle hope to dispose the Almains, they were contented to embrace the truce in sort as they had consented, especially for a desire they had to deliuer themselues of such a warre which was now brought wholly vpon their estate, and no lesse to confirme in their obedience by the commoditie of the truce for three yeares, the townes which they had conquered in those stirres. They excused theselues to the French with these reasons no lesse true then iust, that neither the one nor the other of them being not further bound then for the defence of the matters of Italie, and their confederation being grounded there-vpon, they had not to do to thinke vpo matters beyond the Mountes, which if they were not bound to defend with armes, they were not also bound to deuise to assure them with the truce. Vpo this controuerfie Trinulce wrote into France, and the Venetians to Venice, whose Senate returned an-swere, that if there could not be admission of other conditions, that they should at least cöclude the truce for Italy, onely reseruing time & place for the French king to enter: whereunto albeit neither

Triunlee nor the Presidēt would not consent, cōplaining grieuouſly that they would not ſo much as tarie for the kings answer, & that notwithstanding the Presidēt protested that a ioynt & cōmon enterpriſe ſhould not be determined but by ioynt & common conſent, alledging with all how little were reſpected the kings amitie & alliance, yet the Venetians forbore not to proceede & conclud with Maximilian, & the ſtraight ruling ſimply in their proper names, they agreed that on the behalfe of Maximilian ſhould be named & holden as comprehēded & nominated, the Pope, the king Catholike, the king of England, the king of Hungarie, & all the Princes & ſubiects of the ſacred Empire in what place ſoeuer, together with all the confederates of Maximilian and the ſaid kinges and ſtates of the Empire, which ſhould be named within three moneths. And for the Venetians were named the French king, the king Catholike, with all the confederates and friends of the Venetians, of the French king, and king Catholike in Italie onely, whom they ſhould likewise name within three moneths. Thus was the truce accorded the xx. day of Aprill, and with no leſſe expedition ratified by the Emperour and the Venetians, by which meanes ceaſed the warre, with great hope, that the regions of Italie ſhould now returne to a perpetuall concord and peace.

• After armes were layd aſide by the reſolution and couenants of this peace, it ſeemed to the French king that the Florentines would haue declared themſelues rather for Caſar then for him, if the Emperours affaires had had a more happie beginning: and knowing withall that that diſpoſition proceeded of no other thing then of a deſire they had to recouer Piſa in what fort they could, and of a diſcontentment that without reſpect they had bene alwayes at his deuotion, and in the ſeruices they had done him, he had not onely not fauoured them, neither with authoritie, countenance, nor armes, but alſo had ſuffered that the Piſans were ſuccoured by the Genowayes that were his ſubiectes: hee determined in theſe regards to deuife how by ſome honeſt meane they might obtaine that they deſired: wherein for that (for the benefite of his former purpoſes) he would do it to his proper profite, and that hee thought that feare would be a better meane then hope to draw from them a greater ſumme, he diſpatched M. Riccio to make complaint, firſt that they had ſent men expreſſe to accord with Caſar his enemy, that vnder colour to giue the ſpoyle to the Piſans, they had aſſembled a mightie armie, without hauing regarde to the conditions of the time, and his ſuſpicions and daungers: that in ſo great a ſtirre and commotion which was prepared, they were neuer willing to expreſſe ſimply their intentions, wherein they gaue him juſt occaſion to doubt to what end tended thoſe preparations: and laſtly, that hauing deſired them to ayde him with their armies in ſo great perils, they reſuſed it againſt all confidence and expectation. All which notwithstanding, aſwell for the perpetuall amitie which he had alwayes borne to their common weale, as for the memorie of the good offices and obſeruances they had done in times paſt for his ſeruice, he was very ready to pardon them all theſe new iniuries, ſo farreforth, as to cut off all occaſions that might eſſeſoones trouble the tranquillitie of Italie, they would not hereafter moleſt the Piſans without his conſent. To theſe complaints the Florentines answered, that neceſſitie had induced them to ſend men to Caſar; not with any intention to couenant with him againſt the king, but (if he paſſed into Italie) to aſſure their eſtate, which the king in the capitulation made with them would not be bound to defend againſt Caſar, according to the teſtimonie of an expreſſe claufe, bearing theſe wordes, Sauing the rights of the Empire: That he could not reaſonably complaine of the armie leauied againſt the Piſans, for that it being no greater then of cuſtome, it miniſtered no juſt occaſion of new ſuſpicions, and being aſſembled for no other effectes, then (as in other times) to giue impediments to the harueſt of the Piſans, there was no reaſonable cauſe of doubt, if mens iudgements were as indifferent as the matter was innocent: That for ſuch a matter, and for the ſuccours which the Genowayes and other neighbours gaue then to the Piſans, it was not poſſible for them to ſend their ſouldiers to the king, whereunto albe it they were not bound, yet for the deuotion they had alwayes borne to him, they would not haue ſtucke to haue done it, yea though they had not bin required: that they maruelled greatly at the kings deſire, that the Piſans ſhould not be moleſted, whom he had no reaſon to eſteeme or value with the Florentines, if he had any impreſſion of their actions againſt him in the rebellion of Genes: And that he could not juſtly forbid them to moleſt the Piſans, for that the confederation which they had made with him did ſo import and beare it. Vpon theſe beginnings they conſulted afterwarde to reduce Piſa vnder the obedience of the Florentines: whereunto it ſeemed this did ſuffice, if order were giuen that neither the Genowayes nor Lucquois ſhould ſuccour it in ſuch a neceſſitie of victuals and forces,

Forces, that the Pisans durst no more issue out of their towne: adioyning withall, for the losse of the trust, the ill disposition of those of the plaine countrey, being in greater nūber then the Citizens: so much as it was beleueed that they could not hold out, if they receiued not from Genes and Lucqua certaine quantities of money, by meane of which such as gouerned kept within Pisa certaine forreine souldiers, and distributing the residue to the young men, aswell of the towne as of the plaine countrey, they astonished with the armes of those, such as desired to accord with the Florentins, keeping by this meane the towne in peace and free from mutiny. To this practise begun by the French king, was added the authority of the King Catholike, ieaious belike that without him such a matter could worke no effect: and therefore assoone as he vnderstood that A. Riccio was gone to Florence, he dispatched also an Embassador, who going first to Pisa, encouraged them in the name of his king to take comfort and hold out: not for other respect, then that remayning wilfull and obstinate to yeeld to the Florentins, they might be sold for a greater price. A litle after these enterpeeches by consent of both kings, were caried into the Court of the French king, where, without any regard to the protection so oftentimes promised, the king Catholike solicited with great importunity the resolution of that businesse, both for that he knew that Pisa being not defended, would necessarily fall into the power of the Florentins, & also he had at that time no disposition to entangle himselfe with new affaires, and chiefly against the will of the French king: for, notwithstanding he had immediatly vpon his returning into Spain, resumed the gouernment of Castille, yet he stood not well confirmed in it, both for the separate wils and inclinations of the Barons, and also they had not iustified his consent in the name of his nephew. But after the cause of the Pisans had bene long debated in the Court of Fraunce, diuersity of affections hindring the successe: at last, for many difficulties which hapned, but principally for that both the kings sought to appropriate to themselues the price of the sale of it, the practise was dissolued without any forme of conclusion.

THE EIGHT BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT.

Most of the Princes of Christendome draw into league at Cambray against the Venetians, who being overthrowne by the French king, render the townes of the Church, and make submission to the king of Romaines. Pisa returneth to the obedience of the Florentines. The Venetians recover the towne of Padua, which is soone after besieged by Caesar. Afterwards they make warre to the Duke of Ferrara. The Pope gines them absolution of the Church censures.

THe diuisions of Italie were not so tractable, as that they could be reconciled with litle labour, nor the infirmities of the countrey so easie and priuate, as that they stood subiect to be redressed or recured with light medicines: but as it often hapneth, that in bodies replenished with humours corrupt, the remedie that is applied to repurge the maladie of one part, ingendreth more daungerous infections: euen so the truce made betweene the king of Romaines and the Venetians, in place of the vniuersall expectation of tranquillitie, brought forth to the Potentates and Communalities of Italy, infinite calamities and cruelties of warre, farre exceeding the examples passed: for, notwithstanding the regions of Italy for foureteeen yeares, had borne a perpetuall crosse of warres and mutations: yet, quarrels being oftentimes ended without effusion of blood, and battels and skirmishes falling for the most part vpon the strangers onely, the peoples had lesse sufferance then the Princes, and the naturall regions much spared from the bloudie miseries and actions of warre. But the gap being opened to new discords in time to come, there followed throughout all Italy, and against the Italians themselves, a miserable traine of many calamities and cruell accidents, infinite murders, sackings, destructions, and spoiles of Cities, a libertie of warre no lesse offensive to their friends, then hurtfull to their enemies, and a lamentable violation of religion and all holy things, with lesse reuerence and respect, then if they were prophane and popular, the law and equitie of things being measured by the wils of the souldiers, and nothing iudged vnreasonable against him, that was able to alleage authoritie, might or will: fruites ordinarie following ciuill discord, and by so much the more perillous and working, by how much they happen in a second mutation, as all euils are more daungerous in a second degree then in the first. The cause of so many afflictions in a generall consideration was, the ambition and couetousnesse of Princes, of whom many of them could not brooke any limitation of power, imperie or kingdome: but if they be weighed in a particular consideration, they may be seene to take their beginning of the too rash and insolent manner of proceeding of the Venetians, by occasion whereof were ceased those difficulties which till that time had holden in suspence and impediments the French king and Cesar from agreeing together against them: of whom, the one being greatly kindled, they put him in dispaire, and at the same time moued the other to no small indignation, or at the least gaue him meane to disclose vnder an apparant colour, that which he had long desired: for Cesar, being netled by so many infamies and harmes receiued, loosing part of his proper inheritance, in place to conquer the estates of others, was not to omit any oportunitie wherein occasion might be giuen him to recouer or repaire so great slaunders and losses: a disposition which the Venetians vndiscretely increased anew, since the making of the truce: for that not sparing to aggrauate his indignation no lesse with vaine demonstrations then worse effects, they receiued into Venice Aluiano with publike pompe, almost resembling a ceremoniall triumph. And the French king, albeit at the beginning he gaue a certaine hope to ratifie the truce that was made, yet expressing afterwardes the discontentment he tooke, he complained of the presumptiō of the Venetians to name him & conclude him as adherent, & prouiding for the ir proper tranquility, to giue him ouer & leaue him in the cares and trauels of the war.

These dispositions of mind both of the one and the other, began to burst out into speedy and manifest experience: for Cesar hauing no further confidence in his proper forces, and lesse expectation that the Princes or peoples of Germanie would take to heart the iniuries that had bene done to him, made as though he had a desire to confederate with the French king against the Venetians, as the onely remedy to recouer eistsoones the honour and estates he had lost: and the French king, following the course and oportunitie of the time, nourished the same inclination, the new disdain renewing in him the memory of auncient offences receiued in the warres of Naples, entertaining also a working desire to draw out of their hands Cremona, and other townes of the auncient possessions of the dukes of Millan. Therefore to the ende that in remouing the impediments of things inferiour, they might withall proceede to those of higher degree, they began to debate how to resolue the quarrels betweene the Archduke and the Duke of Guelldres, whose safety the French king held much for recommended, for the auncient alliance and commodities he had receiued by him. The Pope did also communicate in this motion, stirring vp at the same time the French king against the Venetians, being, besides the auncient indignations newly kindled and made hatefull against them for an opinion he had that by their meanes the exiles of Furly, who were retired to Faenza, had made a tryall to enter that city, hauing withall receiued into their dominions the family of Bentiuoleis chased by the king out of the Duchy of Millan. To these was added this imputation, that in many things they had borne slender regard to the authority of the court of Rome, and of late experience had slenderly respected it in this, which troubled not a little the Popes mind: the Pope had translated the Bishoprike of Vincense, vacant by the death of the Cardinall S. P. ad Vincula his nephew, to Sixtus his nephew also suborned by him into the dignity of Cardinall, and to those benefices. But the Senate of Venice, making small reckening of this collation, chose a gentleman of Venice, who, the Pope refusing to confirme him, tooke boldnesse to name himselfe Bishop of Vincense of the election of the most excellent counsell of the Pregati: But the Pope

The Pope being not a little kindled for these obstinacies, dispatched first to the king, Maximus Secretary to the Cardinall of Narbona, and afterwards the Cardinall himselfe, who newly succeeding the late Cardinall of Achx in his Bishoprike, was called the Cardinall of Achx. They were willingly receiued and heard of the king, and brought backe with them the deuise of many meanes and ploys to put in execution that which he desired both without the Emperour, and without any confederacy with him. But the Pope shewed a more inclination to complaine, then to determine any thing, for that on the one side, the vnquiet desire he had to make armes to be leauied against the Venetians troubled his mind, and on the other, he seemed fearefull to be constrained to depend too much of the greatnesse of another: but much more was he moued by an auncient ieaousie he had taken against the Cardinall of Amboise, in whose respect it seemed grieuous to him that the armies of the French king should passe into Italy. Besides, the affaires of greatest importance were somewhat troubled by the late presumption of the Pope, disposing a little before without the kings knowledge, the Bishoprikes of Ast and Plaisance, and withall, for that the king resisted the new Cardinall of S. P. ad Vincula, to whom by the death of the other, the rich Abbey of Cleruault neare to Millan was transferred, to take possession of it: so irrefolute was the Pope, wandring betwene feare & ambition, and so inconstant the French king, obseruing to make his profit on the traine & euent of things: for albeit the Pope could not be resolued amid so many difficulties, yet in the end the French king & Cesar, both applying with the course & oportunities of times, determined to communicate secretly together against the Venetians, wherein for the better countenance & colour to the actiō, & withall to giue perfection to those things that shold be debated, there assembled in the town of Cābray for Cesar, the Lady Margaret his daughter Regent of Flanders, & of those other estates which were disceded to king Philip by the mothers right, assisted for the regard of this actiō by Mathew Lōgo a Secretary of great credit with Cesar: & for the French king, was sent the Cardinall of Amboise, followed with certaine other particulars, rather to furnish his traine, then to communicate in the action. They caused to publish a brute that these estates assembled to solicit a peace betwene the Archduke & duke of Guelldres, betwene who they had set downe a truce for forty yeares: And keeping alwayes vnknowne frō the Venetians the true occasion, the Cardinall assured by great oathes to their Embassador, that his king would continue in the confederation he had with them, wherein also the Embassador of the king of Aragon followed him, rather not denying then graunting, for that albeit that king was the first mouer of these conferences betwene the Emperour and the French king, yet hauing continuation afterwards without him, both the one and other of them, were perswaded that the prosperity of the French king would be intolerable to him, and as touching the gouernment of Castille, would hold for suspected the greatnesse of Cesar, and therefore his thoughts in that action were not conformable to his words.

At Cambrey things were resolued in very few dayes, without communicating with the Embassador of the king Catholike, till after the conclusion, which the tenth day of December was solemnly confirmed in the great Church, with the oathes of Lady Margaret, the Cardinall of Amboise, and the Spanish Embassador. In this publication they expressed nothing, but that there was established betwene the Pope and either of those Princes a perpetuall peace and confederation: but in Articles more priuate and secret, were contained clauses of right great importance, which being full of ambition, and wholly contrary to the couenants which Cesar and the French king had with the Venetians, were couered with a preamble full of great piety, and affection to religion, as though the diuersity of words were sufficient to alter and change the effects of things. It was expressed in that preamble, that, for a common desire to begin a warre against the enemies of the name of Christ, and the impediments which the Venetians had giuen, occupying ambitiously the landes of the Church, which now they meant to remoue, to proceede with better consent and agreement to so holy and necessary an expedition. And by the perswasions and counsels of the Pope, the Cardinall of Amboise as his Procurer, and with his authority, and as deputed and authorised by the French king, and by the personall solicitation of Lady Margaret, assigned and authorised by the king of Romains, & as gouernesse to the Archduke and the estates of Flanders: and lastly by the cōsent of the Embassador of the king of Aragon as fully appointed by his king: they were resolued to make war vpon the Venetians, euery one in his owne right to recover the things they had vsurped vpon them, which for the Pope were Faenza, Rimini, Rauenna, & Ceruia: for the king of Romains, Padua, Vincenza, & Verona, appertaining to him in the name of the Empire, and the places of Friul and Trevisan, being parcell of the inheritance of the house of Austria: for the French king were Cremona, Guaradadda, Bresse, Bergama, and Crema: and for the regard of the king of Aragon, were the townes and hauens which had bene morgaged by Ferdinand king of Naples. The articles were these: That the French king was bound to the warre in person, and to giue the first recall beginning the first day of the next Aprill, at what time also the Pope and the king Catholike should enter into the action: That to the end the king of Romains should haue iust cause not to blesse the truce that was made, the Pope should demaund fauours of him as of the protector of the Church, and that after that the king of Romains should send to him at the least a Captaine, & should be bound forty dayes after the French king had begun the war to inuade the estates of the Venetians in person: That which soeuer of them should recouer that which appertained to him, should be bound to minister aide to the others, till they had made a full and sufficient recouery: That they were all bound to defend one another, in case the Venetians offered to oppresse them for any places that were recouered, and not one of them in particular should compound or agree with the Venetians without a comon consent: That the Duke of Ferrara, and Marquis of Mantua, and who else would pretend the Venetians to vsurpe any place of theirs, had liberty to be named in the league within the monethes: and being once named, to inioy all the benefits and fauours of the confederation in as full power and nature as the principals of the same, communicating the fulnesse of authority for the reconquering of those things that they had lost: That the Pope should summon the Venetians vnder great paines and curses, to make restitution of such things as they occupied of the Church: That he should be iudge betweene Blanch Maria the king of Romains wife, and the Duke of Ferrara, touching the contention for an inheritance and succession of Anna her sister, and sometimes wife to the sayd Duke: That Cesar should inuelt the French king in the duchy of Millan, for himselfe, Francis de Angoulême, & to their issue males, for which inuestiture the French king should pay to him an hundred thousand duckets: That Cesar and the Archduke should not during the warre and fixe monethes after, make any innouation against the king Catholike for any respect of the gouernment and titles of the realms of Castile: That the Pope should exhort the king of Hungarie to enter into the confederation: That euery one should name within foure monethes his confederates and adherents, excepting expressely to comprehend the Venetians and the subiects freeholders of the confederates, and that euery principall party in the contract, should ratifie all these articles within threescore dayes next following: To this vniuersall league was adioyned the particular accord betweene the Archduke and the Duke of Gueldres, wherein was agreed that restitution should be made of those townes that were taken vpon the Archduke in this warre, but not in like sort of such as were taken vpon the Duke.

Assoone as this new confederation was concluded in this sort (all things that concerned the Venetians being kept as secret as might be) the Cardinall of Amboise departed the day following from Cambray: the Bishop of Paris and Albert Pio Count of Carpi being first sent to the king of Romains to receiue his ratification in the name of the French king: he made no delay to confirme all the articles with the same oath and forme of solemnities with the which it was published in the Church of Cambray, holding it but iust to ratifie the thing that so much tended to the confirmation of his estate and security, as he held it equall and reasonable to iustifie that by publike approbation, which he had so long solicited by priuate desire and intention: it is most certaine, that albeit the words of the publication bare, that the authority of the Pope and king of Aragon did communicate in it, yet the confederation was made mecrely without their assistance and consent: And action which Cesar and the French king tooke wholly vpon themselves, not doubting of the Popes and king of Aragons consent, partly in regard of their proper profit, and partly for that according to the estate & condition of things present, neither of them both durst gainsay their authority, & particularly the king of Aragon, to whom albeit the articles in their due construction seemed both ielous & intollerable, for that fearing least the greatnes of the French king wold encrease too much, he preferred the surety of the whole kingdome of Naples afore the recouering of one part which was holden by the Venetians: yet, expressing cunningly a readinesse dissembled, and an inclination contrary to the intentions of his mind, he made present ratification with the same ceremonies which the others vsed. But touching the Pope, he made farre more doubt of things, wandring according to his custome betweene a desire to recouer the townes of Romania, ioyned to a disdain against the

the Venetians, and a troublesome feare of the greatnesse of the French king: he saw not how daungerous it was to him for the power of Caesar to begin to stretch farre in Italie, and therefore seeming that it was more for his profite to obtaine by accord part of that he desired, then to recouer the whole by warre and sword, he laboured to induce the Venetians to render to him Rimini and Faenza: wherein he forgot not to lay aforesaid them that those daungers which threatned them by the vnion of so many Princes, would be of greater terrour & importance, if he were concurrant with them in a confederation: as to whose authoritie and place it belonged to pursue them with armes spirituall and temporall: where, if they rendered the townes which they had taken vpon the Church since he was Pope, by which meanes he should make a ioynt recouerie of honour and estates, he should haue iust occasion not to ratifie that whereunto he had no interest either in assistance, consent, or authoritie: he debated with them that as the confederation communicating nothing with the holy and supreme authoritie would easily dissolue and vanish, hauing in it selfe many difficulties: so he sayd it was not reasonable they should doubt that he would not vrge to the vttermost of his authoritie & industrie to keepe repressed in Italy the power of straungers, which brought no lesse perill to the sea Apostolike, then to their state. In this perswasion he omitted nothing that might make aduanced his cause, which he followed no lesse with his authoritie and eloquence, then with liberalities and offers: Matters that moue not the least in a case of perswasion, carying as they list the mindes of men affecting ambition or worldly desires. The Senate drew to counsell vpon this demaund, some iudging it a thing of great importance, to separate the Pope from Caesar and the French king, and others thought it an action vnworthy, and not sufficient to turne away the warre. At last, as in matters of debate and controuersie, opinion oftentimes commaundes reason, so the faction of such as gaue the best counsell had caried it, had not bene the reasons and perswasions of D. Trevisan a Senatour of great authoritie, and one of the Procurers of the rich temple of S. Marke, an honour next to the dignitie of the Duke, of highest respect and reputation in the common weale of Venice: he discoursed with reasons full of efficacie and authoritie, that it was an action contrarie to the dignitie and profite of that renowned common weale, to restore those townes which the Pope required; & that the estate of their dangers would neither much increase or diminish for the coniunction or separation of him from the other confederates: for, albeit in the negociation of the accord they had vsed the Popes name, perhaps to make their cause seeme lesse dishonest, yet in effect they had agreed without him, hauing no necessitie of his consent and priuie, and therefore would become neither the more cold nor the more hot in the execution of things they had concluded: Of the contrarie, the armes of the Pope were not of that valour and importance, as to driue them to buy at so great a price the disposing of the same: seeing that albeit they should be assayled at one selfe time by the others, yet they might easily with a very slender garrison defend those Cities which the regiments of the Church (the very dishonour of souldiers and men of seruice) were not sufficient to take of themselves, and much lesse import much as touching the substance of the warre: he sayd, that in the stirres and heats of teniporall armes, men did litle respect either the reuerence or threatnings of armes spirituall, which they ought not to feare to be more able to hurt them in that war, then they had done in many others, namely in the expedition against Ferrara: in which the armes of the Church could not let that they obtained not a peace honorable for the, & infamous for the residue of Italy, which with one vniuersall accord, & in a time wherein it flourished most with riches, power, & valour, was banded wholly against the: And in reason & concordance of causes he alleaged, that it was not likely that the almighty & omnipotent God would suffer that the effects of his seueritie & his mercy, of his anger & his peace, should rest in the distribution & power of a man ambitious & proud, & by his subiection to wine, with many other dishonest and immoderate affections, would administer them not according to the consideration of iustice, & benefice of Christendome, but as he was pushed on with his vile, corrupt, & intemperate humours. Besides, he saw not by what reason they might hope for a greater constancie of faith in this Pope then in others his elders, & predecessours, making for the most part their authoritie subiect to their ambition, & their counsels alwayes running with the concurrence & course of times: Neither could he discern how they might be assured that the Pope, hauing obtained Faenza and Rimini, would not knit with the residue to recouer Rauenna and Cervina, hauing a minde specially watchfull ouer oportunitie and occasions giuen: That the experience of his actions and examples past, proued in him no greater stay or stabilitie of faith, then agreed with the custome of other

Popes, who, to giue a colour of iustice and equitie to those things they did, left ordeined amongst their other lawes, that the Church, notwithstanding all contract, promise, and benefites receiued, might retract and directly impugne any bondes or obligations which the selfe Prelates had made. He alleaged that albeit the confederation betweene Maximilian and the French king was made with a great vehemencie of disposition, yet the wils & intentions of the other contracted parties did varie and differ, the king Catholike being brought in by meanes compulsiue and extraneous, and the Pope well expressing signes of his accustomed doubts and suspitions: and therefore the league of Cambray was not more to be feared, then the confederacie which the same Maximilian and king Louis had with the same importunitie treated aforesometimes at Trent, and afterwards at Blais: for that many difficulties, which for their affinitie and nature, it was almost impossible to remoue or alter, did mightily resist the execution of things determined: That for those reasons it touched the Senate in principall studie, & diligence to deuise meanes to separate Cesar from such communion: a matter of easie hope and expectation, no lesse for the respect of his nature and necessities, then for his auncient hatred against the French: and being once deuised from it, the whole feares of the warre were taken away, for that the French king standing abandoned of his societie & succours, would beare no more stomacke to inuade them then he had done in times past: That in all publike actions the beginning ought deeply to be considered, since afterwarde it was not in the power of men to temporise or leaue off without dishonor & danger to their deliberations, wherein they had long consulted: That as their elders, so they by succession, had bin alwayes carefull in all occasions to augmet their dominion, & with a disclosed & open profession to aspire to great things: a matter which made them hatefull to many, partly for feare, & partly for displeasure & disdain of that they had taken from them: wherein albeit it hath bene perceiued long time before, that that hatred might engender some great alteration, yet, as they haue not for all that forborne to embrace the occasions that had bin offered them, so it was not now a remedie to the dangers present, to begin to leaue a part of that they did possesse, since it would rather kindle then quench the humours of those that hated them, taking courage vpon their fearefulness: And seeing it hath bene a perpetuall maxime amongst the Potentates of Italia, that the Venetians neuer forlooke things that once were falne into their hands, who would not iudge that to breake now so honourable a custome, proceeded not of a last dispaire to be able to defend the perils that threatned: That whosoever began to giue place and leaue any thing how litle soeuer, was the first detector of the reputation and auncient honour of his common weale, which as it is a ready oportunitie to the augmentation of daungers, so to that state that beginnes to decline, it is farre more hard to conferue against the least perils that be, than which remains then against another state, who caring to keepe his dignitie and degree, and making no signe to yeeld or giue place, conuerter his force readily against him that seekes to oppresse him: Valour and courage retaine long those things that of themselves are weake and impotent: and as nothing doth more terrifie the enemy then to seeme to be resolute, so to hold fast that that hath bin gotten, is a colour iustificatorie to enable the title and interest of the thing: There can be no greater infamie to a Prince or common weale, then by negligence or cowardise to lose that which their aunccestors haue gottē with diligence & valour: That it was necessarie either to reiect valiantly those first demaunds, or in yeelding to them, to looke to yeeld to many more, by which in short time is to be expected the absolute subuersion of their estate, and by consequent the irreparable losse of their proper libertie: That as their comon weale both in the ages of their fathers, & in their dayes, had borne out many great warres against the Princes of Christendome, of which they caried a glorious issue, for that they alwayes shewed one constancie and resolution of minde: so, in the present difficulties, notwithstanding they may seeme greater, may be hoped no worse successe, both for that their power and authoritie were greater, and also by experience that in warres managed in common by many Princes against one alone, the terrors are wont to be more then the effects, for that after the first furies be abated and banished, there riseth diuersitie of opinion, which breedeth variation of faith and constancie, all things dissoluing with a naturall facilitie, that grow into their being with an immoderate importunitie and furie. Lastly, that Senate was to hope, that besides the preparations and remedies which of their owne power they were able to furnish, God the most soueraigne and righteous iudge, would not leaue abandoned a common weale bred and nourished in a perpetuall libertie, & in whom did shine the very beautie & aspect of all Europe: & much lesse would suffer to be oppressed with the ambition of Princes

Under this colour to prepare warre against the infidels, that Citie, which in so great pietie and religion, had bene for many yeares the very protectour and defender of the whole common weale of Christendome. These reasons so wrought in the mindes of the most part, that according to the example of the yeare before, and being a thing farall to that Senate, the worst counsell prevailed, contrarie to the opinions of many Senatours of great wisedome and authoritie: in so much as the Pope, who had deferred the ratification till the last day, ratified the league, but under this expresse declaration, that hee would not enter into any action of an encmie against the Florentins, vntill the French king had begun the warre.

Thus the yeare 1508. ended with many seedes of great warres, and foundations subtilly layd of many dangerous accidents and mutations, which be the wretched & ordinary traynes of ambition, diuision, and secret hates. About this time also the affaires of the Pisans suffering of late many declinations, seemed dayly to diuolue more and more into harder and straiter termes: for, besides that the Florentins the sommer before, had cut downe their corne, & with their men at armes made continuall incursions vpon the townes adioyning, euen to the gates of Pisa, yet, the better to cut off all passage & traffike of victuals by sea, they entertained in their pay the sonne of Bardell of Portouenere with certaine proportiōs of vessels: by which impediment, the Pisans standing as it were besieged both by sea and land, and not able by reason of their pouertie & afflictions, to furnish themselves neither with vessels nor forrein souldiers, found themselves in great dispaire to hold out any longer, being very weakely succoured by their neighbours. And yet as God seldome giueth so grieuous a sentence of the estate of mans mortalitie, as to deny all compassion to men in miserie: so the Genowayes and Lucquois owing pitie to the afflictions of their neighbours, consulted to conuey into Pisa certaine quantities of corne, which being fraughted in a great number of Barkes, followed with two ships of Genes, and two gallions, were transported to Spetia, and from thence to Voreggia, to the end they might be conueyed into Pisa with fourteene brigantins, and certaine small barkes, according to the direction of the Pisans. But the Florentins seeking to oppose against this enterprise, as wherein consisted their hope or dispaire to get Pisa for that yeare, they ioyned to the nauy they had already, a ship of England, haply riding in the roade of Lyuorne, with certaine other fustes and brigantins. And to minister to the nauie at sea with all the succours and preparations they could make by land, they sent all the horsemen, with a great portion of the footmen which were hastily leauied in the countrey, along all those passages and shoares by the which the nauie of the enemy might runne the course of Pisa, either by the mouth of Arne, or the riuer called the dead Flood entring into Arne. The enemies arriued at the mouth of Arne, & the Florentine vessels lying betweene the mouth and the dead riuer, and the Landmen commaunding all the apt places, had plated their artilleries as well on this side as beyond the brinke of the riuer by the which they should passe: in so much as they seeing no possibilitie to passe further, retired into the riuer of Genes, with the losse of three brigantins laden with wheat. By the occasion of which successe, the victorie seeming almost certaine for want of victuals, the Florentins to take away all oportunities for victuals to enter by the riuer, made a bridge of wood vpon Arne, which they fortified with bastillions on both sides the bankes. And as when afflictions begin to fall, they thunder all at once, aduersities hauing this in proper, not onely to oppresse, but also to deprive miserable men of ordinarie comfort: so, in the same time, to cut off all succours of their neighbours, the Florentins fell to composition with them of Lucquay: for, hauing aforetime, to repress their insolencies, sent part of their footebandes that were within Cascina, to sacke the hauen of Voregge and the storchouses, wherein were many sorts of silkes belonging to the marchants of Lucquay: the inhabitants of Lucquay made timorous by those rigorous examples, sent their Embassadors to Florence, where was accorded, that betweene both their common weales, there should be a confederation defensue for three yeares, the Lucquois being namely & expressely excluded from all power any more to succour the Pisans. This consideration to be continued for twelue yeares further, if the Florentins should recover Pisa within a yeare: & that during the terme of this league, the Florentins (alway reseruing the prerogatiue of their rights) should not molest the estate of Lucquay, touching the possession of Pietra Santa & Mutro, a league opening the principall gap to the ruine of the Pisans. But that which was of greatest importace to make easie the conquest of Pisa, was the capitulation which they made with the kings Catholike & French, which being solicited many moneths, had suffered many difficulties: for, the Florentins, by the experience of things past, feared least it were a meane to draw frō them a great quantity of money, and yet the affaires of Pisa to continue in the same degree, and on the other part, the French interpreted that they deferred cunningly, in hope that the Pisans would make a willing restitution, their extremities being desperate and now layd open to all men. The French king, vnwilling that they should recouer it, vnlesse he did communicate in the price, commanded Bardell his subiect to leaue their pay, & to M. Chaumont to dispatch frō Millan fixe hundred Launces for the succours of the Pisans: which ioyned to other actions of feare and suspicion, occupied the Florentines with such perplexities, that ceassing all difficulties, they entred couenant in this maner: That the French king and king Catholike should giue no ayde nor support to the Pisans, and also to forbid that from no places of their subiection and obedience, nor likewise from any their confederates or others vnder their protection, should enter into Pisa any succours of victuals, money, munition or men, nor any other nature of reliefe whatsoever: That the Florentines so farre forth as Pisa were recouered within a yeare following, should pay to either of them within a certaine time fiftie thousand duckets: And that in the same condition there should continue betweene them a league for three yeares, from the day that they reconquered Pisa. In consideration of which league the Florentines should be bound to defend with three hundred men at armes the citates that they held in Italie, receiuing in like sort for their defence, of either of them a proportion of three hundred men at armes. To this capitulation made in common, it was necessarie for the Florentines to adde (without the priuie of the king Catholike) new bonds to pay to the French king vnder the same conditions and termes, fiftie thousand duckets, promising withall fise and twentie thousand more to the ministers of both the kings, of which the greatest portion was to be distributed at the discretion of the Cardinall of Amboise. These couenants albeit they were heauie and costly to the Florentines, yet, in the opinion of men, they brought no lesse infamie to both the kings: the one for money abandoning the Citie which many times he had assured to be in his protection, and which being willingly offered to him, the great Captaine had accepted in his name: and the other contrarie to the reputation of so many promises made to the Florentines, both sold for a vile price the iust libertie of the Pisans, and constrained the Florentines to buy of him the power and sufferance to recouer that which iustly appertained to them: So mightie now a dayes is the force of gold and siluer, aboue the regard to honour, honestie, or conscience: and so weake is the resistance of Princes against the working of that enchaunted humor of couetousnesse, the subuerter of all honour, equitie, and honest regard.

king prepareth against the Venetians.

But the affaires of the Pisans, vpon whom all Italie was wont afore to turne their eyes, were in this time of slender consideration, for that the mindes of men depended on the expectation of greater things: for, after the league of Cambrai was ratified by all the confederates, the French king began to make great preparations: and albeit he vsed not as yet any protestations or threatens of warre, yet matters being no longer able to be dissembled, the Cardinall of Amboise in the presence of the whole councell, complained with vehement words to the Embassadour of Venice, for that that Senate, despising the alliance and amitie of the king, caused to fortifie the Abbey of Correia in the territories of Crema; wherein had bene of old time a Castell which was rased by the capitulations of peace in the yeare 1454. made betweene the Venetians & Frauncis Sforce newly Duke of Millan, with couenaunt that the Venetians should in no time make fortresse there: to the capitulations of which peace, was referred in this & in many other things, the peace made betweene them and the king. But now the king being within few dayes after come to Lyon, his regiments marched towardes the mountes, and fixe thousand Swissers leauied and payed by him, prepared to descend at the same time into Italie: he obtained also of the Genowayes, foure Carracks, and of the Florentines fiftie thousand duckets, being his moytie which they should pay vpon the conquest of Pisa. And ioyning to the aides of others, his owne succours, he leauied vpon the Duchie of Millan, (desirous to repofesse the townes which the Venetians held) an hundred thousand duckets, besides the honourable deuotion of many particular Gentlemen and free holders of that state, furnishing themselves with horses and armes, to accompany the kings person in the warre.

selves.

On the other side, the Venetians prepared in one common and resolute courage, to receive and sustaine so great a warre, labouring with money, with authoritie, and with the whole countenance & body of their territories, to leaue prouisions worthy of so great a common weale: wherein their diligence was so much the more importunate and resolute, by how much it seemed likely, that if they sustained the first brunt or furie, the league of the Princes so ill composed & worse

confined, would easily decline and dissolve, In which actions (to the glory of that Senate) was well expressed in those that afore had counselled in vaine to gouerne their good fortune modestly, the selfe same vehemencie of minde which had bene vttered by the others that had bene authours of the contrarie: for that preferring publike safetie afore priuate ambition, they sought not the increasing of their authoritie in reproching to others their preiudiciall counsels, nor in obiecing against the remedies which were obtained to the perils hapned by their indiscretion: & yet considering that almost all the regions of Christendome were banded against them, they summoned together all their wits to breake so great a league, repenting euen now that they so lightly reiected the occasion to deuide the Pope from the rest, hoping that he would not haue stirred, if onely they had made restitution of Faenza. In which regard, ioyned to the consideration of their present condition and estate, they renewed with him the first negociation, and withall dispatched messengers to Cesar and the king Catholike, forbearing to make any practise with the French king, in whom, what for hatred and other hindering respectes, they had no hope of disposition to conformitie: but the Pope had no power now to accept that which he had desired afore: so vaine is the second offer of things that haue bene once refused. The king Catholike, though he had no want of will and inclination, yet he was vnable to range the residue: so little power is left to him that is drawne into action by compulsion. And Cesar possessed with a spirite of enuie against the name of Venice, would not onely not agree, but also disdained to vnderstand with what nature of offers they tempted him, refusing to see their Secretarie whom they had sent to him with very large commissions. In so much as beholding on all sides nothing but a face of aduersitie, accompanied with a settled indignation of Princes, they disposed all their deuises and studies to defend themselves by armes, entertaining from all regions great proportions of horsemen and footemen, & armed many vessels to garde the shoares of Romania, and the townes of Pouilla, and to thrust into the lake of Guarda, and riuer of Po, with other places by the which they feared to be molested by the Duke of Ferrara and Marquis of Mantua. But besides the threatens of men, they were astonished with many aduentures either, fatall or accidentall: for, a small barke which they had sent to transport money to Rauenna, was drowned with tenthousand duckets: the Castell of Bresse was stricken with lightning: & the house where lay the charters of their cōmon weale called the Archinio, fell suddenly to the ground with a wonderfull ruine. But that which most filled them with feare and perplexitie, was at the same time, and in the very houre that the great Councell assembled, a fire kindled either by chaunce, or by some secret treason, in their store house called the Arsenale, euen in the roynth where was their saltpeter: which burst out with such furie, that notwithstanding the concourse of men labouring with an vniuersall diligence to quench it, yet, what by the force of the winde and nature of the matter proper to nourish and increase fire, it consumed to ashes twelue bodies of gallies, with a wonderfull quantitie of munitions. This was also added to their difficulties, that hauing entertained Iulio and Ranſe Vrsins, & Troillo Saueſſo with fise hundred men at armes, & three thousand footemen, the Pope, with seuerer commandements as being subiectes of the Church, compelled them not to depart out of the towne of Rome: inducing them withall, to retaine still fiseene thousand duckets, which they had receiued in prest for their payes, promising to abate so much of the debts which the Venetians ought to the sea Apostolike, for the fruits which they had receiued of the townes of Romania. The chief care of the Venetians was to prepare & make themselves strong on that side by the which the French king was to make his enterprife, but they heard not of him neither so soone as they looked for, nor so mightily as the opiniō went: for that from the king of Aragon, notwithstanding he had made great promises to the other confederates, appeared onely brutes and demonstrations, according to his custome, executing nothing that was of any consequence. And Cesar being gone into Flanders to induce the subiectes of his sonne in law to make some contribution of money, it was beleueed that he could not begin the warre so soone as he had promised: besides, it was supposed that the Pope hoping more in the victorie of others, then in his owne strength, would be gouerned according to the proceedings of the confederates. It was not doubted that the French king would make his first action vpon Gusaradadda, passing the riuer of Adda neare Cascina, and therefore the Venetian armie assembled at Pontuico vpon the riuer of Ogla, the Count Petillano being their Generall, and Barthelemew Aluiano gouernour, & Commissioners in the name of the Senate, George Cornato and Andrea Gritti, gentlemen much renowned & honorable, as well for their ordinarie qualities, as for the glories they had won the yeare before, the one returning victorious from Friul, and the other for expulſing the Almaines from Rouera. Theſe two debating in what ſort the warre ſhould be managed, had not onely opinions diuerſe, but alſo euen betweene the generall and gouernour were contentions and ſeparation of counſell: for, Aluiano being of a minde ſtirring, and made proud by his fortunes of the yeare before, apt to embrace occaſions, and of a wonderfull celebritie both to conſult & execute, perſwaded that to plant rather the body of the war in the countrey of the enemy, then to expect till it were transferred to their territories, it were good to make an inuaſion vpon the Duchie of Millean before the French paſſed into Italie. But the Count Petillan, either for that the reſolution of his minde was abated by age (as Aluiano ſayd) or by his long experience conſidering with a deeper diſcretion the daungers that might happen, and not willing to tempt fortune without a manifeſt hope of victorie, gaue this counſell: that deſpiſing the loſſe of the townes of Guiradadda, which imported not much for the effect of the warre, the armie might encampe neare the towne of Orci, according to the examples of Frauncis Carnignole and Iames Piccinn, Captaines of great vertue and name in the warres betweene the Venetians and the Milleanois: he alleaged that the place was ſtrong, hauing his ſituation betweene the riuers of Oglia and Seria, and of ſingular oportunitie to ſuccour all the townes of the iuriſdiction of Venice, for that if the French men charged them in ſuch a nature and ſtrength of place, they neede not doubt an aſſured victorie, the oportunitie of the place miniſtring much to the action: but if they encamped at Cremona, or at Crema, or at Bergama, or at Breſſe, they might (for the defence of them) draw neare with the armie into a place of ſuretie, and with their troupes of light horſemen and eſtradiots, cut off their victuals and other commodities: a thing which as it would let them for taking any place of importance, ſo by this meane, without committing themſelues to the ſentence of fortune, the ſtate of Venice might be eaſily defended againſt ſo mighty a preparation of the French king. Of theſe counſels, neither the one nor the other was approued of the Senate: to the opiniõ of Aluiano was referred too much raſhneſſe & boldeneſſe: dangerous humors to direct a great enterpriſe, & in the Generall was noted too much fearefulneſſe, not conſidering the nature of the daungers preſent. The Senate could haue bin contented, according to the ancient cuſtome of that common weale, that they had proceeded ſurely, & aduentured as litle as they could: but they conſidered on the other ſide, that if at the ſame time when almoſt all their forces were occupied to make head againſt the French king, Ceſar ſhould make any mightie inuaſion vpon their eſtate, with what armies, with what Captaines, or with what bandes of ſouldiers could they oppoſe againſt him. In which regard that way which of it ſelfe ſeemed moſt ſure and moſt certaine, remained moſt vncertaine and moſt daungorous, their coniectures being confounded in the nature and condition of the enterpriſe: and therefore, as it hapneth in opinions contrarie, they made election of the meane, determining to draw the armie neare the riuer of Adda, not to leaue Guiradadda in pray to the enemies, and yet not to come to hand ſtrokes with them without a great hope or vrgent neceſſitie, and that by expreſſe direction from the Senate.

But farre otherwiſe was the reſolution of the French king, who deſired to finde out the enemy, and giue him battell. And comming accompanied with the Duke of Lorraine and all the nobilitie of Fraunce, ſent his Herald Montſoy (aſſoone as he was paſſed the Mountes) to denounce warre to the Senate of Venice, charging him to make publication to the Magiſtrates of Venice, as he paſſed by Cremona, to the end the Senate might the rather take ſignification. And albeit, his whole armie being not yet aſſembled, he had determined no action to be done, till he were arriued in perſon at Cafcina: yet, either to ſatiſſie the Pope, complaining that the time ſet downe in the capitulation was paſſed, or elſe to haſten the time againſt Ceſar, being bound to enter into the warre, ſortie dayes after the French had begun, he chaunged his firſt reſolution, and commaunded Monsieur Chaumont to broach the warre: obſeruing the oportunitie of the time, for that the regiments of the Venetians, expecting their full aſſemblies, were not yet departed from Pontuico.

The firſt actuall beginning to ſo great a war was made the xv. day of Aprill 1509, when Monsieur de Chaumont paſſed the foorde of Adda neare Cafcina, conueying by boates ſixe thouſand footemen, and the artilleries: from thence he marched to the towne of Treny, which is within three myles of Cafcina wherein were Iulian Morofin gouernour of the Venetian eſtradiots, and Vittello de ciſta de Caſtello, with Vincent de Naldo, who diſpoſed the footemen, which were to be diſtributed amongſt the townes thereabouts. They beleued that thoſe French bands which lay diſperſed in many places in the countrey, were not men appointed to assaile the towne, but to make incursions into the countrey, and therefore to make some experience of warre with them, they sent out an hundred of their footemen, who with certaine estradiots entertained the skirmish, and followed the chase euen to the fortresse of the gate: and being followed with their mainebattel & the arillerie, they began to play with such Culuerins and Falcons as they had, so visiting the towers and places of the wall, that what by the terrour of the shot, ioyned to the suddenesse and importunitie of the action, and vniuersall murinies of the multitudes in the towne, made a frayde by the examples of their chieftaines & leaders, they yeilded wholly to the discretion of Monsieur de Chaumont, to whom in this first fortune were made prisoners Iustinian, Vitelli, and Vincent, and many others, with a hundred light horsemen, & a thousand footemen, all of the vale de Mone: onely two hundred estradiots were saued by flying. After this good beginning M. de Chaumont, conquering also certaine places adioyning, repassed with all his people ouer the riuer of Adda, carying with him by the felicitie of this first action, great hope of an absolute victorie to the residue of the warre. The same day the Marquis of Mantua, to whom the king had committed an hundred Launces, ran vp to Casalmajor, which without resistance was rendred to him by the inhabitants, together with Louis Bonne, Magistrate for the Venetians. The same day in like sort Roccabertin with an hundred and fiftie Launces, and three thousand footemen, passing ouer a bridge made of boates vpon Adda as it entreth into Paw, made roades vpon the townes of Cremona, as did also in another part of the countrey the souldiers of the garrison of Lodi, building a bridge vpon Adda: besides, all the paisants of the Mountaine of Brianza, made incursions euen to Bergama, ioyning to so common a fauour of fortune, an vniuersall readinesse and resolution of minde. But this generall inuasion performed in one day, and in fise feuerall places, the enemies presenting no resistance, bare more brute the matter of effect, both for that Monsieur de Chaumont retired immediatly to Mil-lan, to abide the kings comming, and also the Marquis of Mantua, who after the enterprise of Casalmajor, had executed a vaine attempt vpon Afala, abandoned Casalmajor, hearing that Alsinio was passed on this side the riuer of Oglia at Pontmolaro.

The Pope seeing such a beginning giuen to the warre, published in forme of admonition a horrible Bull, wherein were declared all the vsurpations, made by the Venetians vpon the townes appertaining to the sea Apostolike, and the authoritie which they had attributed to them selues, to the preiudice of the Ecclesiastike liberty and iurisdiction of Popes, both in disposing Bishoprikes, & other benefices vacant, in deducing in secular course causes spirituall appertaining to the iudgement of the Church, and also all other natures of disobediences past. Amongst those declarations was not forgotten, that not long since, to the great trouble of the estate of Bologna, and preiudice of the Church, they had called to Faenza the Bentiuoleis, who being rebels to the Church, were subiect aswell in them selues, as in those that receiued them, to great censures: he admonished them to make restitution within xxiiij. dayes next of all those townes of the Church which they occupied, together with the account of the fruites they haue receiued since the time of their possession, and that vnder paine (in case of disobedience) to incurre the paines of cursings & interdictions, not onely to the Citie of Venice, and all the towes of their obedience, but also to all such, as being not subiect to their iurisdiction, were yet receiuers or rescuers of the Venetians, declaring them attainted of crimen lese maiestatis, and defied as perpetuall enemies to all Christians, to whom he gaue full power to take their goods where they were found, & to make their persons slaues. Against this Bull not many dayes after, was brought into the towne of Rome, a writing by me vnknowne in the name of the Prince & Magistrats of Venice, wherein, after a long & bitter narration against the Pope and the French king, was expressed an appeale from the admonition to the next Councell, and for want of humane iustice, to the tribunall of Iesus Christ the most righteous and soueraigne iudge. To these spirituall thunderboltes, were ioyned temporall threates, for that the French Herald arriuing at the same time at Venice, and brought afore the presence of the Duke and Senate, denounced in the name of the French king, the warre already begun, charging them to haue giuen many occasions more apparant then true or iust. The Duke, after some consulting with the Senate, answered the Herald in few wordes, that since the king his maister was determined to make warre vpon them, in a time whē they hoped most for the obseruation of the alliance which they had neuer violated, & for not breaking of it, had made Cesar their enemy, they would stand vpon their defence, which they hoped to be able to do with their forces, accompanied with the iustice of their cause. This answer seemed to resemble more the dignitie of their Common weale, then if they had vsed justifications and complaints to one that had already assayed them with armes.

armie.

The Venetian army was at last assembled and mustered at Pontuico, wherein were two thousand men at armes, three thousand light horsemen & estradiors, fifteene thousand footmen chosen, & the very flower of souldiers in all the regions of Italie, no lesse for their generally valour, then for the experience of the leaders, & fifteene thousand other footmen of choise, of the appointmēt of their countreys, accompanied with great quantities of artillerie: from thence the armie marched to Fonteuella, a towne within fixe myles of Lodi, & a retraite very commodious to succour Tremona, Crema, Carauaga, and Bergama, where iudging they should haue occasion, for the retraite of M. Chaumont beyond Adda, to reconer Treny, the kings armie withall being not yet assembled, they tooke the fields, following the deliberation of the Senate, but against the counsell of Almano, who sayd they were counsels almost repugnant, to forbid to fight with the enimie, & yet to draw so neare thē, seeing haply it might either not be in their power to retire, or if they did, it would be with a diminutiō of reputation hurtfull to the substance of the whole warre. In which regard, & for his particular honour, and vniuersall respect of all the men of warre of Italie, he had rather chuse to commit his life to hazard & fortune, then giue his cōsent to so great an infamie. The first towne the armie tooke was Riuolce, where the French had left no garrison, and hauing put into it fiftie horse and three hundred footmen, they drew neare to Treny, a towne very neare the riuer of Adda, hauing his situation somewhat high and bearing, and wherein Monsieur Chaumont had left fiftie Launces and a thousand footmen, vnder Captaine Imbault, Frontalle Gascon, and the white Knight. The artilleries were planted on that side to Cascina, where the wall was weakest, & making great executiō, such as were within yeelded the day following, the souldiers saued, but without armes, the Captaines remaining prisoners, & the towne wholly at the discretion of the victors: The houses and riches of the towne were put to present sacke, but with greater damage to the victors, thē to those that were vanquished, for that the French king vnderstanding the cāpe of the enimie to be before Treny, supposing that that place being lost almost in his sight, would bring great diminution to his reputation, he aduanced his armie, & with a speede according to the necessitie of the perill, marched frō Millan to rescue it: and arriuing the day after the execution of Treny, at the riuer neare Cascina, where were made before for the oportunitie of Cascina without impedimēt, three bridges of barks, he passed with his whole armie, his enemies making no countenance to resist him: a matter which made many men of experience to maruell, that they idly lost so faire occasion to set vpō the former part of his army, which was passed: & Treny, enforcing the glory of that aduantage, seeing the whole armie passe without resistāce, cried to the French king, The victorie was won: Of such force are occasions being giuen by negligence of the one partie, & followed with resolution and valour of the other: neuerthelesse it is certaine, that the Venetian Captaines both discerned the benefite of the occasion, and would haue vsed it, sauing it was not in their power, neither by authoritie nor by petition, nor with threats, to driue out of Treny the souldiers occupied in pillage and pray. And albeit in a disorder so generall, and a necessitie so desperate, Almano had no other meane for their common safetie, then to compell the multitude of souldiers to issue, by setting the towne on fire: yet it was a remedie too slow and late, for that the French vsing the fauour of their fortune, were already passed, scorning with great ioy the cowardise and wretched counsell of the enimie. The king encamped within litle more then a myle of the Venetians, who lay in a place somewhat raised, & bearing such strength as well by the oportunitie of his seate, as by the rampiers and trenches they had cast by their industrie, that there was no possibilitie to set vpon them without manifest perill, the time, the place, and almost the dispositions of men, with all other circumstances appertaining to such an action, being against them. As they drew to counsell in what forme and maner they should proceede, many were of opinion (standing also vpon the expectation of the descēding of Cesar) that they should temporise and deferre, for that the condition of him that expectes to be assayed, being better then he that seekes to set on another, necessitie would compell the Venetian Captaines to seeke to offer the battaile, seeing they had no reasonable meane to defend their iurisdiction, oppressed in so many places: A perswasion contrarie to the opinion of the king, who sought chiefly to fight in a place, whose situation was not about the valour of the champions, being moued thereunto either for feare that Cesar would aduance too slowly, or else for that being really in the campe in person with the choise forces of his kingdome, he stood not onely in an absolute hope of the victorie, but also iudged it much to his dishonour, if he put not an end to the war of himself without the ministracion of others: as of the cōtrarie he esteemed it greatly to the glory and reputation of his name, if by his power and vertue, and in his owne person, the residue of the confederates might come to communicate no lesse then himselfe in the rewards and fruits of the victorie: an ambition of glorie much familiar with great Princes, and oftentimes most hurtfull to great enterprises, specially when one particular power aspireth to execute an action which in reason, counsell, and confederacie respecteth a ioynt assistance. On the other side, the Commissioners and Captaines of Venice, not forestalling their counsels for any feare they had of Cesar, were determined not to put theselues into places equall or cōparatiue with the enemy, but shifting alwayes into places of aduantage & strength, they sought at one time to eschue the necessitie of the battell, and withall to let that the French should do nothing of importance, seeking to obey time, necessitie, and all other things to be respected in an action of that nature.

With these deliberations and counsels, neither the one nor the other armie made any mouing, but stood encamped a whole day the one in the face of the other. And albeit in so neare aspect of two mightie enemies equall in ambition, and in glorie nothing inferiour, it is hard to containe men of seruice, yet there was nothing executed betweene them, but certaine light skirmishes by horsemen, wherein though the French by aduancing their artillerie, sought occasion to fight, yet the battell was not embraced, mens counsels varying, and the respects of things not resolued. The day after, the king remoued towards Riuolta, to try whether a desire to keepe that place would cause the Italians to moue: who, not stirring, to obtaine at the least a secret confession that they had no stomackes to accept the battell, the king stood foure long houres afore their lodgings with his whole armie aranged in battell, the Venetians doing no other thing then moue and shew themselves in the front of the Frenchmen in good order, without abandoning their trench. At this time the artillerie being drawne by part of the kings souldiers to the wals of Riuolta, the place was forced and taken in few houres, where the king lodged that night with all his armie, being not a litle troubled with the maner of proceeding of the enemies, whose counsels he prayled so much the more, by how much they were framed against his intentions; and discontented him. But to draw them by necessitie to that whereunto they bare a will estranged, after he had remained a whole day at Riuolta, and set fire in the place afore he departed, he remoued his campe to lodge at Vailo, or at Pandin the night following: he hoped that by the oportunitie of either of these places, he might easily giue impedimēt to the victuals comming from Cremona and Crema, & by that meane to put them in necessitie to leaue abādoned their lodgings wherein they had remained to that houre. The Venetian Captaines saw what were the thoughts and intentionis of the king; and did not doubt that it would not be necessarie to take a place strong & neare the enemy, to continue to hold them in the same difficulties and impedimēts: But the Count Petillano counselled to deferre the inouing of the campe till the day following, notwithstanding Aluiano made so great an instance to the contrary, alleaging how necessarie it were to preuent them, that in the end it was agreed to breake vp suddely (rashnesse preuayling more then maturitie of counsell.) There were two wayes to leade to the sayd places, the one lower neare the riuer of Adda, but a longer way and full of turnings: the other more remoued from the riuer, but more short, and more straight, the one making the string, and the other the bow, as the saying runnes. The lower way was taken by the kings armie, which contained more then two thousand Launces, sixe thousand Swisser footemen, and twelue thousand of Gascoins and Italians, well furnished with artillerie, & a sufficient prouision of Pioners. The Venetian armie marched by the higher way vpon the right hand towards the enemy: in it were two thousand men at armes, more then twentie thousand footemen, with a great quantitie of light horsemen, partly Italians, & partly leauied in Greece by the Venetians, who ranne before, but forbore to enlarge and spread according to their custome, the bushes & branches whereof the country was full betweene both the one and other armie, being their impediments, as also they so shadowed both the campes, that they could not see one another. But marching in this order, and the Venetians alwayes aduancing, there drew neare together in one time the French vauward containing five hundred Launces, and the Swisser footemen, led by Charles d'Amboise and Iohn Iacques Triunlce, & the rearegard of the Venetians gouerned by Bartlemew Aluiano, wherein were eight hundred men armes, with all the flower of the footemen of the armie, but they kept no good order in their march, Aluiano not thinking that the battell would be offered that day: but when he saw himselfe in the face of his enemies, what by the renouation of his auncient valour, and that he was brought into such extremitie of place, that he was compelled to fight, he gaue present aduertisement to the Count Petillano leading the other part of the armie before, his necessitie, or else his resolution demanding his succours. The Count returned answer that he should continue his marching, and eschue the fight, the reasons of warre so requiring, and the resolution of the Senate agreeing. But in the meane while, Aluiano hauing bestowed his footemen with sixe peeces of artillerie vpon a litle trench made to stop the furie of a land flood, which at that time being almost dry of water passed betweene both the armies: charged the enemies with such courage and furie, that he compelled them to giue ground, wherein this ministred not a litle helpe to him, that the first charge was amongst certaine vines, where, by reason of the hedges and intricate branches of the vines, the French horsemen could execute litle: neuerthelesse the battell of the French army, wherein was the kings person, being aduanced for that daunger, the two first squadrons ioyned to charge the bandes of Aluiano, who entring into a great hope of the victorie for so happy a beginning, was not idle to labour to encourage the souldiers with vehement wordes. The battell was furious on all sides, the French receiuing courage & comfort by the succours of their companions, and for that the battell was drawne into a place open and discouered, where their horsemen had space & scope to manage at pleasure: besides, the presence of the king did much to stirre them, who bearing no more respect to his person, then if he had bene a priuate souldiour, refused not to stand in the daunger of the artillerie, not ceassing where he saw neede, to commaund, to encourage, and to threaten. On the other side the Italian footemen, who were full of resolution for their first felicitie, fought with great constancie of courage and valour, Aluiano forgetting nothing that belonged to the office of an excellent Captaine. At last, three houres being consumed in this execution, the Venetian bands receiuing by the plainnesse of the place great distresse by the French horsemen, & not able withall to keepe firme footing for the rayne that fell during the battell, which made the ground slippery, but specially for that they were not succoured by the residue of the army, began to fight with a great disaduauntage, & yet made resistance with great vertue, in so much as when they saw no hope to ouercome, it was well expressed in the effectes of their valour, that more to winne glory then to saue them selues, they laboured to make the victorie bloody to the French, despising perils with the same mindes wherewith they fought for glory & monument. And albeit they kept the battell a longtime in suspension and doubt, yet at last, being more depriued of strength then of courage, without turning their backs to the enemy, they passed almost all vnder the sentence of the sword, leauing to the residue of the armie an example of right worthy imitation, and to posteritie a perpetuall prayse of their merite and vertue. Amongst the rest that were slaine, many lamentations were made for one of the Marquisses of the Mount S. Maria de Tuskana, a Captaine of great exercise in leading footemen in the warres of Pisa, when he liued in the pay of the Florentines, and now one of the Colonels of the Venetian footemen. The honorable resistance which this onely one part of the armie made, bred almost a generall opinion, that if the whole Venetian campe had entred the battell, they had either caried the victorie, or at least past it to the enemy with greater perill and bloud-shedding. But the Count Petillano, with whom was the greatest part of the armie, abstained from armes, either for that (thus he alleaged) as he prepared to aduaunce the battell, he was ill aduertised by an esquadron that fled away, or rather (such was the bruce) standing in no hope or possibilitie of the victorie, and nolesse disdained that Aluiano contrarie to his direction had aduentured to fight, he esteemed it a counsell better assured, to keepe that part of the army reserved, then to referre the whole to hazard for the rashnesse of another, the extremitie of the perill making him more carefull then honourable. In this battell perished very few men at armes, the whole slaughter falling vpon the Venetian footemen, whereof died by good testimonie eight thousand bodies, notwithstanding some report that the number of the dead men on both parts, could not passe sixe thousand men: such variation followeth brutes and rumours, being for the most part full of incertainties and errours. But Bartlemew Aluiano remained prisoner, who receiuing a hurt in his eye, was by that misfortune halfe blinded with the bloud of his wound, and that array (pitifull in a Captaine of his merite) was led to the kings pauillion. The residue of the armie being not followed in chace, found safetie in flying, loosing in all twentie peeces of great artillerie. This was the notable battell of Guaradadda, or according to the opinion of some, the victorie of Vaila, which which was fought the xiiij. day of May, & in moment of which the king caused to be edified in the very place where the battell was executed, a Chappell, which he honoured with the name of S. Maria della vittoria.

The king, with the felicitie of this victorie, not willing to corrupt by negligence the occasion that had bene won with valour and fortune: marched the day following to Caranage, where the towne being suddenly rendred by composition, he battered the Castell with artillerie, which also within foure and twentie houres yeelded to discretion. The Citie of Bergama gaue vp the day after, without abiding the coming of the armie, where after the king had left fiftie Launces and a thousand footemen to batter the Castell, he aduanced to Bressia, but before he arriued there, the Castell of Bergama, after the cannon had executed a whole day, was rendred vpon condition, that Marin Georgio with other Venetian Magistrates, should be prisoners, for that the king not so much for hatred, as for hope to draw money, had determined not to accept any composition of townes, by the which the Gentlemen of Venice should be saued, seeking to make the benefite of his warres to beare out the greatest burden and expenses of his armie. In all ages, time hath carried a power to varie and alter the humours of men, governing their inclinations according to occasions that happen: the same being approued in the inhabitants of Bressia, in whom now remained no more that auncient disposition with the which their elders in the warres with P. M. Visconti, had sustained a grievous and great siege to preferue themselves vnder the iurisdiction of Venice: and being now disposed to take the yoke of the French, partly for feare of their armes, and partly at the perswasion of the Count Ioh. Fea. de Cambara chiefe of the Gebelin faction: they sealed vpon the gates of the towne the day after the battell, opposing manifestly against George Cornato, who being gone thither in great diligence, fought to strengthen the place with men. And besides, the Venetian armie which was very much diminished in numbers, not onely by the slaughter of the battell, but also for that many were gone away, as often hapneth when an armie falleth into aduersities: they respected nothing, neither the authoritie nor the petition of Andre Grutti, who was entered into Bressia to perswade them to take it for their defence: therefore the armie supposing no suretie in that place, marched towardes Pesquero, the Citie of Bressia yeelding to the French king, and the Castell within two dayes after doing the like, vnder this condition, that such as were within should depart in safetie, except the Gentlemen of Venice.

Nothing is more grievous then the report of an ill accident, and nothing more intollerable then when the expectation of things is chaunged by sinister successe: for that by how much the hope was likely and possible, by so much more desperate is the euent falling in a course contrary to that was expected. The newes of so great a calamitie was no sooner vnderstood in the towne of Venice, then it was incredible to behold the vniuersall alteration that appeared: some afflicted with sorrow, but the most part perplexed with feare, the minds of those being most confused and amazed, who much lesse that they had bene accustomed to feele such aduersities, but of the contrarie, had bene wont alwayes in other warres to carrie felicitie and victorie: and as men not accustomed to aduersities haue litle rule ouer their passions, so such as neuer felt but prosperitie, can least iudge of the worthinesse of patience: for in this affliction they cried out against heauen and earth, and accused iustly the instabilitie of mortall estate: their feare made them set before their eyes the losse of their whole dominion, with the latter ruine of their countrey and common weale, wherein their sorrow increased with the consideration of the time, seeming to depriue them of glory, power, and reputation, euen when they promised to themselves no lesse then the imperie of all Italie. And in those dolours and miserable demonstrations of minde, they ran crying and complaining to the publike pallace, where the Elders and Senatours taking counsell what to do in aduersitie so much importing, after they had long debated with great diuersitie of opiniõ, the Councell brake vp ouercome with dispaire: so weake and incertaine were the remedies, and so slender the hopes of their safetie and welldoing. Where the ill is common, the discomfort is generall, nothing remaining to retain the mindes of men but impressions of dispaire and calamitie: they considered they had no other Captaines nor men to imploy in their defence, then such as remained of the ouerthrow, and in them was equall the want of force, & diminution of courage. And for their popular multitudes, subiectes of their generall dominion, they saw them either inclined to rebell, or at least so estranged from suffering, that there remained no disposition to put themselves in further perill for their safetie. They beheld in the French king, (no lesse mightie for the greatnesse and glorie of his army, then insolent for his late hapinesse and victorie) a resolution to come on and follow the course of his fortune. They saw that the chaunce of the battell had made him maister ouer the harts and courages of men, and giuen him commaundment ouer countreys and common weales. And if against him alone they were not able to make resistance, what would be their condition when Cesar should arriue, whom they vnderstood to be at hand, and to march with speede, being drawne on by so great an occasion. They saw from all parts great concurrence of daungers, with occasions of dispaire, and very small apparance of hope or comfort: They feared least in their proper countrey full of multitudes of men of warre, would rise some daungerous tumult, partly for a generall hatred against Gentlemen, and partly for desire of pillage. Lastly, in these contemplations of sorrow and calamitie, they made their mindes the very images of dispaire, esteeming all already hapned, all the aduersities that their timorous coniectures could imagine. Neuerthelesse taking courage and comfort in so great a feare, such as their present fortune would suffer, they determined, with the best diligence they could, to be reconciled in what sort soeuer with the Pope, with Cesar, & with the king Catholike, not looking any way to appease the minde of the French king, for that their dispaire was no lesse for the hate which he bare them, then they feared the power and might of his armes. And yet omitting nothing which they supposed might minister to their defence, they studied to leaue treasures & money, and gaue order to refurnish and raise new bands. And for feare of the armie at sea which was sayd to be rigged at Genes, they deuised to increase their nauie to fiftie galleys commaunded by Ange Treuisan. But all their counsels were preuented by the celeritie of the French king, to whom since the conquest Bressia, was rendred the Citie of Cremona, the Castell holding good for the Venetians, which, notwithstanding it was strong had followed the example of the others, together with that of Pesqueto yeelding also in the same time, if the king had consented that euery one should depart with safetie: but, for that there were within it many Gentlemen of Venice, as Zacharie Contarin, a man of great wealth and possessions, he would not receiue them but with condition to haue power ouer the Gentlemen: in which mind he sent an armie to keepe them besieged. And for that the Venetian armies encamping in the field of Mars neare Verona, & decreasing continually, for that they of Verona would not receiue them into their towne, the king went before Pesquero to get the Castell, the towne being already rendred: the batterie had not played any long time, but the footemen Swissers and Gascons entred with great furie through small breaches and ruines of the wall, & making slaughter of almost foure hundred footemen whom they found at defence, they tooke prisoner the Captaine of the Castell, being likewise Captaine of the towne, a Gentleman of Venice, who by the kings commaundement was hanged vpon the battlements of the same Castell: a crueltie which the king vsed for example sake, that such as defended the Castell of Cremona, induced by this punishment, might not continue in obstinacie to the extremitie. There is nothing more swift then victorie, specially where occasions are followed, and the oportunities of times and other circumstances embraced: for the French king within fiftene dayes after the battell, had reconquered (except the Castell of Cremona) all that appertained to him by the diuision which was made at Cambray: a conquest no lesse honourable for the king, then of great commoditie for the Duchie of Millan, and augmenting the reuenues of the king to more then two hundred thousand duckets by yeare. About this time, albeit the armies of the king of Romains had appeared yet in no place neither in action nor shew, yet the Pope, ioyning himselfe to the fauour of the time, assayled the townes of Romania with foure hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen, & eight thousand footmen, with the artillerie of the Duke of Ferrara, whom he had chosen Gonfalonier of the Church, which is a title according to the practise of our times, that holdes more of dignitie then of authoritie: he recommended the charge of this armie ioyntly to Francisco de Castello de Rie Cardinall of Pania bearing the name of the Legate Apostolike, and to Frauncis Maria de la Roaura, sonne to Iohn his late brother, who, being adopted for sonne by Guid. Duke of Vrbis his vncler by the mother side, the adoption also confirmed in the consistorie by the Popes authoritie, had succeeded the yeare before in the Duchie, the Duke of Vrbis being dead without other children. They ranne with this armie from Cesena towards Sernia, and comming betweene Imola and Faenza, they tooke the towne of Solarola: and after they had bin certaine dayes at Bastida three myles from Faenza, they drew to Bresiquella, which is the capitall towne of Val de Lamona, wherein was newly entred Iohn Paulo Mansfron with eight hundred footemen, and certaine horsemen: who issuing out to fight, were trayned ned into an ambush, and so hotly charged by John Paule Baillon and Lodowike de la Mirandola Captaines of the Church armie, that as they would haue sought their safetie in the towne, the enemy entred Pelmell with them, and that with such furie, that Mansson being felled from his horse, had scarce leisure to retire to the Castell: afore the which the artillerie being brought & planted, the munitions that were within were set on fire at the first blow: an accident that so terrified the defendants within, that they rendred absolutely the place to the discretion of the victor. After the whole valley was taken, the armie descended into the plaine, and tooke Garanarola with all the other townes of the countrey of Faenza, and so went and encamped before Rossi, which is a borough situate betweene Faenza and Rauenna, but not easie to be taken, for that besides it was enuironed with very large and deepe trenches, it was defended with sixe hundred footemen for-reiners. But that which made more vneasie the action of that towne, was, that there was not in the Church armie, neither that counsell, nor that concorde that was necessarie, notwithstanding it abounded in strength and forces, three thousand Swissers payed by the Pope being there newly arriued: for which cause, albeit the Venetians were not strong in Romania, yet things had no great aduancement on that side: onely John Greeke Captaine of the eltradiots issuing out of Rauenna with his bands, was broken and taken prisoner by John Vitelli, one of the Captaines of the Church. Lastly, after they had remained ten dayes afore Rossi, they tooke it by cōposition. And the victorie of the king hapning in the same time, the Citie of Faenza, who stood now in her owne power, for that the Venetian strength was now diminished, agreed to acknowledge the Pope for their Lord, if they were not rescued within fiftene dayes: by the benefite of which conuention there issued out of Faenza vnder the faith of the Legate, sixe hundred footemen of the Venetians, who were stripped by commaundement of the Duke of Ferrara: The Citie of Rauenna did the like as soone as the armie approached. Thus, more by the reputation of the victorie of the French king, then by his proper forces, the Pope conquered in a little time, those townes which he had so long desired in Romania, in the which as the Venetians held no other peece then the Castell of Rauenna, so, euer since the first ouerthrowing of their armie, there disclosed dayly against them new enemies: for, the Duke of Ferrara, who till that day had not declared him selfe, chased out of Ferrara the Visdomino, a Magistrate which the Venetians kept resident there, according to the auncient conuentions, to minister equitie to their subiectes: And taking armes, he recouered without impediment Polesina, and sonke with artilleries the Venetian Nauies floting vpon the riuer of Adice. To the Marquis of Mantua were yeelded the townes of Afola and Lunato, which the Venetians had taken in the warre they had against Philip M. Viscount, vpon John Frauncis de Gonsagua his great grandfather. In Istria, Christopher Frangipan occupied Pisina and Diuinia: and the Duke of Brunswike, who by Cesars commaundement was entred into Friul with two thousand men trayned, tooke Feltro and Bellona. At his comming, together with the brute of the victorie of the French, Triesta with the other townes (the conquest of which had bin the very wellspring and beginning of all the aduersities to the Venetians) returned vnder the obedience of Cesar. In like sort the Counts of Lodron occupied certaine Castels and Boroughs that were neare them, and the Bishop of Trent vsurped Rina and Agresta. But amid all these calamities and declinations of fortune, there was nothing that so much amased the Venetians since the battell, as the taking of the Castell of Pesquero, whose strength and situation, with other oportunities of the place, they supposed would haue stayed the furie of the victor: so weake is the hold of hope where is nothing but daunger on all sides, that the Venetians standing amased amid so many perils, were fearefull that the king would passe further: And their condition being made so desperate, that the feare that possessed them, left them no libertie of counsell, together with their bands which were retired to Mestre, (amongst whom was neither obedience nor order) being reduced to a very small nūber. They determined (& haply too soone) to abandon the iurisdiction of the firme land, to the end to haue no more enemies, and no lesse to take from the French king all occasions to draw neare to Venice: for they were not without suspition, that in that Citie would rise some tumult, either by the people that now were growen insolent, or by the innumerable multitude of straungers that dwelt there: some for desire of pray and pillage which makes men mutinous and disordered, and some for that they would not endure their deprivation of honours, and in all things to beare such a yoke of subiection to the Gentlemen, seeing they were Citizens borne by long succession of times in libertie & freedom, and most of them of the same bloud and families: wherein in so great a dispaire and losse of courage, this reason was alleged in the Senate, that if willingly they abandoned the government, to eschue the perils present, they should easily recover it with the returne and oportunitie of a better fortune: for that the peoples and subiects that willingly should separate themselves from them, would not make so strong resistance to returne intooones vnder the obedience of their auncient Lordes, as they would do if they deuided themselves from them by manifest rebellion: for which reasons the magnanimitie of the Venetians comming now to be defaced, together with the reputation of so glorious a common weale declining, they were content to keepe to themselves the salt waters onely, addressing to the Magistrates and officers gouerning at Padua, Verona, and all other townes bearing interest to Maximilian, directions to returne with speede, and leaue the townes to the deuotion of the peoples. Besides, to the end to obtaine peace of Maximilian vnder what conditions soeuer, they sent to him with diligence their Embassador Iustinian, who being admitted to his presence in publike audience, spake very pitifully and with great humilitie & submission, but in vaine, for that Cesar denied to make any contract without the priultie of the French king. But the better to make knowne how much the common weale of Venice was humbled and abated of courage, not feeling the like aduersities in two hundred yeares before. It can not be impertinent to expresse here the selfe Oration which their Embassadour vttered afore Cesar.

The Oration of
an to Cesar.

In the auncient Philosophers and first men of ciuilitie, it was a disposition no lesse honorable, then a iudgement equall and iust, to assure that that was the true, firme, eternall, & immortall glorie, which men got in conquering their proper affections: An action which they preferred about all kingdomes, triumphes, and vertues, for that in it was represented the very image and similitude of that which they called the diuinitie in men. For this vertue Scipio caried more glory and reputation, then for all the victories he won against Affrike or Carthage: This was the respect for the which ages & posterities do yet nourish the immortalitie of Alexander, when Darius, ouerthrowne by him in a mightie battell, besought God that in case he had determined to dispose his kingdome, he would ordaine him no other successour then his enemy, whose victorie could not make him other then mercifull and gracious. Cesar the Dictator, of whom you beare the name, & communicates no lesse in his fortunes and felicities, then in his liberalities, clemencies, and other vertues, was honoured with diuine titles and glories, for that he fauoured, respected, and pardoned. Lastly the Senate and people of Rome, whose imperie in earth is onely resembled in your person, as the maiestie and greatnesse hath there his perfect image, brought more peoples and prouinces vnder their subiection with clemencie, equitie, and mildnesse, then with the rigour of armes and warre. There is nothing more worthy then clemencie, nor any thing better becomming the maiestie of a Prince, then to be easie to be appeased, and ready to forgiue: for that if it be holden iust and honorable to throw downe an obstinate enemy, it is no lesse worthy and commendable to haue pitie on them that are already fallē into misfortunes. In consideration of these reasons bringing iustification by vertue, I hope it shall not be the least of your prayes, if your Maiestie, in whose hands stands the victorie gotten ouer the Venetians, looking into the frailty of worldly things, will vse it with moderation & temperance, & encline rather to the deuises & studies of peace, then to the doubtfull euents of war. For touching the inconstancie of humaine things, how incertaine aduentures are, and how doubtfull, how mutable, how deceitfull, and how full of daungers is the estate of men mortall, I neede not proue it by examples straunge, forreine, or auncient, since the common weale of Venice standes at this houre the true figure and representation of the infirmitie of humaine condition and kingdomes. It was not long since, neither lesse mightie, lesse flourishing, nor lesse renowned, then that our name and reputation could not only be celebrated & contained within the limites of Europe, but with a great pompe & magnificence, ranne through all Affrike & Asia, & caried brute and terrour euen to the extreame bounds of the earth: And now by the onely losse of a battell, no lesse light & easie, then depriued of the prayse & merite of armes, it is become dispoyled of riches, deuided from strength, defaced in renowne, ruinated of all things, and especially of counsell, & so reuerfed & abated, that there remains nothing of our auncient vertue, but signes and shadowes, all things being turned into desolation, & nothing remaining but a lamentable expectation of perpetuall ruine. But greatly do the French men beguile themselves, if they make a glory of our spoile, or attribute our aduersities to their yertue, since notwithstanding we haue bene heretofore worne and trauelled by so many afflictions, wasted and consumed with so many daungers and ruines, yet we neuer made our courage baser then our fortune: yea euen in those daungerous warres which we managed many yeares against the terrible enimie and tyrant of the Turkes, of men vanquished, we seemed victorious. And as there are no men miserable, but those that esteeme themselves so by the base reputation of their courage, so we had still retained the same shew of valour, resolution, and magnanimitie, sauing that the brute of the terrible name of your Maiestie, together with the liuely and inuincible vertue of your souldiers, hath so abated the mindes of vs all, that there remaines no hope, not to vanquish and ouercome, no not to defend and resist: an aduersitie so lamentable to vs, that depriving our selues of armes and weapons, we haue reposed the hope and remedie of our afflictions in the diuine pietie and clemencie of your Maiestie, which we doubt not to finde euen in the greatest despaire of our affaires. In which respect as well on the behalfe of the Prince and Senat, as of the people and communalitie of Venice, we pray, beseech, and coniuere you, to cast the eyes of your mercy vpon our afflictions; and to cure our grieues with remedies of comfort and consolation: we offer not to debate any articles of peace, but we come accompanied with mindes to embrace all such conditions as you thinke meete to impose, iudging them reasonable, righteous, and iust: we are not worthy to taxe our selues, or appoint our own rates, but vnder our free and voluntarie consents we offer to you as true and lawfull Lord, restitution of all those things which our elders haue taken from the sacred Empire, and Duchie of Austria: Whereunto (the condition of our fortune requirring to induce your Maiestie by all humilities) we adde all those things which we possesse in the firme land, renouncing all rights, all charters, all prerogatiues and interests, by the which we either haue got them, or do hold them: we will acknowledge a yearly payment tributary to your Maiestie and your lawfull successors in the Empire, of fiftie thousand ducets for euer: we will obey you in all your commaundementes, lawes, decrees, and impositions, and holding that to belong to our dutie, deuotion, and fidelitie, which dependes vpon your authoritie, or respectes your securitie, we will repute vs in the condition of subiectes, not conquered by armes and victorie, but voluntarily yeelded vnder your pietie and clemencie. We beseech you let our teares and true demonstrations of sorrow induce you to defend vs from the insolencie of those, who earst were our companions in armes, and now do proue them our bitter enemies, desiring nothing more then the ruine of our name. In preferuing vs by your clemencie, we are to call and honour you by the name of father and founder of our Citie, to make you a perpetuall monument in our Chronicles and registers, and to leaue perpetuall report to our children and posteritie of your high merites and vertues: esteeme it no small increale of your prayses, that you are the first Prince afore whose seete the common weale of Venice falles prostrate, before whose face we bow our knees, vnder whose handes we offer our selues humbled, and whom we honour, reuerence, and respect as a Prince holding iust authority ouer vs. There can be nothing required which we are not ready to performe, and those things which of your modestie you forbear to demaund, our necessitie hath vs to offer into your handes, our humilitie being the true interpreter of the faith and deuotion of our mindes: we hope the extremitie of our perils will not make vs the lesse apt to receiue your fauours, for that he giues a grieuous sentence against the state of mans mortalitie, that denieth compassion to men in miserie. And the law of honour and clemencie holdes vs so farre assured that you will not make vs reiected because we are afflicted, since it is one chiefe office in your Christian pietie, to minister succours to men in necessities. Compassion debates not causes and reasons, but proceedes to the reliefe of such as suffer and expect it, then agreeing with true magnanimitie, when it ministers comfort vpon free and liberall motions. The glory is greater to lend your hand to those that are already fallen, then by drawing your sword against your enemies, to carie the prayse of their victorie and confusion, the one being iust and necessarie, and the other a high action of charitie, which carrieth the doers into the fauour of God: if ambition and worldly inspiration had not so commaunded our auncestours, that they had forborne to aspire to the estates of others, our common weale might haue stood aduanced aboue all the Cities of Europe in glory, in nobilitie, in magnanimitie and riches, where now deformed altogether with infamie and reproch, it is torne and broken in a moment, and nothing remaining of so many honors and victories, but a perpetuall monument, scorn, and derision. And by how much our aduersities are great, and our petitions lamentable, by so much it concernes you in clemencie, as you are able in power, to reestablishe the estate of the Venerians: an action that brings with it such a reputation of name and honour, as in old age, no prescription or antiquitie, no law of time, nor course of yeares, shall be able to wipe it out.

of the mindes and memories of mortall men: but as you shall merite with all peoples and nationis the onely name of pityfull, iust, and pardoning, so for our parts, receiuing our safetie from your clemencie, we shall attribute to your vertue, to your felicitie, and to your goodnesse, that we liue, that we breath, or that we are referred to hold communie with men.

The calamities of the Venetians made them of nothing so carefull, as to render those peeces which so long they had occupied of others, their fortune giuing them at that time no better means either to appease or assure their aduersities: They sent according to the same deliberation into Powilla, to restore the portes to the king of Aragon, who knowing how to enjoy the fruites of other mens trauels without his owne expences or daunger, had dispatched into Spaine, a small Nauie at sea, which had commaunded certaine places appertaining to those Cities and hauens of the sea. They dispatched also into Romana a publike Secretarie, with commission, to giue vp to the Pope all that they held there, vpon condition that Iohn Paule Manfron and other prisoners might be restored, with libertie to draw out their artilleries, and that the people that were within the Castell of Rauenna should depart in safetie. Which conditions whilest the Pope made difficultie to accept, for that he would not displease the confederates, the Castell of Rauenna was rendred, the souldiers giuing it vp of themselves, notwithstanding the Venetian Secretarie that was entred, sought to hinder it, for that such as solicited for them at Rome, gave hope that the Pope in the end would consent to the conditions, vnder the which they had offered restitution. But the Pope complained much that they had shewed a greater contumacie against him then against Cesar or the king of Aragon: and therefore when the Venetian Cardinals in the name of the Senate, demaunded absolution of the Bull, as being due, for that they had offered restitution within the terme of xxiiij. dayes, he made answer, that they had not obeyed, because their offer was not simple but ioyned to conditions limited: and for that they were admonished ouer and besides the restitution of the townes, to yeeld account of the fruites they had received, together with the benefites they possessed appertaining to Churches or to persons Ecclesiasticall.

In this sort was ouerwhelmed with a wonderfull furie, the estate of the common weale of Venice, one calamitic growing vpon another, all their hopes declining, vaine and fallible, and no signe remaining by the which, after the losse of so great a dominion, they might hope for the preservation of their proper libertie. So great a ruine touched diuersly the mindes of the Italians, of whom many receiued contentment, remembering that the Venetians, proceeding in too great ambition, without respect to iustice or obseruation of faith, aspiring to all things that occasion or oportunitie offered, had manifestly quarrelled the whole Monarchie of Italye, aspiring to the vniuersall subiection of all those regions: things which made their names hatefull, and their gouernement intollerable by the consideration of their naturall pride. On the other side, many looking without passion into the present estate of things, & how wretched & lowle it were for all Italye to be brought wholly vnder the seruitude and yoke of strangers, felt no little griefe that such a maiestie of Citie, the auncient seate of libertie, and the very glory of the Italian name through all the world, should fall into such extremitie, that so worthy a member should be cut off, which more then all the residue had bene the protectour of their common glory and renowne. But about all so great a fall and declination began to be grieuous to the Pope, who doubting the powers of Cesar and the French king, desired to alter their thoughts from oppressing him, by intangling them with affaires. In which regard he determined (but secretly) to do all he could, that the aduersities of the common weale of Venice should haue no further course. And in that good disposition of minde, he accepted the letters written to him in the name of the Duke of Venice, by the which he besought him in great submission, to receiue the Em bassadours sent to him of the principals of the Senate, to sue for pardon and absolution. These letters being read, with their petitions published in the consistorie, he consented to receive them, after he had in few wordes protested that it was the auncient custome of the Church, not to shew it selfe hard or rigorous to such as with repentance of their faults, sought for reconciliation and pardon. The Em bassadours of the Emperour and the French strived what they could against it, putting him in memorie that by the confederation of Cambrai, he was expressly bound to persecute them with armes spirituall and temporall, till euery one of the confederates had recovered that which appertained to him. To whom the Pope made answer, that he had consented to admit them, with intention not to giue them absolution, if first Cesar (who onely had not recovered all) had not obtained the things that belonged to him. This gave some beginning to the hope and comfort of the Venetians, but that which assured them most in their latest feares, was the resolution of the French king, to obserue simply and in good fidelitie, the capitulation which he had made with Cesar; and hauing reconquered all that was his, to passe no further with his armie, nor breake his ligities. And therefore albeit it was in his power after he had taken Pesquero, not onely to accept Verona, which had sent Embassadours to yeeld to him, but also to occupie Padoa without any impediment, together with all the other townes abandoned by the Venetians: yet he would in any sort that the Embassadours of Verona should present the keyes of their towne to the Embassadours of Cesar which were in his armie, and for that cause he stayed with all his campe at Pesquero, which he retained for himselfe for the commoditie of the place, notwithstanding it appertained to the Marquis of Mantua, who durst not refuse it to the king, leauing to him the reuenues of the towne, with promise of recompence. At the same time the king had also by accord the castell of Cremona, vnder condition that all the souldiers should depart with goods and life saued, except such as were his subiectes, and that the Gentlemen of Venice should remaine his prisoners, to whom he gaue his faith for their safetye. Vincenza and Padoa followed the example of Verona, as also other townes, except the Citie of Trenisa, which being abandoned by the Magistrates and souldiers of Venice, had runne also that course, if Cesar had sent thither neuer so small a force, or at the least any personage of authoritie. But Leon de Dressino one of the exiles of Vincenza, went thither to receiue it without strength or armes, and without any maiestie of imperie, receiuing Padoa in the like sort: and being entred and admitted, the exiles of the same Citie newly restored by the Venetians (for which benefite they were become faithfull louers of their name) began to draw into tumult, by whose example the people of no lesse affection to the gouernement of Venice, rose and conspired with one called Marke shoemaker, publishing himselfe chiefe, and with great cryes and concourse of the commons, carrying into the principall places the banners of the Venetians, they cryed with one voyce, S. Marke, assuring that they would acknowledge no other Emperour nor Lord. To this action was much helping and concurrant an Embassadour of the king of Hungaria, who in his way to Venice, passing by Trenisa, and being throwne happily into this tumult, perswaded the inhabitants not to rebell. In so much that after they had chased out Dressino, and put into the Citie seven hundred footemen of the Venetians, the armie also entring a little after, which was now increased with bandes of footemen comming from Slauonia, with the remainders of the armie, returned from Romania, hauing an intention to encampe in some strong place betwene Margueta and Mestra: they fortified the towne in great diligence, and made their horsemen scoure the places of the countrey thereabouts, procuring from all parts great reliefe of victuals, as well for the necessitie of that Citie, as for the vse of the towne of Venice, wherein they gathered great quantities from all sides, ioyning an incredible diligence to the sudden fauours which their fortune seemed to recomfort them withall. The principall occasion of this accident, and to confirme in the Venetians a hope to retaine yet some part of their dominion, together with many other great aduentures that followed, was the negligence and disordred gouernement of Cesar, of whom in so great a course of victorie there was heard no other thing then his name, notwithstanding by the meane of the French armes; and for their feare, so many townes had bene rendred to him, which was very easie for him to keepe. Only, after the confederation made at Cambrai, he occupied certaine time in Flaynders, to leaue of the people a loane of money to furnish his warres, which he had no sooner got into his possession, then, according to his custome, he spent it vnprofitably. And albeit at his departing from Mackin with all pompes and ceremonies imperiall, and being come very neare to Walle, he made publication that he would begin the war at the terme appointed to him in the capitulation: yet being oppressed with his accustomed difficulties and confusions, he aduanced no further, notwithstanding the Pope egged him with great importunities, for the feare he had of the French armes: whereia to giue him a more life to the enterprise, and to make him no lesse able to the action, he sent to him by Constantin of Macodina fiftie thousand duckets, consenting withall to the hundred thousand duckets which had bene leaued certaine yeares afore in Germanie, and referred to make warre vpon the infidels. Besides all this, he had receiued of the French king, an hundred thousand duckets for the investiture of the Duchie of Millan, and was aduertised of the fortune of the battell of Vaila, as he drew neate to Iffurth: & notwithstanding he dispatched with great diligence the Duke of Brün- swike to recouer Friul, yet he moued not (as in such a concurrence of occasions had bene conuenient) for want of money (the taxes which he had imposed and drawne from so many places not being able to suffice his prodigalities.) At last he arriued at Trent, from whence, writing letters congratulatory to the king, he gaue many thanks that by his meane he had recouered his townes: and assured him, that the better to expresse the good will he bare to the king, and with all to wipe out all memories of offences past, he had caused to be burned a booke which was kept at Spire, containing an authentike register of the iniuries which the French kings in times past had done to the Empire and nation of Germanie, confessing that since the king had accompanied his promise with such honour and fidelitie, that he could do no lesse in common office, then for his part to dissolue all remembraunces of things that might minister occasions to bee vnthankfull to so great an affection. The Cardinall of Amboyse came to him to Trent the thirteenth day of Iune, to communicate of their common affaires, who being receiued with demonstrations well testifying the amitie he bare to his king, promised him on the kings behalfe, a succour of fiftie Launces. In so much that after they had with great agreement giuen directions for other affaires, it was resolued that Cesar and the king should speake together in plaine field neare the towne of Gard, vpon the Marches of both the one and others countreys. For which cause the French king prepared to be there at the day appointed, and Cesar, in the same regard came to Rina de Trent, bringing in neither of their mindes any suspicion, the one allured by good experience of benefite and fidelitie, and the other assured by the consideration of the same. But such are the variations of Princes, and their ordinarie subiection to suspicions and ieaiousies, that the Emperour, after he had bene there onely two houres, returned immediatly to Trent, signifying to the French king, that by occasion of new accidents hapned at Friul, he was constrained to depart suddenly, desiring him to stay at Cremona, till he returned to giue perfection to the enteruiew determined. This varietie (if notwithstanding it be possible in a Prince so inconstant to finde out the truth) many attributed to his credulitie and lightnesse of beliefe, some men blowing into his eares something that made him enter into suspicion: Others made this the occasion, that hauing so small a Court, accompanied with a trayne ill appointed, he thought he could not present himselfe with that dignitie and reputation, as might hold comparison with the pompe & greatnesse of the French king: who for his part desiring to dissolue his armie to be deliuered of so great a burden, and no lesse to returne with speede into Fraunce, tooke his way to Milan, not tarying for the Emperours signification, notwithstanding the Bishop of Garce, whom the Emperour had sent for that effect, following him euen to Cremona, solicited him much to tarry, making promise that without all exceptions the Emperour would returne. The discamping of the armie and person of the French king from the confines of Cesar, diminished greatly the reputation of his affaires: and yet albeit he was accompanied with such multitudes of men, that he might easily refurbish Padoa and the other townes, yet he forbore to send garrison thither, either for the inconstancie of his nature, or that he thought afore hand to set vpon some other enterprise: or lastly that he interpreted it more to his honour to descend into Italie with a greater armie. And which more is, he pretended (as though the former actions had had their due perfection) that together with the ioynt forces of the whole confederates, they should assaile the Citie of Venice: a matter very plausible to the French king, but grieuous to the Pope, and no lesse impugned with open reasons by the king of Aragon.

The last actiō of the Florentines against the Pisans.

About this time, the Florentines put their last hand to the warres against the Pisans: for after they had cut off all succours and entrie of graynes into Pisa, they leauied new bandes, to the end by aduancing all the industrie they could, to choake all their course of victuals both by sea and land: A matter that was subiect to difficultie for the neighbourhood of the countrey of the Lucquois, who when they could secretly doe it, obserued with a very negligent faith their accord newly made with the Florentines: the necessities of their neighbours preuayling aboue the bond of their promise, oath, or fidelitie. But notwithstanding the secret succours of those good neighbours, the want of victuals more and more encreased within Pisa: an affliction aboue all others least tollerable, and most contrarie to the kinde of man, expressing in that aduersitie a peculiar frailtie. The souldiers of the plaine countrey could not endure it, which made those principals of the Citizens, in whose handes rested all publike resolutions, being followed with the greatest part of the youth of the Citie, the better to lull the countrey souldiers with deuises accustomed, to introduce by the meane of the Lord of Plombin, a practise of accord with with the Florentines: An action wherein were artificially consumed many dayes, and for which the Florentines sent to Plombin, Nicholas Machiavell their Secretarie, the Pisans electing for Embassadours both Citizens and countrey men. It was very hard to enclose Pisa, for that it stood in a fielden large, and full of ditches and marris, neither could the entrie of victuals be hindred by any easie meane, specially by night, both for the faithfull industry of the Lucquois to refurnish them, & the desperate mindes of the Pisans, refusing no perill wherein was any oportunitie of prouision. But to overcome those difficulties, the Florentin Captaines determined to deuide their armie into three partes, bestowing one part at Messana without the gate of Plagei, the second at Saint Peter de bene and Saint Iames ouer against the gate of Lucquay, and the third was appointed to the auncient Temple of Saint Peter d'Ingrado, standing betweene Pisa and the mouth of Arna. In euery campe being well fortified, they bestowed a thousand footemen, with conuenient numbers of horsemen. And to let that none should passe ouer the mountaines by the way of the vale of Ojola, which leadeth to the mount Saint Iulian, they builded towards the great hospitall, a Bastillion capable of two hundred and fiftie footemen. By these impediments the Pisans fell more and more, into want of victuals, who seeking to get by pollicie that which they dispaired to obtaine by force, deuised that Alphonso Mutulo a yong man of Pisa, but of base condition, who being aforesime taken prisoner by the Florētīn souldiers, & receiuing many pleasures of his keeper, should offer to be the instrumēt to make the surprise the gate that goeth to Lucquay. Their deuise bare this meaning, that at the same time that the campe which was at Saint Iames should go by night to execute the enterprise, they would not only oppresse it when one part was entred, but also would charge the other campees of the Florentines, which according to the resolution, were to approach more neare the Citie: but for that they made not their approach rashly nor in disorder, the Pisans won no other thing by this practife, but the liues of certaine particulars, who at the signe giue were come to the first gate, thinking to enter the Citie, amongst whom was slaine with a shot Paule de Parana Capaine of a companie of light horsemen to the Florentines, & Canaio de Pratonechio, to whom Alphonso Mutulo had bin prisoner, & vnder his assurance had managed the practife. This hope being thus disappointed, and very small quantities of corne entring into Pisa, and that to the great daunger of such as carried it, the Florentines withall not suffering that the vnprofitable mouthes should depart out of Pisa vexing them with many aduersities, things necessarie for the life of man were bought at deare rates, yea many perished by famine, for that there could not enter a proportion to suffice the generall numbers: An affliction more lamentable then any other that the course of war draweth with it. And yet those necessities were surmounted by the obstinacie of those Citizens which were magistrates and principals to the gouernement, who disposed to behold rather the extreme ruine of their countrey, then to yeeld to so horrible a necessitie, deferred from day to day to negotiate or consult, entertaining as well as they could the commons, sometimes with one hope, sometimes with another, but specially with this, that since there was expectation of the comming of Cesar into Italie, the Florentines would be constrained to retire from their wals. But one part of the countrey men with such as had bene at Plombin where they saw into their intentions, drew into conspiracie, and constrained them to introduce new consultations with the Florentins, which being followed with Alaman Salusut commaunder of that part of the armie which lay at Saint Peter d'Ingrado, after many disputings (the principals opposing many impediments) were at last resolved and concluded. The accord was made with conditions very fauourable for the Pisans, seeing that not onely all their faults both publike & priuate were pardoned, but also many exemptions accorded, being also absolued from all restitution of moueable goods which they had rauished from the Florentins at the time when they rebelled: So great was the desire of the Florentins to repofesse it, & so great their feare least the Emperour (naming the Pisans in the league of Cambray) or from some other part, there hapned no impediment vnlooked for: And albeit they were well assured that the Pisans would be constrained within few dayes to giue place to hunger, yet they sought rather to assure the Towne with hard conditions, then to obtaine it without conuention, to put any part of the certaintie in the power of fortune, holding it more honorable to winne peace by pardoning offences, then to publish their bloody desires by the extreme execution of warre. This accord being begun to be negotiated in the campe, was afterward translated and concluded at Florence by the Embassadours of the Pisans: An action wherein the faith of the Florentines is worthy of memorie, who notwithstanding their iust hatreds prouoked by so many iniuries,

The king of Romains (no doubt) receiued a great displeasure by the rendring of the Pijans, for that he was perswaded, that either the demaine of that Citie might serue him to many occasions, or else by according it to the Florentines, he should draw from them a great quantitie of money, for want whereof he lesse and lost many faire occasions that were offered to him without his paines and industrie. But whilest he stood so negligent in oportunities offered, that neither at Vincenza nor at Padoa was almost any souldiers for him, and whilest withall his delays abated the affection of the inhabitants of townes, himselfe wandering with a very small companie, sometimes to one place, sometimes to another: the Venetians forgot not to follow the fauour of the time, and taking the aduantage of his negligence, they embraced all oportunities that offered to recouer Padoa, whereunto they were induced by many reasons: for the retaining of Treuisa made them know, how vnprofitable it was to them, with a counsell so rash and prejudiciall, to abandon so soone the dominion of the firme land, the lingring preparations of the Emperour being the cause that they held him in lesse feare dayly. Besides, they were not a little moued, for that seeking to bring to Venice the reuenues of the landes which diuerse particulars of the towne of Venice held in the countrey of Padoa, those of Padoa made manifest resistance: in so much that the disdaines of certaine particulars being ioyned to a publike profite, concurring withall the weake prouidence and furnisments of souldiers at Padoa, together with the consideration of the insolencies which the Gentlemen of Padoa vsed towardes the populars, and many remembring the easie and moderate gouernement of the Venetians, beginning eftsoones to desire their auncient yoke: they determined to make an attempt to recouer it, wherein they were assisted with this ready occasion, that those of the plaine countrey of Padoa stood yet at their deuotion. They deuised that Androm Gritti one of their Commaunders, leauing behind the campe, wherein were foure hundred men at armes, more then two thousand light horsemen, and siue thousand footemen, should go to Novato vpon the frontiers of Padoa, and taking in his way a part of those footbands, which, with many troupes of paisants were sent to the village of Mirana, he should draw towardes Padoa to assault the gate of Codalunga: And the more to terrifie such as were within, they gaue directions at the same time, that two thousand of the popular souldiers, with three hundred footemen and certaine horsemen, should execute vpon the bulwarke of the water standing in the contrary part of the Citie. And lastly, the better to couer this enterprife, Christo. Moro the other Commaunder, was likewise appointed to encampe afore the towne of Citadella. The directions and plots of this enterprife were no lesse well layed and obserued, then the issue happy, for that the footemen arriuing at full dayes, found the gate of Codalunga halfe open, certaine paisants a little before being entred by chaunce with cartes loaden with hay: in so much, as commaunding the gate without any great difficultie, and expecting without any noyse the comming of their other strength which was at hand, their fortune did not onely carry them into the towne, but also almost to the market place, afore the Citie, which containes a long circuite, and is not much peopled, was touched with any aduertisement of the accident, the feare of the Citizens helping no lesse to aduance the enterprife, then the secret industrie or valour of the Venetians. The Knight la Volpe marched first with his light horsemen, together with Zirola de Perouza and Laetance de Bergamo, with one part of the footemen: And the alarme being come to the Citadell, Dressina gouernour of Padoa for Maximilian, prepared himselfe to fall out with three hundred Almaine footemen which he had there onely for his gard: the like did Brunault de Serge with fiftie horsemen, who sustaining the furie of the enemies, expected that the Gentlemen of Padoa, fauourers of the Almaines would take armes with them: But that hope was vaine with all the residue, for that in the Citie fallen into this surpris and sudden oppression of tumult, was found no disposition of resistance, especially many bands of the enemy being entred & gouerning those parts of the towne, wherein lay their chiefest protection: In so much as standing thus abandoned of fortune and hope, they were constrained, with the losse of many of their men, to retire with speede into the Castell and Citadell, and they but weakly manned, were by the necessitie of the present perill, yeilded to discretion within a few houres after, they being no lesse vnable to repulse a violence offered, then they were negligent to foresee it afore it hapned. By this meane, the Venetians being eftsoones made Lords of the whole, laboured to appease the tumult, and saue the Citie, whereof the greatest part, by the insolencies of the others, were ranged to their deuotion, nothing receiuing spoyle or harme, but certaine houses and store places of the Iewes, which were afore declared enemies to the name of the Venetians. This accident hapned the day of S. Marina, a day solemnly celebrated at Venice by publike decree, as a first day of their felicitie, and beginning of the restoring of their common weale. The brute of this victorie did much to moue the whole countrey thereabouts, which had found imitation in Vincenza, if Constantin de Macedonia had not entred with a very small strength. But as there is no worldly thing more mightie then the course of fortune, so by the felicitie of this conquest, the Venetians became with a present diligence, maisters of the whole countrey, the commons of townes and popular multitudes ioyning fauour to the felicitie that followed them. They recovered by this meane the towne & castels of Leguagno, a place of great conueniencie to trouble the countreys of Verona, Padoa, & Vincenza. They made attempt also to take the tower Marquisano within eight miles of Padoa, a passage of singular oportunitie to distresse the countrey of Mantua, but by the rescues which the Cardinall of Este sent, their enterprise was defeated.

It was thought that the taking of Padoa did nothing stay the French king from returning beyond the Mounts, and as he was vpon his discamping, he made in the towne of Biagrasse new conuentions with the Popes Legat, by the which the Pope & the king bound each other to a mutuall protection, with libertie that either of them might contract with any other Prince, so farre forth as it was not preiudiciall to the present confederation: the king promised not to hold in his protection, nor to accept into the same hereafter, any subiect, homager, or dependant, either directly or indiretly of the Church, cancelling expressly all articles of protection vntill that day: a promise not much agreeable to the honour of so great a king, for that a little before he had taken into his protection the Duke of Ferrara, for a consideration of thirty thousand duckets: Besides, it was agreed that the Pope should dispose by his discretion the Bishopricks that then were voyde in all the landes of the kings obedience, but for such as should fall voyde within a certaine time, they should be at the nomination of the king, for whose better satisfaction, the Pope sent the Bulls of Cardinalship to the Bishop of Albie, promising to indue him with the Hat as soone as he came to Rome. Immediately vpon the conclusion of this contract the king halted out of Italie, carrying with him into France no small glorie for so great a victorie gotten, with so swift a course vpon the Venetians: and yet he caried home by this victorie, neither the more tranquillitie of minde, nor greater assurance for his affaires: a matter that often hapneth, that in things obtained, after they haue bene long desired, men finde neither that contentment, nor that pleasure which they imagined before: yea men might discerne matter prepared to greater daungers and innouations, together with a manifest incertaintie of his mind, by the deliberations he had to make by reason of those accidents newly hapned: for, if things had good successe with the king of Romains, his feare was farre greater of him then of the Venetians: & if the greatnesse of the Venetians begā est soones to be readressed, he must be constrained to dwell in continuall suspitions & expences, to keep the things he had taken from them: besides, he must needes contribute to Maximilian both in men and money, for that in abandoning him, he was to feare least he would knit with the Venetians against him, and withall, least the king Catholike would not be of the faction, and haply the Pope: Besides, meane aydes and succours would not suffice to intertaine him in amitie with Cesar, to whom he must minitter so liberally, as by them he might obtaine the victorie against the Venetians: and on the other side, if he sent him strong and able succours, besides that it could not but draw with it intolerable expences and harmes, yet he confirmed his owne daungers touching the greatnesse of Cesar. The king waighing the estate of these difficulties, stood in the beginning in doubt touching the mutation of Padoa, whether he should hold it agreeable or troublesome: but conferring the suretie which the depriuation of the firme land from the Venetians might bring to him, with the perplexities and daungers which he feared to suffer by the greatnesse of Cesar, and with hope to obaine of him by money in regard of his necessities, the Citie of Verona, which he desired much, as a place of singular oportunitie to suppress the mouings on the side of Germanie: he iudged it at last more to his profite and suretie, to haue things remaine in that estate, then, for that there was great apparance of a long warre betweene Cesar and the Venetians, both the one and other being made wearie by so continuall expences, would become more weake. In this nature of opinion he stood better confirmed, when he had contracted with the Pope, with whom he hoped to haue a confederation well assured and resoluēd: and yet he left vpon the limites of Verona, Monsieur de Pallissa with seue hundred Launces to be disposed by Cesar, no lesse for the preferuation of things gotten, then to obtaine that which the Venetians still possessed, and because by the commandement of Cesar, they being conueyed into Vincenza, the Citie of Verona was assured, which was in great daunger and suspicion for the smal numbers of men of warre that were within it: and by that meane the Venetian armie which lay encamped before the Citadell, was retired.

After the kings departure, this good aduenture fell also to the Venetians: Their horsemen which were within Leguagna, made continuall incursions ouer the whole countrey euen to the gates of Verona, doing many violences and harmes of warre, against whom the garrison of Verona could make no great resistance, being but two hundred horsemen, and seuen hundred footemen: by reason whereof the Bishop of Trent, whom Cesar had appointed gouernour ouer it, determined to plant his campe there, & for the better execution, he called to the action the Marquis of Mantua, who expecting the preparations that were in hand, lay incamped with those bandes which the French king had giuen him, in the Isle of Escalo, a great passage vpon the countrey of Verona, neither enuironed with wals, nor made strong with other fortifications. But whilest he lay there without ielousie or doubt of any thing, he serued as a notable example to all Captaines, how much it importes them in all times and all places to be vigilant, and so manage their affaires with care and industrie, that they may haue confidence in their proper forces, without reposing in this vayne imagination, that either their enemies be farre off, or that by an opinion of their weaknesse they may thinke their estate to stand in more securitie: for, as the Marquis had couenanted with certaine estradiots of the Venetian armie to come to him in that place to take his pay and follow his ensigne, who from the beginning of the conference had manifestly communicated the deuise with their Captaines: and as the Captaines, vpon this occasion had ordained to assaile him vnprovided: So Luke Malvezzo with two hundred light horsemen, and Zuolo de Peronsa with eight hundred footemen, which were secretly come from Padoa to Leguagno, being ioyned to the bandes which were within, and fifteen hundred men of the countrey, and sending before certaine horsemen, who cried Turko, Turko, (that was the Marquis name) making as though they were those estradiots that were expected, they conueyed themselues in the peepe of the day without that there was any doubt made, to the Isle of Escalo the same morning that was appointed, where, finding no resistance they entred, and finding all the souldiers without gard, and such as followed the person of the Marquis sleeping in their owne negligence, they put them to the spoyle, and tooke prisoner amongst others, Monsieur de Boyssi Lieutenant to the Marquis, and nephew to the Cardinall Amboyse. The Marquis vnderstanding the alarme, leaped naked out at a window, and hid himself in a tuffe of corn: but he was discouered to the enemies by a paissant of the same place, who respecting more the estate of the Venetians, then his particular profit, made as though he would saue the Marquis for the offers he made, but did the contrarie: for that the Marquis not able to lye hidden in so ill a fortune, was presented afore the Generall, and so led to Venice, and there put prisoner in the little tower of the publike pallace, to the wonderfull reioycing of euery one.

Cesar till this day had giuen no impediment, nor medled to hinder the proceedings of the Venetians, for that he had not yet leauied a force sufficient to put himselfe in the field: he was hardly bestead many dayes in the mountaine of Vincense, where the countrey men bearing deuotion to the Venetian name, and reposing much in the difficulties of the place, were drawne into manifest rebellion against him: and after Padoa was reobtained by the Venetians, he descended into the plaines, where being encountred with multitudes of the mountaine men and paissants in a passage of good situation and strength, his case was in no little perill: but after his valour and pollicie had remoued the daungers that were opposed, & by their proper disorder had put the mountaine men to the chase, he came to Escalo vpon the frontier Vincenza, where the Venetian armie had recovered a great part of the countrey of Vincense, & taken Seruallo, a passage of importance, where they executed many cruelties vpon the Almaines, which was recompensed with like example of slaughter by Maximilian vpon the Italian footemen and mountaine men, winning vpon them the passage not many dayes after: A matter which ought not to find so ready imitation amongst Christians, notwithstanding the lawes of armes are full of severities, for that in actions of reuenge the vertue is greater to pardon, then to punish, and to a Prince by so much more honourable is his victorie, by how much he vseth his clemencie about his iustice. But as yet his forces being not so great as the necessitie of his affaires required, he occupied the time in small enterprises, sometimes besieging this borough, and sometime that passage, with very little honour and reputation for the name name Imperiall: and as alwayes his conceptions were farre greater then his forces or occasions, so he solicited at the same time with the confederates the vñion of all their forces, to make an action vpon the Citie of Venice, making his commoditie, ouer and aboue the preparations by land, of the sea armies of the French king, the king of Aragon and the galleys of the Pope being at that time conioyned and assembled into one Naue. To which demaund, notwithstanding no mention was made in the confederation of Cambray, the French had consented, if the conditions had bene such, as the benefit of the conquest had turned to a common profit: so ready is the inclination of Princes to embrace enterprises which depend vpon benefit: But it was a thing gricuous to the Pope, with whom, both then, and at other times when it was commoned vpon more amply, the king of Aragon ioynted to detest it, for that it seemed to bring particular profit to the French, vsing this colour, that it was both vniust and dishonest.

The calamities of warre are hardly limited, and lesse seldome contained in one place certaine, for whilst the countreys of Padoa, Vincenza, and Verona, suffered these torments by the armies of the Almaines and Italians, the countrey of Friul and those places which were for the Venetians in Istria, were afflicted with more miserable persecutions and ruines: for that the Prince of Hannau being entred by Cæsars direction into the countrey of Friul with ten thousand men trayned, after he had attempted in vaine to take Monfalcon, caried by force the towne and Castell of Cadore, with a pityfull execution and butcherie of those that defended it: And on the other side, certaine light horsemen and footebands of the Venetians followed with many of the countrey men, tooke by force the towne of Ualliserà, and by accord, the towne of Bellona, where was no garrison for the Almaines. The Duke of Brunswike, whom the Emperour had likewise sent thither, being repulst at Udina the principall towne of Friul, was marched to Cinital d'Austrich, a towne situate in a high place vpon the riuier of Natissona, where Federike Contarino lay in garrison with a very small companie, reposing much in the forces of the people who had mindes well resolved to defend themselves: to his succours, as Iohn P. Gradiuo Magistrate of Friul was comming with eight hundred horsemen and fūe hundred foemen, he was put to flight by certaine bands of the Almaines: and yet, notwithstanding they had shaked Cinital with their artillerie, they could not cary it, neither with the furious assaults which they gaue, nor with the rumour they spread that they had defeated the succours that came to rescue them: so great a resolution doth the defence of libertie, aboue all other respectes, breed in the minde of men. In Istria, Christopher Frangipan defeated neare the borough of Vermes, the Commissaries of the Venetians accompanied with the bandes and souldiers of the countrey: a successe that put into his handes the new Castell and the towne of Raspruch, to the great terrifying of the whole countrey, with the domages, ruines, and burnings that he made. In this perill the Venetians sent thither Angeo Trenisan Captaine of their sea armie, with sixteene galleys, who taking vpon his arriual the towne of Fiumo, addrest himselfe to occupie the towne of Triesio: but the successe falling contrarie to the expectation of the aduēture, he turned his strength to Raspruch, and recovered it by force, and afterwarde retired with his galleys to Venice, Friul and Istria remaining in a pityfull estate, for that sometimes the Venetians commanding, & sometimes the Almaines preuailing, those townes which the one part had taken and sacked, being eftsóones recovered and prayed vpon by the other, there was no action which tended not to the ruine of the miserable countrey, wherein the liues & goods of men being in continuall pillage, the fruites and wealth of the countrey were horribly wasted by all those sorts of oppressions which so bloody a warre may draw with it.

During those accidents of temporall armes, there was disputation at Rome touching spirituall amies, sixe Embassadours of Venice (since the reobtaining of Padoa) being gone thither in habit and shew miserable: for where afore they were wont to come in with great pompe and magnificence, & receiued with a reuerence of the whole Court; now, much lesse that they were followed or accompanied, seeing they were not admitted to enter but by night: such was the pleasure of the Pope, who deaying them the presence of his face, referred them to negotiate in the house of the Cardinall of Naples with him and the other Cardinals and Prelates appointed, the Ambassadours of Cæsar, the French, and Spanish hindring as much as they could that they should not obtaine the absolution of the Church paines, and of the contrarie a Bishop of England whom the king of that Nation, Henry the eight had sent thither in their fauour, soliciting manifestly for them with all the labours and deuises he could vse: So full of quarrell is aduersitie, and so infinite is the malice of the world, that to him that is ouerthrowne there are few that will lend their handes to helpe him vp againe, and to such as are in wealth and fauour, euery one studieth to cast stumbling blockes to make them fall.

But about this time, an expectation of farre greater things occupied the mindes of euery one, for that as Cesar on the one side leauing all the power he was able of himselfe, with such as he could gather of his aydes and friendes, prepared to besiege Padoa with a puissant armie: so the Veneizians on the other side, iudging their vniuersall safetie to consist in the defence of the same citie, laboured to strengthen it with all prouisions necessarie for their defence. They caused to enter, besides the bandes appointed for the garde of Trenisfa, their whole armie with all the forces they could gather from all parts: they conueyed thither infinite numbers of all sortes of artilleries, & all prouisions of victuals, sufficient to nourish them for many moneths, and refurnished the towne with proportions of labourers, workemen, & artificers, by whose helpe they made many mounts & sluces of wood and iron, to the end they should not be deprived of the water that was brought to Padoa. And albeit the prouisions and munitions were such as greater could not be desired, yet in an action of so great importance, the care, diligence, and industrie of the Senate were incredible, omitting no oportunitie wherein occasion was giuen to reconquer their losses, & defend their libertie that remained. They set before their eyes the consideration of all things that they iudged to be either necessarie or profitable, and brought into iudgement all accidents that either feare, perill, or coniecture could deuise, wherein as they were in open conference of things, in open counsell, Leonard Loredan their Duke, a man much respected for his age, and of no lesse reputation for the dignitie of his place whereunto he was called many yeares before, reasoned at large in this maner.

The Oration
Loredan.

In cases of aduersities, more doth it hurt to be doubtfull in counsell and wandring, then the multitude of illes that can happen, for that when perill & daunger be at hand, it is too late to turne confidence into feare, and lesse declaration of vertue to be desperate in chaunces, seeing there is no accident that hapneth which comes not accompanied with his proper remedie: And as follie and rashnesse haue no societie with wisdom, nor fortune any comunitie with good counsell, so when the last necessitie hastneth, to liue in coniectures, is to draw on the ill that threatneth; and to be ireresolute, is not to temper fortune, but to tempt her. I feare nothing lesse in you the want of wisdom and valour, for that in mindes so well instructed, the respectes to common honour and libertie can not but be farre aboue the considerations of our present miseries & fortune. But I wish by the way of warning, that we be not too much amased in the contemplation of our calamities, nor more fearefull of harmes that are yet but in shewes & shadowes, then mindfull to foresee that they resolue not to bodies, and happen through our proper negligence & weaknesse. If it be true (right worthy Senatours) that not onely the hope we haue to recouer our dominion, consistes in the well defending of Padoa, but also all the expectation that remaines to maintaine our vniuersall libertie: and if on the contrarie, it be most certaine, that of the losse of Padoa will descend the last desolation of our countrey, we must necessarily graunt, that the prouisions and preparations which hitherunto we haue made, notwithstanding they were great, haue not yet bene sufficient, either for that that appertaineth to the surtue of that Citie, nor for that which respecteth the dignitie of our comon weale: for in an action of such daunger & importance, it sufficeth not so to order things, as there may be a bare hope of the defending of Padoa, but we must so prouide, that with all our forces there may be such concurrance of all diligence and industrie possible to the wit of men, that it may stand assured against all the accidents of fortune, who being mighty ouer all the things of the world, hath yet her greatest power ouer the actions of warre. It is not a resolution worthy the auncient glory of the Veneizians name, to commit wholly the publike safetie, our vniuersall honour, & the proper liues of our wiues and children, to the vertue of forreiners, & fidelitie of mercenarie souldiers: it better agreeth with the extremitie we are in, & with the auncient reputation and valour of this Citie, to runne either with our bodies, and stretch out our armes for the defence of that wherein is inclosed the lifetie of the comunitie of this populous dominio: for if we now looke not to the preseruatiō of that Citie, there remaines no time hereafter to make vs assured, no fortune to hope in, no place to giue vs comfort, nor no action wherein to shew our vertue, or to expend our treasure for our libertie and safetie. Time is thankfull to such as follow it, & fauoreth occasions with oportunitie conuenient, which if we will apply to our selues afore the season of our remedie and rescue be past, we must not leaue vnproued any policie, any example, nor any any action that may respect our succour and safetie, and much lesse expect, till we remaine a pray to those that seeke to sacke our goods, and wash their couetousnesse in our blood. The conseruation of our country comprehendes not onely a publike good, but together with the safetie of the common weale, is respected the securitie of euery particular, suffering such affinitie and coniunction together, that the one can not consist without the other: for the common weale falling into seruitude, it can not be auoyded, that the substance, the honours, and liues of priuate men, become not also a pray to the couetousnesse, to the voluptuousnesse, to the cruelties, and to the vile affections of the enemies. Though there were no other respect or interest in the defending of a common weale, then the preservation of a country, is it not a thing worthy of noble Citizens full of glory and reputation in this world, & meritorious also afore God? the same so working with the people Gentils and Heathen, that they held it as a religion, that in heauen is determined a place particular for the perpetuall fruition and comfort of such, as either succoured, preserved, or augmented their country. And what country did euer deserue to be better rescued and supported by her children then this, who in all ages hath retained a soueraigne principallitie ouer all the Cities of the world, and by whom the Citizens receiue infinite commodities, profites, and honours? It is wonderfull, whether you consider it in the giftes which it hath receiued of nature, or in the things which declare her perpetuall greatnesse and happy fortune: or lastly, in those effectes which expresse her vertue, together with the nobilitie of the wits of her inhabitants: her situation makes men amazed, being the onely Citie in the world seated amongst the salt waters, and hath all her partes so conioyned, that at one time men may enioy the commodities of the water, and pleasures of the land. It is assured against the inuasions of the land, for that it standeth not on the firme land, and it is free from inundations of water, for that it is not seated in the plaine and deepe sea. I may alleage to the dignitie and reputation of this Citie, the wonderfull maiestie of publike pallaces and priuate mansions builded at incredible charges, and repolished with straunge Marbles and stones of singulartie, brought hither from all partes of the world, together with a stately aspect of excellent portraites, imageries, sculptures, pillers, and other workemanships of worthy regard. No Citie of the world comparatiue with this for the concourse of all straunge nations comming hither, partly for the surety & freedome of habitatiō in this climat so well tempered, & partly for the exercise of their traffike and negociations, whereby our cōmon weale doth draw more plentie of reuenues & riches of things contained onely within the circuit of this Citie, then many absolute kings receiue of their large and whole kingdomes. Great is the affluence of men of facultie and science, reuerent for their grauitie, doctrine, and learning, and no lesse wonderfull for their singularitie and qualitie of wit, and other vertues of men, from the which, ioyned to other conditions, is discended the glory of actions which by this common weale and her discendants, haue bene made more great, then (since the imperie of the Romains) by any other principallitie or state in the world. It may be holden not one of the least wonders, to see so great abundance of things, in a Citie wherein nothing groweth, & yet subiect to such multitudes of inhabitants. At the beginning our towne was straited and inclosed, and we constrained to retire our selues into little rockes and caues, barraine and naked of all things, and yet the vertue of our elders, stretching out first into the next seas & towines adioyning, and afterwards rising, encreasing by degrees of successe vpon the shoares and prouinces further off, yea euē to the vttermost limites of the Leuant, they got both by sea & land so great an Empire, and power, that being redoubted to all the other towines in Italie, it was necessarie to call in the vnitie, pollicies, and forces of other Christian Princes to helpe to abate and depresse it: Matters assuredly hapned by the ayde and fauour of the omnipotent God, who with such graces hath blessed and sanctified the lawes and obseruations of iustice indifferently administred in this Citie: those respects also making many peoples and nations to offer willing subiection to our gouernement. What Citie, what Empire, or what principallitie giues place to our countrey, for matter of religion, pietie, and workes of good example? Where may be scene so many Monasteries, so many Temples full of so many precious ornaments and thangs of admiration dedicated to the seruice of God? Where may be found so many Hospitals and places of pitie, prepared for the perpetuall comfort of the afflicted, and continuall exercise of charitie? Great (sure) is the recommendation of our Citie for these fauours and blessings, but farre more worthy are her prayes for the glory of this onely, that our countrey being from the beginning begot and brought forth in liberty, there was neuer scene any man borne or dye in Venice, which dyed not a freeman, and was

" neuer troubled in his libertie: A felicitie mouing principally by the exercise of ciuill cōcord, which " hath stood alwayes so rooted and confirmed in the harts of men, that at the instant when they en" ter into our Senate and our counsels, they shake off all discords and priuate quarrels. Of this is the " cause the forme of gouernement, which hath such temperature and communitie with all the best " sorts of publike administration, and conipounded of such a well consenting harmonie agreeing in " it selfe, that it hath remained for many ages vndefiled without partialities, without ciuill sediti-
 " without armes, and without effusion of bloud amongst Citizens: the same being the onely prayse " of our common weale, excelling in this propertie of vertue both Rome, Carthage, Athens, and all " other names of common weale of auncient commendation: yea, we proue in our selues such an " effect of this kinde of gouernment and pollicie, that all those auncients, who in ages past haue made " profession of Ciuill wisdom, could not describe or institute a better. Let not then the chil" dren, the offspring, and present people of so glorious a countrey, in whom for so many worlds " and ages, hath bene so worthily expressed the very strength and defence of the faith, and the " beautie of the whole Christian common weale, be slow in the execution of their duetie, the neces-" sitye of their owne safetie so requiring. Let no man refuse to commit to daunger the life of him
 " selfe and children, for the protection of that wherein consistes our vniuersall safetie, which being " comprehended in the onely defence of Padoa, let no man refuse to put his person to aduenture.
 " And albeit we haue certaintie that the forces that be there already are sufficient for the defence of " it, yet it appertaines to our honour, it is a iust office of our common vertue, & it concernes the glo" ry of the name of Venice, to make the world satisfied, that we are runne thither in person, both to " defend and preserue. The destinie of that Citie hath permitted, that in few dayes so great an estate " of imperie should fall out of our handes, wherein we haue not to complaine so much of the ma" lice of fortune, for that such nature of aduentures are commō to other countreys & kingdomes, as,
 " for that sayling of that constancie which till this day hath bin inuincible, and without all memorie
 " of the glorious exāples of our elders, we haue with too sodaine dispaire, giuen place to the mightie " blowes of aduersitie, and are not able to represent to our children that valour and vertue, which " our fathers haue left well testified to vs. In matters of enterprise occasion is of great force, & time
 " doth now returne vpon vs the occasion to recouer that notable ornament and member which is " not yet lost, if we shew the mindes of men, but onely altered without any perill of absolute ruine.
 " Let vs go against the fortune that enuie vs, and make willing prostitution of our bodies to the " daungers that are offered, so shall we not onely redeeme the infamies that we haue receiued, but " also the world beholding yet that our auncient magnanimitie and vertue is not lost, men will ra" ther attribute the disorders past to a certaine fatall repest, which neither the counsels nor constan" cie of men could resist, then to impose vpon vs either blame or dishonour, fulfilling all things that " our condition can afford for our succour. In this respect, if it were reasonable that we went alto" gether to the rescue of Padoa, and if for certaine dayes we might leaue this abandoned citie with" out preiudice of her defence and other publike affaires of importance, my selfe, without expecting " your resolution, would be the first that should open the way, not seeing wherin I might better " close vp the latest dayes of my old age, then in my presence to participate with so glorious a victo-" rie which is required of my office and birth, or else not to remaine on liue after the ruine of my " countrey: a calamitie which my minde hath horrore to expresse. But for that Venice, neither can,
 " nor ought to be deprived of her publike counsels, wherein consisteth no lesse the defence of *Pa-
 " doa*, then in the force and armes of such as be there already: and seeing that the vnprofitable " troupes of old persons will stand in that Citie rather as a charge and burden, then as a succour and
 " ayde necessarie: and seeing withall it is not conuenient, for things that may happen, to disfurnish " Venice of all her youth: my aduise is, respecting these reasons with the regard to accidents that may " occurre, that there be made a choise of two hundred Gentlemen of the flower and principals of " our youth, and euery of them to go to Padoa, with such proportion of his friends, followers, and " seruants, as his riches and abilitie will beare, and to continue there so long as shall be necessarie
 " for that defence. My two sonnes with their retinues shall be the first in this example, of whose liues
 " and persons in so great a daunger, I make a willing offer to the succour of their countrey: by their " presence in the action the Citie of Padoa shall be more assured: by their example the mercenarie " souldiers that be there will be more resolute; seeing a ready courage in our honourable youth af" fisting all actions that concerne that seruice. And seeing our sonnes and kinsmen ioyned with them, their suretie will be the greater to haue no want of victuals, munitions, nor any other thing conuenient to their comfort. The residue of our youth not put to this execution, shall be so much the more encouraged by this example, to commit themselves in all times of necessitie, to all trauels and daungers importing the seruice of their countrey. It is an honest emulation to strue in vertue, but it is more honourable to contend to excell one another in the defence of our countrey. By this I exhort you, noble Senators, (whose wordes and doings serue as an example and doctrine to the whole Citie) to muster your sonnes, and make them of the number of those that shall communicate in so great a glory: for from them will not onely proceede the assured and certaine defence of Padoa, but in this action is also brought to vs with all nations, a peculiar reputation, that we our selues are they, who with the daunger of our owne liues do defend the libertie and safetie of the most worthy and flourishing countrey that is in the whole world.

This counsell of the Prince was heard with great affection of the residue, to whom nothing appeared more conuenient for their common safetie, then to ioyne it to practise and execution. And as the nature and operation of the time, and the necessitie of their affaires, could not without preiudice endure delayes, so the flower and choise bodies of their youth of Venice, mustered and drew to them so many of their friendes and followers as were apt to armes, and with them went with speede to the seruice of Padoa, being accompanied to their imbarquing with all the other Gentlemen and communitie of people, euery one celebrating with many prayes, and with vowes and desires full of deuotion and affection, so great a readinesse to succour the countrey: an example of right worthy and honourable imitation, seruing to instruct all posterities and ages, that when perill and daunger be at hand, euery one to be touched with the interest of his countrey. They were welcomed at Padoa with an vniuersall gladnesse of the Captaines and souldiers, much recommending the valour of those noble personages, who not trayned in the trauels, experiences, and daungers of warre, stucke not to preferre the loue of their countrey, afore the respect of their proper life: In so much as ministring comfort one to another, not as men trauelled in calamities, but with mindes resolute, they expected in great fidelitie the comming of Cesar: who for his part labouring to reassemble and receiue the bands of souldiers that came to him from all partes, was by this time come to the bridge of Brento three myles from Padoa, and hauing taken Limini by force, and cut off the course of the water, he taried the comming of the artillerie which was sent out of Germanie, which was no lesse terrible for the quantitie then for the qualitie: of this proportion of artilleries one part being arriued at Vincenza, and Philip Rosse & Federike Gonsaguo de Bossole being gone with two hundred light horsemen to be his gard; they were charged with a strength of fise hundred light horsemen, who, led by certaine paylants that during the warre did much seruice to the Venetians, and being then issued out of Padoa, they ouerthrew them fise myles from Vincenza, where Philip remained prisoner, and Federike by the fauour of the night escaped in his shirt. From the bridge Brenta, Maximilian enlarged and stretched out his bands about twelue myles, drawing towardes Polesina de Romigua, the better to open to himselfe the commoditie of victuals, and taking the borough of Este by assault, and putting it to sacke, he went to encampe at Montefelice, where the towne standing in the playne, being abandoned, the second day he caried the Castell standing on the top of a high rocke. Afterwardes he tooke by composition Montagnana, and so returning towardes Padoa, he incamped at the bridge of Bassanello neare Padoa, where he proued in vayne to turne the riuer of Brenta which from thence hath his course to Padoa. At this place did arriue all the artilleries & munitions which he expected, and hither did resort all the regiments of men of warre which lay dispersed in diuerse places, with whom in forme and title of a mayne armie, he approched neare the towne: and hauing bestowed foure thousand footemen in the suburbs which are called S. Croff. his opinion was to assaile it on that side, but being afterwards aduertised that it was part of the towne most strong by situation and by wals, and also that there he stood most subiect to the harmes of the artilleries, he determined to discampe and remoue his armie to the gate which is called the Waterfort, bearing his aspect to Venice. The cause why he remoued to this place, was an opinion that there the towne was most weake, and withall to giue impediment to the succours which were to come from Venice to Padoa both by land and by water: but for that he could not go thither for the discommoditie of certaine marishes and warrie channelles ouerflowing the countrey, but by fetching a great circuite, he came to the bridge of Bonolento within seuen myles of Padoa, where be pastures and feeding groundes vpon the Banke of Bagnillon towards the sea, betweene Padua and Venice. To this place, enuironed with waters, and in the most sure part of the countrey of Padua, were withdrawne three thousand paylants with great hearde of cattell, who being forced by the footebands of the Spanish and Italians that were in the vauward, were almost all taken or slaine, the victours employing the two dayes following in praying the whole countrey, euen to the sea, driuing away infinite hearde of cattell feeding in that quarter. There were also taken vpon Brenna diuerse barkes, which laden with victuals were running vp to Padua. At last, the fifteenth day of September, after he had consumed much time vnprofitably, and giuen good leasure to the enemy both to fortifie and refurnish the towne with victuals, he approached the wals of Padua on that side towards the gate of the waterfort. There hath not bene scene in Italie neither in the age present, nor haply long time before, a besieging of more great expectation, nor wherein the mindes of men were more busily occupied, then this, not so much for the nobilitie and maiestie of the Citie, as for the importance that was in the loosing and keeping of the same: for Padua, a Citie so aunciently recommended for the vniuersitie of studies and sciences, is seated in a country very fertill, and vnder a climate temperat & wholesome: it is incompassed with three orders of wals, and bearing a circuit and circumference as large as any Citie in Italie, it hath passing by it the riuers of Brenta and Bagnillon: And albeit the Venetians won it out of the possession of the familie of Carraro more then two hundred yeares since, yet it retaines many proud aspectes and shewes of stately buildings, with many monuments and signes of antiquitie, well expressing her auncient greatnesse and beautie. And of the conquering & defending of so great a Citie, depended, not only the confirmation or diminution of the Almain imperie in Italie, but also the very estate and felicitie of the Citie of Venice: for Padua being defended, it was easie for the common weale of Venice abounding in great wealth, and of one vnitie of minde and readinesse of wit, subiect to no such variations as the affaires of Princes are, to hope to recouer in small time so great a part of her iurisdiction: wherein they were so much the more assured, by how much the most part of those subiects which had thirsted after mutations, neither finding effectes agreeable to their conceptions, and knowing by comparison what difference was betweene the moderate gouernement of the Venetians, and the tyranny of the Almaines, farre estraunged from the maners and customes of the Italians, and lastly being greatly disordred by the confusions and domages of the warre, they began to call into respect and affection their auncient yoke. And of the contrarie, if Padua were committed to violence and sacke, much lesse that the Venetians could hope to restore the glorie and magnificence of their common weale, seeing there were daunger that the very Citie of Venice made naked of so large a member, and dispoyled of so many treasures both by diminution of publike reuenues, and losse of so many natures of goods moueable, possessed by persons priuate in the firme land, would not be able to maintaine defence against the armies of the Princes confederate, or at least would not in time become a pray to the Turkes, to whom they are neighbours in many places, and with whom they haue had alwayes either warre or peace vnfaithfull and ill assured. But wise men were occupied with no lesse doubt and perplexitie, the mighty preparations that were made on all sides keeping wonderfully in suspence the common iudgements, which were very vncertaine on whether part the better fortune would fall, either to the assailants, or to the defendants: for in the army of Caesar, besides the seuen hundred French Launces, which Monsieur la Palice comaunded, there were two hundred men at armes which the Pope had sent for his strength: two hundred men at armes appointed by the Duke of Ferrara vnder the charge of the Cardinall of Este, notwithstanding the quarrels that were betweene them were not yet reconciled, and six hundred Italian Launces vnder sundry Captaines leauied by him: he had xvij. thousand Almain footemen, six thousand Spanish, six thousand aduentures of diuers nations and languages, and two thousand Italians, leauied and payed by the Cardinall of Este vnder the same title. There followed him a wonderfull proportion of all sortes of artilleries, with great quantities of munitions, whereof the French king had sent him one part. And albeit for the most part his owne ordinarie bands were not payed, yet, what with the consideration of the greatnesse & authoritie of such a leader, and the hope to pray & sacke Padua, and to haue at their deuotion all those peeces which the Venetians possessed, much lesse that they abandoned his seruice, seeing they flockt to him dayly in greater numbers, being caried chiefly by this inducement, that he that of his owne nature was most libell and full of humanitie to his souldiers, would not sayle of their payment by couetousnesse or will,

but by disability, or want. This was the strength of Cæsars armie, compounded wholly of his owne forces, but made mightie by the ayde of straungers & mercenaries. But for that which concerned the defence of Padoa, the armie which the Venetians had in that Citie, was no lesse mightie: for there were sixe hundred men at armes, a thousand five hundred light horsemen, a thousand five hundred stradiots, all commaunded by these notable Captaines, the Count Petillano Generall of the whole, B. de Montona, Anth. de Pic. Luke Maluazzo, Iohn Greeke, with other inferiour leaders. There were twelue thousand footemen of the best experienced and trayned in Italie, vnder the charge of Denis Naldo, Zitole de Peroufa, Lactan. de Bergamo, Sacco de Spoletto, with many other officers: ten thousand footemen aswell Slauonians, Greekes, and Albanois, whom they had drawne from their galleys, of whom albeit many were not much profitable to the seruice, yet some of them were well trayned and able to execute necessarie office. Besides, they had the youth of Venice in whom was no little importance touching the felicitie of the seruice, and albeit they were much respected in cases of daungers, yet their example serued no lesse to the aduancement of the seruice, then themselves wonne great merite for their dispositions and pietie to their countrey. There was also a wonderfull abundance and store of all prouisions necessarie, great quantities of artilleries, and a plentiful proportion of all sortes of victuals, the people of the plat countreys being no lesse carefull to bring in prouisions for their common suretie, then the Magistrates and officers of Venice to giue order for their continuall refurnishing. There were also many multitudes of paynants, who being leauied at a certaine price, were employed in the labours of their fortifications: in so much as to the valour and numbers of those that were appointed to defend it, they ioyned wonderfull rampiers and fortifications in that circuite of walles that enuironeth the whole Citie: for they had almost filled vp all the water-ditch which runneth along the wals, and at every gate of the towne and other places conuenient, builded many fortes and close bastillions without, but so as they were annexed to the walles, and had entries and conueyances into the towne, and being well replenished with artilleries, they beat such as entred into the trench. And because the taking of those bastillions should bring no daunger to the towne, they had sunke in them all vnderneath, hollow vaultes, or caues filled vp with barrells of gunpowder, to blow vp into the ayre, when they were no longer able to defend them. And reposing not altogether in the greatness and goodnesse of the old wall, notwithstanding they had searched it diligently, and reenforced it where neede were, filling vp all the cranelles and ruines: yet they made round about the Citie within, a couer, or pausse, or fortification of pales, trees, and other peeces of wood, so farre distant from the wall as it was in thicknesse, and with a wonderfull diligence, had filled vp to the top of the wall with good earth, and well rammed all the voyde place that was betwene them. This fortification no lesse wonderfull in the effect, then of a labour and trauell inestimable, the infinite diligence of men being continually employed, seemed not so to satisfie the expectation of the defence of that Citie, but that they cast a deepe ditch of sixteene fadome breadth, which drawing lesse and narrower in the bottome, and standing thicke with murdering houses and little towers full of shot, seemed impossible to be forced. These natures of fortifications were made with hollow vaultes and caues, according to the example of the bastillions, hauing conueyances to be ouerthrowne by fire when they would. And because they would be thoroughly prepared to all things, they rayled behind the ditch a rampier of the same or greater largenesse, which stretched out as farre as the circuite of the towne, except in certaine corners and places, wherein they knew it was impossible to plant artillerie: and before the rampier they cast a parapet of seuen fadome, which was a defence to those that fought vpon the rampier, that they could not be stricken with the bullet of the enemy. And to the end that the courage of the souldiers and men of the towne, might equally answer those rates of prouisions and fortifications, the Count Petillano assembling the whole armie in the place of S. Anthonie, encouraged them with speeches of great grauitie & perswasion, to consider vpon what termes stood their common safetie and honor, wherein for the better fidelitie and surety of the seruice, he protested his owne oath, and bound likewise in the same solemnitie all the Captaines, all the armie, and the particulars of the towne, to follow the defence of the Citie vntill death. In a perill so generall, there was none refused to giue his oath to the defence of that whereunto he so frankly offered his life, & where the life is offered vp to daunger, it is nothing to giue an oath to assure the fidelitie. Thus the armie of Caesar being drawne neare the wals of Padoa with so great a strength, and against so mightie preparation, he stretched out his campe from the gate of the waterfort, vntill the gate of All Saints which leads to Trensfa, and from thence enlarged it to the gate of Codalonga which goeth to the Cudell, so as it contained in largenesse thre myles: Maximilian himselfe was lodged in the Monasterie of S. Helen, within a quarter of a myle of the Citie wals, encamping as it were in the middelt of the Almain footemen: and after he had imparted to euery one his charge according to the diuersitie of nations and places of their encampin, he began to plant his artilleries, wherein albeit in his person being inuincible in minde, and of a body hardned with paine and trauels, he performed a wonderfull diligence to accomplish that action, yet it could not be atchieued but with longnesse of time and great difficultie, as well for the quantitie and intollerable greatnesse of some natures of it, as also for that the whole campe, and specially those places where they sought to plant them, were continually tormented and distressed with the artilleries of the towne. At last, the perpetuall industrie of Maximilian ioyned to the valour of his souldiers, made way to plant his artilleries, and the same day the French with the footemen of the Almains, gaue an assault to the tower of the gate on that side where Monf. la Palice had charged, but more to sound & proue their countenance, then with intention to fight in good appointment: and therefore finding the resistance valiant & well furnished, they retired eftsloones to their tents. The day after the charge recontinued, the artillerie not ceassing to thunder with terrible furie: some of them by their incredible hugenesse and vnmeasurable quantitie of powder that was vsed, pierced through the rampiers, and reuerfed the houses that ioyned nearest the wals: A furie which in short time shaked downe to the ground many places of the wall, the bastillion also builded vpon the gate of All saints being dismantelled and razed, without that the defendants afflicting the campe with continuall volleys of shot, shewed any signe of feare: so resolute is the vertue that fights for honour and libertie. The stradiots that in great valour encamped in the suburbs refusing alwayes to retire into the towne, and the light horsemen making continuall incursions in all places, skirmished with their enemies sometimes before, and sometimes behind, driving them euen to their tents, sometimes they distressed such as were gardes to the forragers and victuallers, and sometimes ouerrunning the whole countrey with pray and pillage, they spoyled all the wayes, except that which goeth from Padoa to the mount of Aban: and yet there was in the campe a wonderfull abundance of victuals, euery house and place being plentifully furnished, for that neither the feare of the payfants, nor the carefull diligence of the Venetians, nor the infinite harmes of the souldiers on both sides, could not draine or dry vp the incredible plentie of that most fruitfull and fertill countrey. At the same time also Luke Malvezzo issued out of Padoa with certaine troupes of horsemen, for the conuoy of fortie thousand duc-kets which were sent thither from Venice: and albeit in his returne the enemy charged him vpon the tayle, yet his vertue brought in the treasure in safetie, without any other losse then one of his men at armes. By the ninth day the artillerie had executed so well, that it seemed there was no further necessitie to shoot, and therefore vsing all benefites that the time offered, the day following the whole army appeared in order of battell to approch the walles: but finding that the same night they within the towne had made swell and rise the water of the ditch, which afore was abated and fallen, Caesar gaue order that euery band should returne to his place, holding it neither honourable nor necessarie to commit his souldiers to a daunger so manifest. The next day, the water eftsloones abated and retired, when embracing the oportunitie, they gaue an assault (but with slender successe) to the bastillion which was made vpon the point of the gate of Codalonga, wherein the Emperour disposed to do what he could to force it, caused to be turned thither the artilleries that were planted in the quarter of the French, encamping betweene the gates of All Saints and Codalonga: and with those artilleries, hauing done great execution of that place, he followed it with an assault two dayes after with the footemen of the Almains and Spanish, accompanied with certaine men at armes on foote, who in the furie of the fight ascended the bastillion, & set vp there two ensignes. But the fortresse of the ditch was such, and the vertue of the defendants nothing inferior, and so plentifull the instruments of defence not only concerning artilleries, but also of stones & wildfires, that they were constrained to descend by heapes, many remaining dead on the place, and some falling into the fortune of imprisonment. In so much as the armie that stood in readinesse to giue the assault, immediatly vpon the action of the bastillion, retired, & disarmed, without making any any other attempt, judging it no stain to their honour to abandon the enterprize wherein was no hope of their safetie. By this experience Maximilian lost wholly all hope of the victorie, in which consideration he determined his labour with his fortification, and breaking vp his campe, after he had bestowed his artilleries in places sure, he retired with his armie to the towne of Limin towards Trenisa. This was the seuenteenth day after he was encamped before Padoa, and so with many baies and resting places, he came at last to Vincenza, from whence after he had taken of that people the oath of fidelitie, and almost dismissed his whole armie, he drew toward Verona, being not a little discontented that his deliberations had taken no better successe, but more touched with perturbation, for that they bare blame and slander both in his armie and throughout all Italie, for that the execution of things were indeede no lesse infamous then the counsels: for both for that he had missed of the taking of Trenisa, and also that he had lost Padoa, no man doubted that it was not his fault, & also that his too late arriuing afore Padoa made the actiō more hard, for that in that negligence the Venetians tooke oportunitie and good aduantage of time to make prouision of souldiers, to refurbish Padoa with victuals, and to raise wonderfull fortifications to resist the execution that was determined. And albeit himselfe could not denie, that in that propertie of error consisted not the defence of the Citie, yet cloaking the vice of his owne varietie and proper disorders, he layd the fault from himselfe, and complained of the Pope and French king, for that the one had suffered the Embassadours of Venice to go to Rome, and the other had bene too slow to send succours, the same giuing occasion to the world to belecue that they were estranged from him, and had likewise encouraged the countrey men of the mountaines of Vincenza to draw to rebellion: for the subduing of whom after he had consumed many dayes, he found afterwards in regard of the same occasion, the selfe same difficulties in the plaine countreys. Also the better to open to himselfe a way to reuietall his army, & to assure his prouisiōs, & withall to deliuer his companies from many incōmodities, he was constrained to take all the townes of the countrey. Herein the slow marching of the French had not onely much hurt him, but also if they had come in due season & time, the reuolt of Padoa had not hapned. He complained also that aswell for these hinderances, as for that the French and king of Aragon had dismissed their armie at sea, the Venetians had the better oportunitie and meane to refurbish and refortifie Padoa standing deliuered from all other feares. Lastly, he complained that those difficulties were acceptable to the king of Aragon, as meanes to induce him to consent more easily that the administration and gouernment of the kingdome of Castile should be to him. But these cōplaints did nothing better his fortunes, and much lesse recouered his authoritie lost, for that he was negligent to vse so rare occasions: for it did nothing discontent the French king that the world was possessed with such an opinion of him, and in the Pope was lesse care or affection, for that being of his proper inclination suspicious and distrustfull, and weighing withall the Emperours continuall necessities and wants of money, with his importunities to demaund it, he was vnwilling that his name should encrease in Italie. At Verona he receiued the oath of fidelitie, and in that Citie Pe. Guicciardin father to the authour of this booke, with the other Florentin Embassadours, couenanted with him in the name of the common weale, (induced, besides their owne respects, by the perswasions of the French king) to pay him in a short time xl. thousand duckets: for which promise, they obtained of him in most ample manner, many priuiledges, for the confirmation aswell of the libertie of Florence, as of the dominion and iurisdiction of the townes and estates which they held, together with remission and acquittance of all duties and demaundes for times past. Thus Cesar, resting determined to returne into Germanie, to giue order (as he sayd) for the warres which he intended in the spring time, sent for Monsieur Chaumont to come and communicate with him of the present affaires: He layd afore him by demonstration the perils of the time, and what daunger there were that the Venetians would recouer Citadella and Bassana, places of great importance, which they prepared to assaile, being made proud by the defence and successe of Padoa: He feared the same opinion of their fortune would encourage them also to the like action against Monfelicca, Montagnana, and Este, the felicitie of victorie making men insolent, & carying their mindes into enterprises aboue the proportion of their proper power and abilitie: He alleaged how necessarie it were to consider, not onely of the protection of these places, but also to enter into practise how to recouer Legnague, wherein being of himselfe not sufficient enough to leaue prouisiōs necessarie for such effectes, it touched the king in good pollicie to minister ayde to him, whose places were to fall into manifest perill, if the pecea which he held were not supported. To these demaundes, Monsieur Chaumont, in whom was no power to make any certaine resolution, gave answer, that he would see the king aduertised, on whose behalfe he auouched a minde conformable to his desires, being all that appertained to his place to promise well, hauing no authoritie to assure. After this conference, Cesar went to Chiusa, leauing the Marquis of Brandebourg for the gard of Kerona: and a little after Monsieur de Palissa remaining with five hundred Launces vpon the countrey of Verona, alleaging the difficulties and incommodities of the place where he lay, gave leaue with great importunities to retire to the frontiers of the Duchie of Millan: for that the kings intention was, that if his men of warre should remaine in garrison and do nothing, they should not abide vpon his estate, but should returne to the seruice of Maximilian to expect such enterprize as he would imbrace, but chiefly the action of Leguagna, which notwithstanding it was much desired and solicited by him, yet it was so long deferred by his accustomed difficulties, that the raines fell so fast by the propertie of the season, that it was impossible to iscampe in that countrey, being for his lownesse much subiect to waters: for these impediments, Cesar was driuen to desire truce for certaine moneths with the Venetians, but they rising into courage by his disorders, and seeing how slowly the confederates ministred to his ayde, had more regard to the fortune that followed them, then to the motions he made, iudging it not for their profit to consent to any ceassing of armes.

Amid these suspitions and iealousies of things, the Emperour at last returned to Trent, leauing those places that he held in great daunger, and all the gouernments in Italie in generall doubt: for, there began to appeare betweene the Pope and the French king a new contention, the foundation whereof, albeit seemed to be layd vpon light occasions, yet, there was feare lest it was intangled with more secret practise & causes of greater importance then such as were expressed. The outward cause appearing, was that a Bishoprick being voyd in Prouence by the death of the incumbent dying in the Court of Rome, the Pope had disposed it against the will of the French king, who pretended such action to be contrary to the capitulation which the Cardinal of Pavia had made betweene them, wherein albeit the wordes bare not expressely that there should be equall respect and obseruation touching the Bishoprikes falling in the Court of Rome, as of such as fell vacant in other places, yet he was assured no lesse by the mouth and promise of the Cardinal, which the Cardinal confessed not to be true, more perhaps for feare, then for other occasion: the Pope affirmed the contrary, alleaging that he tooke no knowledge of any thing promised in priuie and secret, onely in the ratification he had regard to that that appeared in the writing and particular articles: wherein he had set downe distinctly all the contents of the capitulation, chapter by chapter, and the article concerning the dying of the Bishops in the Court of Rome being not comprehended, he was not bound to the obseruation of that that was not expressed. This did so much aggrauate the discontentment of them both, that as the king, reiecting contrary to his custome the counsels of the Cardinal Amboise, who had alwayes aduised him to entertaine agreement with the Pope, made sequestration of the fruites of all those benefices which the Churchmen resident in the Court of Rome held in the Duchie of Millan: So the Pope refused to indue the Bishop of Albie with the hat, who, according to the promise made to the king, was gone to Rome to receiue it. And albeit the Pope, ouerruled by the importunities of many friends, was brought in the end, to dispose of the Bishoprike of Prouence according to the kings minde, and albeit there was eftsloones agreed betweene them a new forme of proceeding in benefices that hereafter should fall in the Court of Rome, and in that regard the sequestrations to cease on the one side, and on the other part the hat to be transferred to the Bishop of Albie: yet these agreements sufficed not to moderate the mind of the Pope, who was not a little kindled for many reasons, but specially for that, hauing from the beginning of his Popedom, transferred very vnwillingly the legation of the Realme of Fraunce to the Cardinal of Amboise, a matter hurtfull to the Court of Rome, and bearing preiudice to his authoritie, it was now most grieuous to him to be constrained (to auoid displeasure with the French king) to continue it to him: he was iealous also that the same Cardinal aspired with all his thoughts and meanes to the soueraigne seate, and therefore he stood in feare and doubt of euery aduancement and rising of the French. These were the apparant causes of his discontentment, but as farre as could be afterwarde coniectured by his thoughts and dispositions, he layd greater plots, and aspired to farre greater endes, desiring vehemently, either for greedinesse of glory, or for some secret hatred against the French king, or at least for the libertie of the Genowayes, that the king might lose lose all that he possessed in Italie, iudging his greatnesse a bridle to his ambition, and his power in Italie an impediment to his authoritie: he ceased not also to complaine against him and the Cardinall of Amboise indifferently, but with such temperance and cunning, that it seemed his discontentment proceeded chiefly of feare: and yet, as he was of a nature obstinate and invincible, and for the most part accompanied the disposition of his minde with outward demonstrations: so, albeit he aspired in his secret thoughts to an end of so great consequence and hard to obtaine, reposing onely in himself and the reuerence and authoritie which he knew Christian Princes bare to the sea Apostolike, yet he would not enter into alliance nor depend of any: but expressing both in speech and working how little account he made of all, he forbore to ioyne with Maximilian, and refused to enter secret intelligence with the king Catholike; but estranging himselfe from euery one, he inclined onely to the part of the Venetians, expressing daily more and more a confirmation of will to absolue them, iudging it a thing very conuenient for the common safetie of Italie, and for his particular suretie and greatnesse, not to suffer them to perish. Against this, did make great resistance the Embassadours of Maximilian and the French, concurring also with them in publike practise the Embassadour of the king of Aragon, notwithstanding he solicited the Pope secretly, to the contrary, fearing no lesse the greatnesse of the French in regard of the kingdome of Naples, and reposing little in the disposition of Cesar for the slender stabilitie that was in him. These Embassadours alleged that it was not reasonable that the Pope should doe so great a benefite for those, whom he was bound by equitie and promise to pursue by armes, seeing by the confederation of Cambray, euery cōfederat was bound reciprocally to aide one another till there was absolute recouerie of all those places which were named for euery particular partie: So that seeing Cesar had not yet conquered Trenis, neither one of them stood acquitted of such bond & promise besides, they vrged that he might iustly refuse the absolution, both for that they had not restored to the Church the townes of Romania, neither frankly nor willingly, nor within the terme set downe in the monition: and also for that euen then their obedience was not perfect and absolute, for that albeit, besides the rending of the townes, they had bene admonished to reckon for the fruites, which they had not accomplished. To these obiections the Pope made answer, that since they were returned to penance, and had sued for absolution in due humilitie, it could not stand with the office of the Vicar of Christ, to persecute them any further with spirituall weapons to the preiudice of so many soules, specially hauing obtained of them, the townes, and by that meane the occasion ceassing, for the which they had bene subiect to the censures of the Church: That concerning the reckning or restitution of the fruites, it was but a matter accidentall, and vrged more to aggravate their disobedience, then for any necessary reason, and therefore not iust that it should stand against them as a matter of importance: That it was an action of another nature to pursue them with temporall armes, wherein (determining to perseuer in the league of Cambray) he offered himselfe to be ready and concurrant with the others, notwithstanding that euery one of the confederates might iustly leaue off, for that if Cesar had not Trenis, it hapned by his proper error, refusing the first offers which the Venetians made to him by their Embassadour, both to leaue him all that they possessed in the firme land, and also to set him downe a sufficient allowance and recompence in exchange of Trenis. And thus not being retained by any contradiction or impediment of the Embassadours, he onely was slow to this action by the disposition of his minde, wherein albeit he esteemed the absolution of the Venetians to be profitable to him, and to the plots he had layd, yet he determined not to giue it to them but with great regard to the dignitie of the sea Apostolike, & so, as all those things which were dependant vpon the Church were wholly deliuered from their oppressions: the same being one cause that he deferred to absolue them, together with their vnwillingnesse to consent to these two conditions: the one that they should set at libertie to the subiects of the Church, the traffike & nauigation of the sea Adriatique, which they restrained against all such as would not answer a kind of tribute for the marchandise they brought: the other, that they should continue no longer at Ferrara (a Citie depending vpon the Church) the office of Vecedomino. The Venetians alleged, that they of Ferrara had cōsented to it, Clement the sixt giuing no impedimēt, who at that time remained with his Court in the citie of Auignon: They proued besides, that Alexander the fourth had giuen the iurisdiction & gard of the gulse vnder very large priuiledges, whercunto they were induced, for that with their armies, with their vertue, and with their expēces they had defended it against the Sarazins & pirats Turkish, & made that nauigation assured to the Christians. To these reasons it was answered on the Popes behalfe, that they of Ferrara could not in preiudice of the Ecclesiastike iurisdiction, consent, that any other should hold office or exercise dominion in Ferrara, as that the people of Ferrara had neuer willingly consented, but were forced by a long and heauie warre, and after they had in vaine called the ayde of the Pope, whose censures the Venetians contemned, were constrained to accept peace with conditions at the discretion of those that could do more with them by armes then by reason. Touching their authoritie alleaged of Pope Alexander that he had graunted it to them, it neither appeared by historie, nor other authentike tradition, neither was there any faith to be giuen to it but by the testimonie of the Venetians, a thing of iust suspicion in their owne cause, especially carying so great importance: and be it, there were some apparance of matter, yet it was more likely, that he, who they sayd had accorded to such things in Venice, had done it by threatnings or by feare, then that a Pope of Rome to whom afore all others appertaineth the defence of iustice, and the redresse of the oppressed, would haue consented to an action so cruell and impudent, and bearing damage to the whole world.

In this estate of affaires, in this diuersitie of intentions of Princes, in this slender power and reputation of Cesar, the Venetians, vnder the leading of Anarea Grutti, sent their armie to Vincenza, where they knew the people, in a generall disposition desired to returne vnder their iurisdiction: and making their approaches in the entry of the euening, they won the suburbs of P. after they had made great batteries with their artilleries. Touching the Citie, albeit there were as yet within it very few souldiers, yet the Venetians had no great suretie to carie it: onely the townesmen, by the incensing of Fracasse as the brute ranne, after they had sent their Embassadors to them about midnight, put them into the Citie, the Prince of Hanaw & Fracasse retiring into the Castell. And, (such is the proprietie of victory) it was assuredly beleueed, that if the Venetian army obtaining Vincenza, had without delay approached Verona, that towne had done the like, examples being of great effect in the alteration of fortune: but the Captaines were of aduise not to issue out of the towne till the Castell were commaunded, which they had at their deuotion the fourth day, the P. of Hanaw and Fracasse distrusting their owne weaknesse, leauing it abandoned: In matters of enterprise nothing is more hurtfull then delayes, and nothing more hindreth the felicitie of victory, then not to ioyne oportunitie to occasion and fortune: for, in this meane while and respite, new regiments of Cesar entred Verona, together with three hundred Launces of the French king, vnder the ensigne of Monsieur d'Aubigny: in so much as containing a strength of fise hundred Launces and fise thousand footemen Spanish and Almaines, it was now no more easie to take it. Not long after, the Venetian armie approached Verona, and was deuided into two parts, in either of which were three hundred men at armes, fise hundred light horsemen, and three thousand footemen: they hoped that vpon their approaching, there would be some commotion in the Citie, but because they appeared not afore the wals all in one time, the inhabitants within the towne, going to meete with the former part which came beyond the riuer of Adice and was already entred the suburbs, constrained them to retire, Luke Maluette comming a little after on the other side of the riuer with the other part, retiring also: and both they ioyning together, incamped in the village of S. Martin within fise myles of Verona: where vnderstanding that two thousand Almain footemen issued out of Basciana, were gone to make pillage of the places about Citadella, turning that way, they inclosed them in a valley called Fidato: but the Almaines, succoured by those of Basciana, made their way by force, though with some hurt for the strait passages, & leauing Basciana abandoned, the Venetians tooke it: from Basciana, one part of the armie went to Feliro and Cinitall, which places after they had recouered and commaunded, they presented themselves before the rocke of Escalo, which they commaunded after the artillerie had somewhat executed. At the same time Anthony and Hierome Sanorgiana, Gentlemen that followed the Venetian faction in the countrey of Friul, tooke new Castell standing on a rough mountaine in the midst of the patrimonie, (so is called that part of Friul which is beyond the riuer of Taillemont;) and all this while there was heard no other thing of Cesar then vaine rumours, & how being moued with the action of Vincenza, was immediatly come to Pietra, he trauelled from one place to another vsing great diligence with very small effect.

army vpon the countrey of

After this, the Venetian armie drew towards Monfelize and Montagnana, both to recouer Polisena, and to charge the places of Ferrara together with their naue, which the Senate, reiecting the counsell of the most wise Senatours, who iudged it to rashnesse to be intangled with new enterprises, had determined to send against the Duke of Ferrara, well furnished with strength and munition along the river of Paw. To this manner of action they were induced, not so much for the profite of the affaires present, as for the incredible haire they bare to him: it seemed to them that they could not iustly compaine, of that he had done to shake off the yoke of Pseudommo, and to re-couer Polisena, but they supposed it neither to their honour nor profite to suffer, that being not content to challenge that which he pretended to appertaine to him by right, he aspired to retaine that whereunto he had no way any colour of interest, for that at such time as Cesar leauied his siege from before Padoa, he receiued of him in fee, both the borough of Este (fro whence is sprong the name and familie of Este) and also the borough Montagnana for pawne and assurance of the money that had bene lent him: to which places he pretended no right at all, vnesse he reposed equitie in his ambition and tyrannie. There were added to this the remembrance of many actions of insolencie and violence, and other executions done by his people in the recouerie of Polesina, who pushed on with an incredible hatred against the name of the Venetians, had executed great harmes and cruelties vpon the Gentlemen, yea euen to reuerse their houses and put fire in them.

 In these respectes it was agreed, that their nauie and sea armie, commaunded by Ange Trenisan, compounded vpon seuenteen light gallies with a large furnishment of meane vessels and able bodies for seruice, should sayle toward Ferrara. This flecte entring into Paw by the mouth of the fornaces, and burning Cornola with certaine other villages neare to Paw, went pilling and spoiling the counrey vp to the lake of Scuro, from which place the light horsemen who followed the as a strength by land, made incursions as farre as Ficherolo: which albeit is rather a house of plea-sance then a Castell, yet it is not without his reputation and name, for that Ros. Senerin lay long time before it, being Captaine to the Venetians in a warre which they had against Hercules father to Alphonso. The comming of this nauie together with the rumour of the armie by land that was to follow, brought no little amaze to the Duke, who, hauing but a slender strength of souldiers, and the inhabitants of Ferrara either for their small numbers, or for their ignorance in warre, not sufficient enough to oppose against such a daunger, had no other meane to defend himselfe, vntill he were comforted with the succours which he expected from the Pope and French king, then to lee with force of shot bestowed vpon the brinke of Paw, that the enemies should passe no further: for these impediments Trenisan, after he had in vaine assayed to passe, seeing he could aduance nothing without he were succoured by land, came to an anker in the midst of the river of Paw behind a little isle right quer against Pulselle: a place within xi. myles of Ferrara, and very apt to torment the towne and make many hurtfull executions vpon the counrey: his intention was to expect therethe armie, who had gotten without great difficultie all Polisena, hauing first recouered Montagnana by composition, by the which the Magistrates of Ferrara were deliuered to them as prisoners, together with the Captaines of the footemen that were within. In this time of expectation of the armie, for the more safe siding of the nauie in the place where it lay, Trenisan began to raise two bastillions vpon the bankes of Paw, the one on that side to Ferrara, the other vpon the shore right against it, casting withall a bridge vpon the vessels to haue the more oportunitie to succour that bastillion that was on Ferrara side. Afore this worke was accomplished, the Duke deuised either to reuerse it or at least to hinder it, and with a counsell haply more couragious then discrete, he called together all the youth of the towne with such companies of souldiers as were come to his pay, and sent them out to assaile the bastillion: but it was an enterprise in vaine, for that the defendants receiuing succours of their peoples which issued out of the vessels, began to disorder the enemie and put them to flight, wherein albeit the Duke himself came to the medley with a fresh succour of horsemen, and with his presence brought a new hart to most of his people not trained in warre, yet such was the furie of the enemie, for whom the surtie of the place fought, being martned with many peeces of small shot, that in the end he was constrained to retire, leauing many of his people either dead or taken, and that not so many of the inexperienced and base multitudes, as of the most braue souldiers and nobilitie of Ferrara: amongst them was Herl. Cantelmoza young man of great hope, and whose auncestors afore time were Dukes of Sore in the kingdome of Naples: the fortune of this man was more tragicall then of any of the residue, for that as certaine Slanonian souldiers led him prisoner into a gallie, and contending amongst themselves for the interest of his body, there was one of them, who, with a new example of barbarous crueltie, miserably strooke his head. For these perills ioyned to the manifest apparance of extremitie to the towne of Ferrara, Monsieur Chaumont sent to the succours of it the Lord of Chabillon with an hundred and fiftie French Leagues: and the Pope being kindled against the Venetians for entring into that action without regard to the superiority which the Church hath there, appointed the two hundred men at armes which he had lent to Cesar, to be converted to the defence of Ferrara. But it might haue hapned that these succours had bin too slow, if the Venetians had not bene compelled to looke to the defence of their owne estate. It hath bene declared before how the French king was not discontented with the difficulties of Maximilian, partly for the continuall feare he had of his prosperitie, and partly for that burning in desire to make him selfe Lord of Verona, he hoped by his necessities to haue it on him at last either by purchase or by ingaging: on ther side he was not a little iealous ouer the Venetians, and no lesse was his discontentment that their greatnesse was easiesly reestablished, which would nourish continuall perill and perplexitie for his Duchie of Millan. And therefore Cesar not having sufficiently refurnished Verona for want of money, the French king was constrained to enter into care of things, and, in sending new companies besides those men at armes which were entred there already, to foresee that that Citie returned not to their obedience. To this Monsieur Chaumont gaue beginning, who, after the losse of Vincenza, being drawne vpon the marches of Verona, retained in the French kings pay two thousand Spanish footemen, which were within Verona, who began to draw into tumult for want of payment: he sent thither for a greater suretie, other bantles of footemen according to the aduise of Trinulce, who, for that Monsieur Chaumont feared least the king would be discontented with so great expences, made answer, that it was a lesse euill that the king charged him with the expences of his money, then by sparing his treasure, to lose or put in daunger his estate; the one bringing safetie to the kings things, and in the other no honour nor reputation to the place he held vnder the king. Besides this, he lent to Cesar eight thousand duckets to pay the souldiers that were within Verona, receiuing in pawne both for the repayment of that summe & others which hereafter he should aduance for his affaires, the towne of Vallegge, a place which the king esteemed much for the suretie of Bresse, both for the nearenesse being within fixe myles of Bresse, and for the oportunitie of the passage ouer the riuer of Mynia which is alwayes commaunded by such as are maisters of Vallegge and Pesquero. The marching of Monsieur Chaumont being followed with the most part of the Launces in the Duchie of Millan, together with the companies which he had put into Verona, and the rumour that ranne of his preparation to besiege Vincenza, were the causes that the Venetian armie, leauing for the defence of Polisena and to succour their nauie, foure hundred light horsemen and foure hundred footemen, retired from the countrey Ferrara, diuiding themselves into Legnago, Soane, and Vincenza: And being carefull to assure Vincenza, and to provide that the countrey thereabout were not distressed by the garrison of Verona, they fortified it with a wonderfull trench full of water environed with a rampier whereon were dispersed many bastillions: it began from the foote of the mountaine which lyeth about Soane, and reaching about fiue myles along the plaine that leades from Rouigne to Montfort, it ended at a corner of certaine marshes which ioynie to the riuer of Adice. They also fortified Soane and Legnago, by which meane standing vpon their gard all the winter, they assured the whole countrey. And albeit, by the retiring of the Venetian regiments, the daunger of Ferrara was somewhat diminished, yet, it was not altogether taken away, for that though they were acquitted of all feare to be forced, yet they were troubled with a suspicion lest the people for the great harmes they receiued would decline to an ytter weaknesse, or else fall into the last despaire: for, the souldiers of the nauie and their followers, ran vp every day euen to the gates of the towne, & other vessels of the Venetians which had on another side distressed the state of the Duke of Ferrara, had taken Comache, and putting diligence to their fortune, they were troublers of those places in many sortes of afflictions. About this time arriued the companies of the Pope & the French king, by whose comfort the Duke who being warned afore by the harmes receiued in the assault of the bastillion, was incamped in a strong place neare to Ferrara, began to make many incursions & proffers, to draw the enemies to battell, who hoping that their army would returne, refused to fight before. And as there can be no action of war without his proper fortune & calamitie: so, in these entercourses of sallies and skirmishes, it hapned one day the Cardinall of Este hauing runne vp neare to the bastillion, as he returned backe, a shot came out of one of the vessels of the enemies, which caried away the head of the Count Lo- domike

domike de la Mirandola, one of the Captaines of the Church, none other in so great a multitude being hurt either with that or any other shot. At last the knowledge and experience of the country, ioyned to the nature and oportunitie of the riuer, made easie that which in the beginning had seemed so hard and dangerous: for, the Duke and Cardinall, hoping to be able to defeat the nauie with the artillerie, if they had meane to make it descend in suretie vpon the banke of the riuer, the Cardinall returned to charge the bastillion with one part of the bandes, wherein his fortune was so equall with his valour, that giuing the repulse to the enemy which were issued out to the skirmish, and making slaughter of some of them, he occupied and fortified that part that was next to the rising, and so without all priuitie and knowledge of the enemy, vpon the beginning of the night, he drew the artillerie to the banke side right ouer against them, and breaking it & planting it with a wonderfull silence, he began to execute vpon the enemies with a wonderfull furie: making terrible to them that aduantage which he had won of them by his industrie and valour. The vessels would haue sought safetie by flying, but because there was a long trayne and ranke of great artilleries, which managed by men experienced, beat a farre off, they chaunged rather the place of perill, then auoyded the daunger, hauing withall the presence and labour of the Dukes person, who knew both how to force artilleries, and how to manage them: by the affliction of so many shots of artillerie, notwithstanding the enemies for their partes ceased not to shoot, but in wayne, for that they that played vpon the brinke were couered with the rising of the hill, their vessels fell into diuerse fortunes, and were consumed with sundry miserable aduentures: some of them that had no more abilitie to gouerne their ships & defend their bodies against the furie of the shot, yeelded themselues without respect of condition: some, whose destiny was driuen with a more violence, were miserably burnt with the men that were in them: and others, gouerned by desperate resolution, gaue themselues a pray to the bottom of the waters, for that they would not fall into the mercy of the enemy: and the Captaine, leaping into a little skiff almost in the beginning of the skirmish, found safetie by the swiftnesse of his oares, his gallye being galled through both sides, was sonke after he had fled about three myles vsing continuall defence against the aduersitie of his fortune. In this discomfiture, all things being full of bloud, full of fire, & dead bodies, the calamitie of the enemy brought to the power of the Duke, fiftene gallyes, certaine great ships, many foystes, with infinite small vessels. There dyed about two thousand bodies, some by shot, some by fire, & some by water: threescore ensignes were taken, but not the principall standard, which was saued with the General. And as in a general calamitie every one hath his fortune, so, many winning shoare & land, were gathered vp by the Venetian light horsemen, in whose valour they found safetie for their liues: others that could not auoyd the persecution of the enemy, fell into the aduerture of imprisonment, & others in flying, hapned into many harmes by the payfants, & escaping from the daunger they feared most, they were driuen into perils which they doubted least. The prise of the vessels was caried to Ferrara, where, in memory of so great a victory, they were kept many yeares, vntil Duke Alphonso made restitution, hauing desire to gratifie the Venetians, immediatly after the ouerthrow of this nauie. Duke Alphonso dispatched with expedition three hundred horsemen and five hundred footemen to defeat the other army that had taken Comachio, who recouering Loretto which the Venetians had fortified, it was thought they had broken the whole army, if, seeing into their daunger, it had not retired to Beb. finding more suretie to auoyd the perill, then to hope in fortune. This was the end of the siege of Ferrara, which continued about a moneth, the euent and issue whereof (which ordinarily is the true touchstone by the which men may iudge of worldly things) did well declare how much wiser were the counsels of a few, who perswaded that leauing all other enterprises, and reseruing their treasures to be employed in actions more conuenient and profitable, they should onely looke to the preservation of Padoa, Trenisa, with other places recouered, then of such, who though more in numbers yet inferiour in discretion, replenished with passions of hate and disdain, were easie to be intangled with those enterprises, who as their beginning was bred in rashnesse, so their conclusion brought forth at last incredible expences, with no lesse infamies and harmes to the common weale: such commonly are the fruites that follow enterprises begun with light counsels, being gouerned by a fortune equall to the condition and nature of the action.

But on Padoa side, matters succeeded rather to the furtherance of the Venetians then others: for, notwithstanding Caesar kept vpon the countrey of Vincenza with foure thousand footmen, yet one part of the regiment of the Venetians, (& that neither strong nor great) bying with the ayde of the paynants of that quarter,ooke almost before his eyes, the passage of Escale, Cogelo and Basciana, a place of so much more importance, by how much it is conuenient to hinder the descending of the Almaines into Italie. And as himselfe, complaining much that for the departure of Monsieur la Palisse many disorders were hapned, went at last to Bolsane to assist the dyet which by his ordinance was to be kept at Yspruch: So according to his example, Monsieur Chaumont left there all his thoughts and great desires to performe the enterprise of Vincenza and Legnagne: and ioyning to this disposition to depart, these reasons and considerations that both those places were well manned and fortified, & also the season of the time very contrary, he retired to Millan, leauing good garrison within Bresse, Pesquero, and Valegge: and within Verona, for that Caesar of his singular forces was not able to defend it, he bestowed fixe hundred Launces and foure thousand footmen, who being separate from the souldiers of Caesar, were lodged in the suburbs of S. Zena, hauing yet in their power the Citadell for their greater suretie.

Description of Verona.

The Citie of Verona of great name and antiquitie is deuided by the riuer of Adice, a riuer both large and deepe comming from the mountaines of Almanie, and as it falls into the plaine, it goeth crooking on the left hand touching vpon the foote of the mountaines, and so entrench into Verona, and when it issueth out, he runneth from the mountaines and spreadeth into a goodly playne and very fertill. That part of Verona which hath his situation vpon the coast and somewhat into the plaine, is beyond Adice towards Almanie: the other part which is on this side Adice, and all in a goodly plaine, hath Mantua for his prospect: vpon the mountaine neare S. Georges gate, standeth the Castell of S. Peter, and within two bowes shooting from thence drawing against the hill, is the Castell of S. Felix, the one standing vpon the very top of the hill, and they both no lesse strong by situation then by wals: and yet to loose them for that by the aduantage of their situation, they commaund the Citie, were to put Verona in manifest daunger: these Castels were kept by the Launceknights: But in the other part which is separate from this by the riuer, is the old Castell looking towards Pesgara, and hath his situation almost in the midst of the Citie, going through the riuer with a bridge: not three bow shootings off, drawing towards Vincenza, standes the Citadell, and betweene them both, the wals of the Citie ioyne without, in forme of halfe a circle: but within, is a wall going from the one to the other, which is in the midst of two great ditches, the space betweene both the wals being called the suburbs of S. Zene, which, with the gard of the Citadell was appointed for the lodging of the French. Whilest armes were there as it were in rest, Maximilia solicited continually to make truce with the Venetians, the Pope also interposing very diligently by the working of Achilles de Grassi Bishop of Pesero, & his Nuncio: and to this end his Embassadours went to the hospitall which is about Escale, to negotiate with Iohn Cornuaro and Louis Monseigno Deputies for the Venetians. But as all matters of state haue their proper difficulties and impediments, so, in this action the demaundes of Caesar were so excessive, that this conference tooke no effect, to the great discontentment of the Pope, who wished that the Venetians were deliuered of all trouble, and with whom he had wrought so much, to the end there should be no matter of question to render to the Duke of Ferrara the towne of Comacho which they had burned before: withall they had promised him to vexe no more the estate of the Duke of Ferrara, to whom he gaue great fauour and support, both to make him beholding to him, for that he had obtained and was to obtaine by his meane; and also he had hope that for these respectes he would depend more vpon him then of the French king: against whom, being in continuall study to lay foundations of right great importance, he had secretly dispatched a messenger to the king of England, and begun to worke the Swissers at that time inclining to some quarell with the French king. To this action and for this reason came to him the Bishop of Sion (whom the Latins call Sedunensis) enemy to the French king, and vnder that colour pretending to be Cardinall, and for that respect was receiued of him with great ioy.

The Emperour
and the king Catholike fall to accord touching the gouernement of Castill.

About the end of this yeare, were accorded the king of the Romains and king Catholike, betweene who was some difference touching the gouernment of the Realmes of Castill: This contro- uersie was long debated in the Court of France, & albeit it suffered many great perplexities, & difficulties yet in the end it was guided to perfection by the meane & vndiscreete counsell of the Cardinall of Amboise, who not considering how much this vnion was hurtfull to the affaires of his king, was caried perhaps by this ambition, that if by his working there might be stabilitie & agreement betweene betweene them, it would be a degree to lift him to the Popedom, being in this, a dangerous counsellour to respect more his proper interests then the safetie of his countrey: Such then was the power of his diligence and authoritie, that he induced Maximilian to consent that the king Catholike, in case he had no issue males, should be gouernour ouer those Realmes vntill their little sonne Charles were come to the age of maioritie, to whom should be no power to take vpon him the title of king during the life of his mother, bearing the prerogatiue and iurisdiction of Queene, for that in Castillo the issue males exclude not the generall issue: That the king Catholike should pay to Cesar fiftie thousand duckets: That he should ayde him according to the treatie of Cambray, vntill he had recouered all that appertained to him: And lastly to pay to Charles euery yeare fortie thousand duckets. By this conuention, the king of Aragon was confirmed gouernour ouer the Realme of Castillo, and standing now in state to haue faith and credit with Cesar, since both the controuerfies were determined, and they both had equall interests touching their nephew: he might now more boldly looke into the meanes by the which he might hinder the greatnesse of the French king, which he held alwayes suspected for the regard of the kingdome of Naples. About this time also, the Pope entred into suspicion, that the Pronotarie Benuolo remaining at Cremona, laboured secretly to returne into Bologna, against which accident, he caused to be retained in the pallace of Bologna for certaine dayes, Iulian de Medicis: and attributing all things to the ill disposition of the French king, he made knowne the feare he had that he would passe into Italie to subdue it, and make Pope by violence the Cardinall of Amboise: and yet at the same time, he spake without any regard in derogation of the honour of Cesar, as of a person incapable of such a dignity, and by his incapacitie had brought the name of the Empire into great contempt. About the end of this yeare, dyed the Count Pessilano, Generall ouer the Venetian armies, a man for his age and graue experience in actions of war, of great name and worthinesse, and with the Venetians, of that credit and trust, that they neuer feared he would put their state in daunger, by rashnesse or want of counsell.

Death of the
lano.

The yeare after which was 1510. the same doubts and suspicions continuing, warres began to stirre on all partes but coldly and according to the season: for the Venetian armie lying encamped at S. Bonifacio vpon the countrey of Verona, held Verona as it were besieged: from whence Charles Baillon, Federike de Bossola and Sacromoro Viscount, comming to their succours, were charged by the stradiots, who ouerthrew them, and taking prisoners Charles and Sacromoro. Federike found safetie in the rescue of the French, which issued out of Verona for their succours. Another time they brake another band of French horsemen, amongst whom Monsieur de Glessy was taken prisoner: on the other side (fortune can both smile and laugh) two hundred French Launces issuing out of Verona with three thousand footemen, forced by assault a bastillion towards Soano, which was garded by a band of sixe hundred footemen, & in their returne, they querthrew a great multitude of paylants. But whilest the warre was occupied with these cold proceedings the minds of Princes were in great paine and care, but specially Cesar had his perplexities, who doubting how he might cary the victorie of the warre against the Venetians, and posting ouer (according to his custome) his affaires from one dyotte to another, had caused to be published the dyot at Auspurge, and being kindled against the Pope, for that the Electours of the Empire pushed on by his authoritie, made instance to negotiate in the dyot rather for peace with the Venetians, then for prouisions for the warre, he had caused to depart from Auspurge the Bishop of Pefero his Nuncio: he considered also that the deliberations of dyots were vncertaine, tedious, and full of difficulties, the end of one breeding the beginning of another: he saw withall, that the French king excused himselfe daily of the demaundes and enterprises that were tendred to him, sometimes alleaging the sharpnesse of the season, sometimes requiring assignation certaine of the expences which were to be made, & eftsoones protesting that by the treatie of Cambray, he was not bound to ayde him alone but ioyntly with the Pope and king of Aragon, with whom it was reasonable that the proceedings were mutuall and common, as the confederation and bond were ioynt and generall: for these reasons, he entred into resolution, that there was no remedie more ready for his affaires, then to induce the French king to embrace the enterprise to take Padoa, Vincenza, and Treuisa, employing his forces, & taking sufficient recompence. This demaund was well liked by many of the kings Counsell, who considering that till the Venetians were wholly chased out of the firme land, the king should dwell in continuall expences and daungers, perswaded his Maiestie vpon those reasons, to deliuer himselfe of them at one blow, and in one action making but one expence. The Kings minde was not altogether estraunged from his counsell, being caried haply with the same reasons, and therefore albeit he inclined to goe in person into Italie with a mighty armie, which he called mightie and puissant as often as he had in the same more then a thousand fixe hundred Launces, with his Gentlemen and Pensioners: yet, harkening to other counsels by the consideration of other reasons, he stood suspended in minde, expressing a confusion more then he was wont, for that the Cardinall Amboise, a man of great authoritie and stomacke, afflicted with a long and grieuous maladie, forbore to manage his affaires which were wont to be dispatched wholly by his direction. The king besides that of his naturall disposition, he loued not much matters of expences, was retained also by a desire he had to Verona, for the accomplishing whereof it seemed to him a good meane to haue the king of Romains intangled with continuall warres, for which regard he had newly lent to him eightene thousand duckets to pay the Launceknights that lay in garrison in the Citie, and was bound to make it vp a further summe of fiftie thousand, with condition that he should not onely hold the Citadell for his securitie and pawne, but also the old Castell should be set ouer to him, together with the next gate of the towne, the better to haue free entry and issue. And lastly, for want of restoring the money within one yeare, the towne of Vallego should remaine to him in perpetuall gouernement, with power to fortifie as well the towne as the Citadell at the charges of Cesar. These considerations drew the Kings mind into no small perplexities, but much more was he troubled with feare, least the Popes intentions would wholly varie and alter, if he should either leade or send into Italie a new armie: for, the Pope, no lesse full of suspicion, then also ill contented that he should impatronise vpon Verona, besides that he still kept a will entertained to absolue the Venetians, did also all that he could to ioyné himselfe with the Swissers: for confirmation of which disposition, he had sent backe againe into that countrey, the Bishop of Sion, with money to distribute amongst them, and promise to indue himselfe with the holy cap: he sought also with all his diligence, by what meanes he might estraunge the King of England from the amitie of the French King, whom albeit his father at the instant of death had aduised, for his securitie and benefite; to continue in assured league with him, and for that respect was yearely payed to him fiftie thousand duckets: yet, being caried ouer with hot humours of youth, and the great abilitie of treasure that his father had left him, it seemed he had no lesse in consideration the counsels of those, who for the desire of new things ioyried to an auncient hatred which the English do ordinarily beare to the French nation, made perswasions to him for the warre, then the wisdome and discreet example of his father, who refusing all contentions with the French, had gouerned his kingdome in great obedience and tranquillitie, notwithstanding he had aspired to a state new and full of troubles. All these considerations vexing not a little the minde of the French King, who, the better to deuise for the affaires of Italie, was now gone to Lyon: he feared least his marching into Italie, which the Pope detested openly, would stirre vp some new innouations by his meanes: besides, he saw that the King of Aragon dissuaded him from it, but vnder demonstrations of a friend and an indifferent louer of the common tranquillitie: in so much as amid those multitudes of doubtles which trauelled him on all partes, he saw no more certaine nor present counsell, then with great labour & diligence, to studie so to appease the mind of the Pope, that at the least he might stand assured that he were not his enemy & against him. Wherein it seemed that occasiō fauoured him greatly, for that it was beleued, that by the death of the Cardinall Amboise, who was extreamely sicke, he should be eased of those suspicions, from whence it was supposed his ill contentments did principally proceede. And for that the king was aduertised by good intelligence, that the Cardinall of Auchx, Nephew to the Cardinall Amboise, with others that managed his affaires in the Court of Rome, had with great rashnesse both in deede and wordes laboured more to quicken and kindle, then to appease and mollifie the Popes minde: he would no more vse their seruice in those actions, but sent to Rome in post the Lord Albert Pie Count de Carpie, a personage in whom was indifferent the greatnesse of his minde and expedition of his wit: he caried verie large commissions not onely to offer to the Pope the kings forces and authority to serue his turne in all accidents, and vpon all occasions, but also in inclining as much as he could to his will and nature, he was to communicate with him frankly and simply the state of all things that were practised, together with the requestes that Cesar made to him, & finally to referre to his arbitration and will whether he should passe passe into Italie or not, and whether he should minister to the Emperour speedily or slowly: he had also in charge to dissuade the absolution of the Venetians, but before he arrived, it was resolved and promised by the Pope: the Venetians after long dispute and abode of their Embassadors there, consenting at last to the conditions whereupon the difficulties stood, not finding any other remedie for their safetie, then to be ioyned with him. The conditions for the which the absolution was to be giuen, were openly published in the consistorie the xxiii. of February, in presence of the Venetian Embassadors, who confirmed them by writing according to the authentike direction from their common weale: These were the particulars: That they should not in any sort dispose the benefices or dignities of the Church: and that they should make no resistance or difficultie touching the fruites and prouisions deriuing of them to the Court of Rome: That they should not gainesay that in that Court should not be prosecuted the causes for benefices with others appertaining to the Ecclesiastike iurisdiction: That they should not charge the goods of the Church, & exempt places of their temporall dominion, with tenthes or any other sortes of imposition: That they should renounce from the appellation against the admonition, and from all interestes and rights gotten vpon the Church lands in what sort soeuer, but specially from all those prerogatiues and rights by the which they pretended to hold the office of Vicedomino in Ferrara: That the subiectes of the Church and their vessels may freely traffike through their gulse, and that with such ample facultie, that the marchandise of other nations brought in their bottoms, should not be troubled nor subiect to pay tolls: That it should not be lawfull for them in any sort to medle with Ferrara, or any townes of that state which were dependant on the Church: That all couenants and contractes which they had made to the preiudice of the Church, with any the subiectes or vassals of the same, should be cancelled and made voyde: That they should not receiue any Duke, Baron, or other subiect or vassall of the Church, that should be an enemy or rebell to the sea Apostolike: That they should be bound to make restitution of all the moneys which they had exacted vpon the reuenues of the Church, together with reparation of all the harmes which the Church had suffered.

These obligations with the promises and sufficient renuncements, being receiued in the consistorie, the Venetian Embassadors at a day appointed according to the auncient examples of times, were brought vnder the portall of the great Church of S. Peter, where falling at the Popes feet, being set in his pontificall seate neare the brazen gates, and honoured with the assistants of all the Cardinals & Colledge of Prelats, they asked him pardon in great humilitie, confessing their contumacie and faults past: After this, according to the custome of the Church, were pronounced certaine prayers, & so proceeding to all the other degrees of ceremonies, the Pope receiuing them into grace, gaue them absolution, & enioyned them for penance to go visite the seuen Churches. The Venetians absolved. After the action of absolution was done, they entred into S. Peters Church, being guided by the great Penitencier: and after they had heard Masse which was denied to them before, they were very honorably accompanied to their houses by many Prelates and Courtiers, not as persons excommunicated and interdicted, but as reconciled Christians and deuout children to the sea Apostolike. Soone after they returned to Venice, more loaden with the ceremonies, then made blessed with the vertue of their absolution, leauing behind them at Rome, Hieronimo Donato one of their number, and who by his vertues and singular facilitie of wit and learning, becoming very agreeable to the Pope, did afterwards great seruice to his countrey in things which he negotiated with him.

THE NINTH BOOKE OF THE historic and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT.

Pope Iulio the second turneth against the French men. The French king and king of Romaines enter league against the Venetians, who besiege Verona. The Pope taketh Mirandola, and makes warre vpon the Duke of Ferrara. The families of Bentiuole returne to Bologna. A Countsell is published at Pisa against the Pope.

“ He mindes of men of their proper inclination are mutable, bearing no “ small subiection to passions of enuie, ambition, and glorie: and to great “ Princes aspiring to high actions; by so much lesse tollerable is the stroke “ of reuolution & chaunge, by how much more the occasions are wrought “ directly contrary to their expectations, and do conclude preiudicially a“ gainst their proper imperie and greatnesse. For, as this absolution which “ the Pope gaue to the Venetians, brought no little griefe to the minde of “ Maximilian, being so much the more vexed; by how much the action was accomplished with a will resolute, and touched him more particularly and principally then all the residue: so also the French king, hauing no lesse interest in the harmes that might happen, did equally communicate in the perplexities of this alteration, for that he desired for his priuate profit that the greatnesse of the Venetians should not be eftsouones reestablished: neuerthelesse he could not finde out what were the intentions and last endes of the Pope: and therefore feeding himselfe with vaine hopes concerning the difficulties of the affaires that were prepared against him, he perswaded himselfe that the Pope stirred onely for suspition of his vnitng with Maximilian, & that temporising with him: and giuing him no occasion of greater feare, he woud passe no further, but rest satisfied with the absolution he had giuen: a perswasion much abusing the kings affaires, & no lesse farre from the resolution of the Pope, who growing more & more confirmed in his deliberation, and little respecting the declarations and impediments of the confederate Embassadors, suffered the subiectes and dependants of the Church to enter into the pay of the Venetians, who receiuied into intertainemēt Iohn Paul Bailon as Generall of their whole companies, standing without a gouernour by the death of the Count Petillano: they tooke also into their wages Iohn Louis and Iohn Vitelli, sonnes to the late Iohn and Camilla, and made Ranso de Cere Colonell of their footemen, (holding it a iustice as reasonable to fauour them with this libertie for their temporall ayde, as to acquite them of the paynes of the Church, both the one and other respecting one meaning and matter.) And as in this action he made open declaration that he tooke the Venetians into his protection, so he laboured also to bring them to agreement with Cesar, hoping vnder that meane not onely to seperate him from the French king, but withall to knit him with himselfe: and with the Venetians to make warre vpon him: wherein, for the more easie succeeding of this deuise, taking his oportunitie vpon the necessities of Cesar, he interposed his authoritie to the electours of the Empire and the free townes, to the end that in the dyot of August there should be no consent of contribution. But the more he aduanced and vrged this practise, the more he found it of hard operation, for that on the one side, Cesar would not harken to any motion of agreement, vñlesse Verona might remaine to him: and on the other side, the Venetians (in whom the Pope had hope of a greater facilitie) perswading themselues to be able to defend Padoa in all fortunes, and that keeping that Citie, time would fauour them with more occasions, demaunded resolutely the “ restitution of Verona, offering to pay in recompence a huge summe of money. To a minde dispo-
 fully

fully doth abound the humour of ambition, by so much lesse is limited the desire of oppression, which in mindes corruptly inclined, holds nothing lawfull that may serue to the action pretended, nor any thing vnreasonable that agreeth with the humour of their passion, in whom this is one naturall custome, to conuert all things to his owne proprietie and working. The Pope omitting neither meane nor matter that might giue furtheraunce to his purpose, made secret solicitation to Henrie the eight then king of England, to raise warre against the French king, wherein enforcing the memorie of the auncient emulations of those two kingdomes, he ioyned to the facilitie of the enterprise, this occasion of the felicitie and successe: that if he would begin to leaue armes against Fraunce, the action would take imitation in many others, to whom the puissance and greatnesse of that crowne was either suspected or hated; he forgot not to encourage him to embrace with that deuotion which in other times had bene proper to the kings of England, the glory that was offered him to be protectour and preseruer of the sea Apostolike, which, without the aide of his authoritie and rescue, stood in manifest daunger by the ambition of the French king. In this practise the king of Aragon did communicate with the Pope, but secretly & not really, vñing perhaps this moderation of mind, not to suffer his desires to be greater thē his fortunes. But that which was of greatest importance, the Pope entertained still with the Swissers the negociations which were begun by the Bishop of Syon, by whose authoritie (being great with that nation) & perpetuall importunitie labouring their assemblies, and counsels & preaching in their Churches: he obtained at last that the Swissers, receiuing euery yeare a thousand Florins of Rhein for euery Canton, should be bound to the protection of him & the estate of the Church, with permissiō to the Pope for his defence against all men that would vex him, to leaue certaine proportions of footemen. The occasion that most helped forward this matter, and made his request more easie and plausible, was the disagreement that began to kindle betweene them and the French king: for the Swissers being of nature proud and weening, became more raised and lifted vp in minde by the estimation that others had of them, and challenging to themselves peculiarly the glory of the French victories, were caried into this presuming, that all the conquestes and honorable actions which either the king reigning, or his predecessour had obtained in Italie, proceeded principally of their valour and the feare of their armes: and thereupon insisting vpon merites, as though the crowne of Fraunce ought much to them, they demaunded (the French king soliciting to make renouation of the alliance that now was determined) that he would augment their pensions, being then three-score thousand frankes by yeare, ouer and aboue the merconarie contributions which were secretly dispersed amongst priuat persons; pensions which had bene begun vnder Lowis the eleuenth, & continued vnto the present time. But for that they accompanied their demaunds with a presumptuous audacity which the king construed to manifest insolencie, & for that of peasants & mountaine men (such was his phraze) they sought imperiously to impose & taxe him being a king, he began so to shake them off with wordes and countenances, that they might discerne how much he disdaind them, more respecting his dignitie royall, then regarding the present vtilitie of things. He was the more induced to this, for that at the same season by the solicitation of George Sopressan, the peoples of the valleys subiectes of Syon, who were gouerned in seuen communities which they call Courts, being corrupted by publike promises and priuat pensions, were not onely confederat with him, but also bound to giue passage to his people, and refuse it to his enemies, and withall to enter into his payes with such numbers of footemen as their forces were able to beare. In the same sort did enter confederacie with him, the Lordes of the three leagues, whom they call the Grisons: and albeit one part of the men of the valley had not yet approued it, the king was not without hope to induce them to ratification by the selfe same meanes: in so much as he began to perswade himselfe that the amitie of the Swissers was now no more necessarie to him, hauing determination to supply his warres with Almain footemen, ouer and besides those proportions of souldiers which the valley-men & Grisons should furnish him of. Besides, he feared little their stirres or preparations, & lesse expectatiō that they were able to assaile the Duchie of Millan but by the straits of Ballinsona, and other passages of great difficultie: through the which, if they should march in great troupes and numbers, he made his reckning that they would be easily reduced into necessitie of victuals by a small armie: and if they came but in small companies, a slender strength would likewise suffice to make them retire. Wherein he made his coniectures at random, and seemed to limit the fortunes of the whose forces yet he knew not, flattering himself with his proper greatnes: an humour, preiudicially mouing in Princes, in whom there ought to be no partialitie of comparifon, when there is question of enterprise and action: because he stood refolute not to graunt them augmentation of penfions, he could not obtaine in their counfels a renouation of the alliance, notwithstanding there were many men in the middest of them, who did earnestly perfwade it, to whom in particular were retributed no small rewards: and for that cause they consented more easly to the confederation which was demanded of them by the Pope. By which new confederation the Pope seeming to haue layed a great foundation for the aduancing of his purposes: and hauing a perpetuall nature to proceede in all things as supreme & foueraigne aboue all men, and as though the whole world were in necessitie to receiue lawes of him, he began to sow feedes of new controuerfies with the Duke of Ferrara, either pushed on by the cause that was in difputation betweene them, or else by an auncient hatred, for that hauing receiued of him so many honors, benefites, and gratifications, he seemed neuerthelesse to depend more vpon the French king then vpon him: a dealing which he construed preiudicially and farre contrary to the recompence of his merites. But whatfoeuer was the cause, searching a beginning of the quarrell, he commaunded imperiously Alphonso Duke of Ferrara to forbear to continue the working of salt at Comacchio: he alleged that it was not reasonable that that which was not lawfull to him when the Venetians held Cerua, should now haue sufferance being possessed by the sea Apostolike, to whom appertained the absolute gouernement of Ferrara and Comacchio. Besides, it was a matter of great profite, for that the working ceassing at Comacchio, the saltpittes of Cerua ministred traffike to all the townes thereabouts. But Duke Alphonso, who reposed more in the coiunction which he had with the French king & in his protection, then he feared the Popes forces, gaue small obedience to this commaundement: he complained that he should be constrained not to reape the fruite which grew to him in his proper house with small labour, & to be driuen to buy of another for the vsage of his peoples, the ware whereof he had enough to replenish forreine countreys, alleaging withall, that that ought not to be enforced for an example, which the Venetians had made him consent vnto, more by compulsion of armes then by condition of iustice. Which reasons little auayed to content the Pope: who eftsoones sent to protest to him vnder great paines and accursings to discontinue that worke: such were the thoughtes and actions of the Pope, inclined altogether to raise vp and support the Venetians. But on the other side Cesar & the French king thirsted not a little after their embacement, with desire to diminish their authoritie & greatnesse. And much being discontented with the demonstrations which the Pope expressed on their behalfe, they drew into a more strayte alliance and intelligence one with another, concluding to inuade the Venetians that sommer with huge forces: for the better aduancing of which expedition, the contract bare, that the French king for his part should send Monsieur Chaumont with a strong army, whereunto should be ioyned the Launceknights that lay at Verona. And Cesar for his part, should make entry into the countrey of Friul with those leauies of men & munitions which he hoped to obtaine of the Empire in the dyet of Auspurge: and hauing accomplished that actiō, he was to proceede to other enterprises according to the estate of occasions and time. They solicited the Pope to ioyne with them according to the bonde of the league of Cambray, holding it but iust to summon him to performe that which he had so willingly promised: but he who was no lesse discontented with that motion, then hauing a capacite searching aboue the wit of other men, made answer that he was no more bound to that confederation which hath had already his perfection, seeing it had bin in the power of Cesar to haue first Trenis, and afterwarde a satisfaction & recompence in money. Cesar likewise solicited to haue succours from the king Catholike, both by vertue of the same capitulations of Cambray, and also vnder couenants and promises made particularly with him, at such time as he consented to him the gouernement of Castille: but this solicitation, as it bare a forme of request to ayde him rather with money, then with men, so the king of Aragon whom it imported much not to disfurnish himselfe of the thing whereof he had most neede, made answer that he would send him foure hundred Launces: A strength of little profite for Cesar, for that aswell in the French army, as in his owne campe, the seruice on horsebacke was plentifully furnished. About this time the Citie of Verona liued in great afflictions vnder the souldiers that garded it, who, for that they were not payed, drew into secret conspiracie with certaine Venetian bandes, by whom they thought to worke some trayterous stratageme: for which purpose the Venetians issuing out of S. Bomsace, approached the Citie by night to scale the Castell of S. Peter: and as they were entred S.

Georges gate, whilest they taried to fasten their ladders together (for that being single they sufficed not to reach to the highest of the wall) either they were heard by the warders of the Castell of S. Felix, or in their feare they seemed to heare a brute of armed men. And as in matter of enterprise imagination abuseth much, so whether they feared their owne shadows, or whether they doubted that to be indeede which was but a vision in their timorous fantasies, they suddenly retired, leauing behind them their ladders as testimonies of their feare and intention, leauing to the enemy to doubt much of their valour, that in so faire an oportunity forooke the felicitie that their fortune had prepared. The armie retired forthwith to S. Boniface, and at Verona the conspiracie comyng to detection, many were passed ouer to iustice and punishment, though some found fauour more by clemencie then their proper innocencie.

In this season the Pope expressed certaine inclinations to be eftsoones reunited with the French king, not of good will, but for feare: for that Maximilian summoned him with braue messages to lend him two hundred thousand duckets, threatning that otherwise he would ioyne with the French king against him: another reason of his feare was a brute that was spread, that in the Dyot of Auspurge it was agreed to minister to him a strong succour, and also the peace had bene newly established betweene the kings of England and France, and published with great solemnitie. By reason of these feares, he began to treat with great diligence with Albert de Carpie, whom till that day, he had intertained with wordes & hopes generall, vsing in all his actions of negociation more art then true meaning, and lesse fidelitie then faire resemblance. But besides the mutabilitie of his owne nature, the variation of occasiōs made him not dwell long in that resolutiō: both for that the Parliament of Auspurge (without the forces and aydes of which there was no great reckening to be made of the threates of Caesar) not answering expectation, determined for him no other succours, then a supply of three hundred thousand Florins of Rhein, whereof his prodigalities had already made great wastes: And also the king of England signified that he had set downe an article in the peace, expressing that it should be no peace as often as the French king should offend the state of the Church. In regard of these things, the Pope reentred into new stomacke, and returning eftsoones to his former thoughtes, he began to heape new complaints against the Duke of Ferrara, who, he sayd, that since it was suffered to the subiectes of the Church to sayle & traffike freely through the gulfes of Venice, had imposed new tributes vpon the goods which were brought to Venice by the riuier of Pau: A taxatiō which the Pope alleaged that the vassall could not leauy (according to the interpretation of the lawes) without licēce of the Lord paramount, & withall it was a thing that brought great preiudice to the people of Bologna, who were his subiectes: for which consideration he made instance that they might be deposed, threatning that otherwise he would bring warre vpon him. Wherein to giue him a greater feare, he caused to march his bandes of men of warre into the countrey of Bologna and into Romana. These things troubled not a little the minde of the French king being loath on the one side to fall at oddes with the Pope, and on the other side he felt himselfe touched in honour and conscience to leaue abandoned the Duke of Ferrara, to whose protection he had bound himselfe by receiuing thirty thousand duckets. No lesse was he moued with the regard of his proper profite, for that Duke Alphonso depending wholly vpon him, and fleeing so much the more to his deuotion, by how much he saw him persecuted by the Pope, he esteemed it his proper interest to preferue him, and for that cause he interposed his deputies with the Pope to sollicite some accord betweene them. But it seemed iust to the Pope that the king should withdraw himselfe from that protection, alleaging that he had taken it vpon him against the capitulations of Cambray, by the which (made yader colour to render to the Church that which was vsurped) it was forbidden that none of the confederates should take into protection any that was named by another, and that for his part, he had named the Duke of Ferrara: and moreouer it was defended that no one of them should haue any action with things appertaining to the Church. He alleaged that the like also was confirmed in the confederation made particularly betweene them at Biagrasso, wherein was exprefly prouided that the king should not take into his protection any estate depending of the Church, & should aswell refuse to take them hereafter, as also cancell and make voyde all protections which he had accepted heretofore. To which adiections notwithstanding it was answered for the king, that by the same conuention it was prouided, that the king should haue power to dispose of the Bishoprikes on this side the Mountes as he listed, which the Pope had violated in the first auoydance that fell; as likewise he had broken in fauour of the Venetians, the capitulations made at Cambray, by which euasions the king was at libertie not to obserue the thing he had promised: yet because he would not come to armes with the pope for the quarrel of the duke of Ferrara, he offered cōditions, by the which, not offending directly his honour, the Pope in a great part might rest satisfied touching the interests which the Church & he pretended against Duke Alphōse: & besides, he was cōtented to bind himselfe by promise (according to the Popes request) that the French armies should not passe the riuer of Paw, but for the protection of the Florentins whereunto he was bound, & to molest P. Petrusio Iohn & Paul Baillon, vnder colour of money promised by the one, and detained by the other.

Monsieur Chaumont against the Venetians.

Whilest these things were in action, Monsieur Chaumont aduanced with an army of fifteene hundred Launces, and ten thousand footmen of many nations, amongst whom were certaine regiments of Swissers priuately leauied, and not by permission of the Cantons, & followed with great proportions of artilleries, with certaine bridges prepared to passe riuers: hauing also ioyned with him the Duke of Ferrara with two thousand men at armes, fiue hundred light horsemen, and two thousand footmen. With these cōpanies he tooke in the meane while without any impedimēt, Po-lisena de Ronigno, a peece which the Venetians had abandoned; and taking also the tower Margusano standing vpon the riuer of Adice towards Padoa, he marched on to Castelbaldo, and had at the first summo the townes of Montagnano and Este, the one appertaining to Alphonso d'Este, by graunt from Maximilian, & the other giuen to him in gage. Alphonso after he had recouered these townes, sent backe his regimēts vnder colour to encounter certaine galleis of the Venetians, which floted vpon the riuer of Paw. By the imitation of Chaumont, the Prince of Hanaw Maximilians Lieutenaunt, marched in like sort out of Verona with three hundred French Launces, two hūdred men at armes, & three thousand Alman footmen, & ioyning with Chaumont, he followed him alwayes within one remoue of his campe. They left behind the Montselice holden for the Venetians, & marched towards the cōitrey of Vincenza, where Lonigna & the whole cōuntry yeelded without resistance: for that the Venetian army cōtaining fixe hundred men at armes, foure thousand light horsemē & stradiots, & eight thousand footmen vnder Iohn P. Baillon Generall, & Andrew Gritti treasurer, hauing first abandoned Swano, & alwayes retiring into places of suretie according as the enemy aduāced, & lastly hauing bestowed sufficiēt garrison within Trenisa, & a thousand footmē within Adestro, they were retired to the Brentelli, a place within three myles of Padoa, & of great suretie for their incamping, both for that the cōuntry is full of hils and risings, and the place it selfe standeth inuironed with the waters of these three riuers Brento, Brentello, & Bagnillon: Such is the frayltie of mans nature, that the suddennesse of perill is more terrible then the daunger it selfe: and by how much it happeneth to a multitude vngouerned, by so much it seemes more desperate, for that when their miudes are once possessed with feare, there is no place for confidence and resolution, and all hopes are turned into doubts, their extremitie making them timorous, which ought to make them resolute. The poore people of Vincenza, for that the armie was thus retired, finding the selues no lesse abandoned, then altogether vnable to defend their estate, and seeing that their fortune had left them no other hope the such as they might expect in the mercy of the victors, which they supposed they might more graciously obtaine by the meane and working of Monsieur Chaumont: they sent to him to demaunde safeconduit to adresse Embassadours to him and the Prince of Hanaw, which being graunted, they presented themselues in forme and aspect pitiful, and full of sorow and feare afore them, both being then at the bridge of Barberano ten myles from Vincenza. Their attire representing the lamentable conditio of their fortune, and their other dolefull circumstances, bearing a preface of sorow and languishing mindes, moued pitie in such as came prepared to spoyle them, and inclined to grace euen those that afore had determined their destruction. So effectually worketh the consideration of miserie in mindes tractable to compassion. The chiefe of the Embassage, being the mouth of the residue, was licensed to speake in this sort in the preface of all the Captaines and principals of the armie.

This Question may be asked in the consideration of our present condition, which is least hurtfull, either to be extreme miserable, without the threats and feare of fortune, or to be in full prosperitie which alwayes stands subiect to diminution and falling. And since there is a diuine power that hath bin appointed frō the beginning to guide all our mortall accidēt, me thinkes that that man erreth lesse who promisseth to himselfe a chaunge of the affaires of this world, then he that perswadeth that they are alwayes firme & stable: the same being a comfort to earthly men (if any thing could mode-moderate their frayle passions) not to hold those things grieuous which both can not be auoyded, and also are sent for our better reformation and necessarie correction. If it were knowne to any of this honorable presence (at whose feet I speake now much this Citie of Vincenza (heretofore enuied of her neighbours for her riches and felicitie) hath suffered, since more by error, and rashnesse of her inhabitants, and haply more by a certaine fatal disposition then through other occasion, she returned vnder the iurisdiction of the Venetians, together with the intollerable harmes and domages she hath receiued: we beleue (and your gracious aspectes assure no lesse) that in your harts will be greater the compassion of our miseries, then the hatred for the memorie of our rebellion, if rebellion may be imposed vpon the error of that night, wherein our people, drawne into vniuersall confusion, for that the armie of our enemy had forced the suburbs of Posello, not to rebell nor to flee from the easie gouernement of Cesar, but to deliuer our selues from the sadde and extreme afflictions of other Cities, did send our Embassadours to compounde with the enemy. To which action our multitudes and peoples not accustomed to armes, and lesse acquainted with the daungers of warre, were altogether pushed on by the authoritie of Fracasso, a Captaine, who experienced in so many seuerall warres, and appointed of Cesar, either by subtiltie or by feare (a matter not appertaining to vs to search) gaue vs counsell to sollicite an accord for the safetie of our wiues, our children, and our poore afflicted countrey: The same making it manifest that no ill impression of minde, but onely feare increased through the authoritie of such a Captaine, was the cause, not that we did determine by long counsell, but rather that in a very small computation of time, in so great a tumult, and in so fearefull a noyse of armes & artilleries thundring, whose terrour vanquished our resolution, we ranne rashly vnder the rule of the Venetians, the felicitie and power of whom were not such as we ought either to feare the one or affect the other. Our condition was not to expect or temporise, for that the enemy was incamped in the places which the strength which was left for our succours had newly abandoned: and as in communalities or multitudes the hope that is deferred maketh their harts to languish: so the long continuance of miseries sufficeth euen to shake the mindes of the most assured. Men not accustomed to aduersities, haue least rule ouer their passions, and such as neuer liued but in securitie, haue least temperance to beare a chaunge. Faultes done by necessitie bring with them their proper pardon. And as you are not now to doubt of the difference betweene faults committed by feare and error, and offences proceeding of fraude and ill intention: so neuerthelesse, though our fortune moue you to interpret our rebellion not to feare, but to will, and that so vile an action was begun by counsell and consent vniuersall, and not through confusion and vnbridled rashnesse of a few, whom neither counsell nor authoritie could repress, and be it lastly that the transgressions of this wretched Citie were altogether inexcusable: yet our calamities haue bene so great since that accursed reuolt, that we may truly say, that the punishment without all comparison hath bene greater then the fault: for within our wals, the garrison souldiers that were left for our safetie and comfort, turned themselues into the habit of aduersaries, doing all things to the aggrauation of our miseries, not sparing to spoyle those goods that were left vs for our reliefe and succour. And without, we haue not bene free from all those sortes of harmes which warre and hostilitie are wont to draw with them, our afflictions being so much the more grieuous and great, by how much the war hath bene continuall without intermission: we haue nothing remaining in this miserable countrey which carieth any memorie of the riches, delight, or felicitie thereof: All the houses of our possessions are burned, all our woods cut downe and wasted, all our fields and gardens defaced, and all our infinite herds of cattell driuen away and deuoured. This is the second yeare that we haue bene driuen to reape our hauest afore the time, that we haue had no securitie to sow our seedes, and lesse season to gather our fruites, yea the seueritie of the time hath left vs no hope, that this countrey so generally destroyed, can be euer readressed. Our miseries are come to these desperate termes & limites, that what with the needefull supportation of our liues, and to furnish the intollerable exactions which our necessities haue imposed vpon vs, all that remaineth either of our hidden treasure or common store, is farre insufficient to nourish the liues of our wiues, children, and our selues, to whom remaineth nothing but a miserable spectacle of the happinesse wherein we haue liued. If the present state of our countrey were now objected to any that had seene and knowne it before, and our calamities present measured with our felicities passed, I know it would stirre vp motions of pitie & compassion, euen in the mindes of enemies, considering specially that this Citie (albeit it hath small circuite) which was wont to be replenished with inhabitants, stately in maiestie and presence, rich through magnificence of buildings and pallaces, an assured and free retraite for all straungers, a Citie reioycing in friendships, societies, & gratulations, to be now made voyde of dwellers, poore in the presence and countenances of men and women, no place left for hospitalitie, no one man able to feede his familie for one moneth, and in place of stately feasts, meetings, and banquets, nothing left but penurie, desolation, & teare to shew friendship, men sighing in the sorowes of their wiues and children, whom they cannot comfort, and women wayling the seueritie of their common deslinie. And these calamities (oh gracious Prince of Hanaw) would be yet greater, if we cosidered not that on your vertuous will dependeth either the last desolation of our afflicted country, or the hope that once againe vnder the wings of Cesar, guided by your high wisdom and clemencie, we might lift vp our heades, not to be restored (for that agreeth not with our merite and fortune) but consuming our liues to the vttermost, to auoyd at least an extreame and last destruction: a grace which we so much the more expect and hope for, by how much your affabilitie & easinesse is knowne to vs, wherein we doubt not but you will resemble and imitate Cesar, with whose examples of clemencie all Europe is replenished. All our wealth is consumed, all our hopes determined, all our fortunes layd at your feete, there remaineth nothing else to vs but our liues and persons, against the which to vse crueltie, were neither profit to Cesar, nor prayse to you: for, as that benefite is vniust that is purchased with the hurt of another, so that glorie can not be without infamie, that is won with the punishment of men in miserie. Clemencie is as great a vertue as iustice, and nature hath sown in men aswell seeds of pitie & forgiuenesse, as of cruelty & reuenge, & hath enioyned Princes aboue all other creatures, to beare an infinite regard to the dignitie of ver-tue. We beseech you with teares, which it may please you to imagine to be mingled with the miserable complaints of euery sexe, of euery age, & of euery order that is within this city, to make the wretched & desolate state of Vincenza an example to all others of the clemencie of the Almain Empire: call to your honorable memories the pitie and magnanimitie of your renowned elders, who being victorious in Italie, preferued the Cities that were vnited & confederate, many of them chuf-sing those seats for their proper dwellings, & from thence, to the singular glory of the Almain race, are descended so many noble houses in Italie, as Gonsaguo, Catraro, & Escalo, who somtimes were our Lordes. Let Vincenza serue at one time for example, both that the Venetians ayded and supported by vs in our lesser daungers, haue cowardly and dishonorably left it abandoned in the greatest perils and necessitie of defence that euer could happen: & on the other side that the Al- maines, in whom was some reason to distresse vs, haue ioyned remission to our offences, and both frankly & gloriously preferued vs whom by due iustice they might haue put to punishment. The punishment of one only is not cruelty, but the calamities of many. That Prince that lookes strictly vpon the offences of his people, cannot be called mercifull, but rigorous: & hauing an example in the dealing of God with sinners, if he looke straitly vpon offendours, who can abide it? We ap-peale also to you oh inuincible Lord Chaumont, to take vs into your protection: looke backe to the example of your king, whose clemencie was greater to them of Millan and Genoway, drawne into reuolt without necessitie, then was their fault which was both voluntarie and vaine: but after they had found his clemencie greater then their transgression, & that his pardon preuailing aboue their offences, he had reclaimed them by so great a benefite as to giue them life, he could neuer after finde any fault in their fidelitie and seruice. Seueritie keepes men in obedience, but it is by compulsion, which is seruite: but clemencie winneth the heart & affection, which confirmeth the sure-tie of the Prince. Oh Prince of Hanaw, if the preferuation of Vincenza turne nothing to the profit of Cesar, at the least it will bring him glory, remaining as a perpetuall example of his benignitie. If he destroy it, it can serue him to no vse, and the seueritie which he vseth to vs will be grie-uous to all Italie. Clemencie will make acceptable to all men the name of Cesar, and as in actions of warre and managing of an armie, he is knowne to haue great affinitie with the auncient Cesar, so in being easie to pardon where he hath power to punish, his clemencie will make him equall with Cesar in all those vertues, which haue made his name perpetuall to all posterities. Vincenza that flourishing and auncient Citie, and heretofore the seate of nobilitie, lyeth now prostrate at your feete: she expecteth from you either her preferuation or destruction, her life or death: take pitie of so many innocent persons, so many vnfortunate women, and so many guiltlesse children, who in that lamentable night full of follie and error, medled with nothing, and now with plaints

and waylings expect your deliberation. To pardon many for the offence of one, is the office of a pitifull Prince, but to punish many for the fault of one, can not but hold of tyrannie. Consider that what is done by force and necessitie, brings with it a sufficient reason of excuse. In which regard we kisse your knees, & as well with the repentance of the offendours, as with the innocencie of the guiltlesse, & lastly with the humilitie and submission of this whole afflicted state, we beseech you pronounce at last that reuiuing voyce of mercie and clemencie, through the which our wretched Citie comming to receiue a new life, shall call you alwayes her right worthy preseruer & patron.

Such is the obstinacie of a minde once iustly iniured, that neither the pitifull phrase of this Oration, nor the sorowful aspect of the speaker lying prostrate at his feete, and much lesse the compassion of so wretched a citie, could moderate the mind of the Prince of Hanaw, whose felicitie making him insolent, and his authoritie cruell, he could not so much commaund ouer his passions, as to make his wordes lesse cruell then his deedes, making by the mouth of a Doctor this rigorous and vncomfortable answer.

Thinke not that either the power of your perswasions, or other respect of your dissembled sorowes, can suffice to wipe out of memorie the faults you haue committed against the maiestie of the name of Cesar, without any regard to his greatnesse or dignitie, and lesse respect to the honor wherein you were receiued by him: you haue by common counsell and consent of the whole Citie, called into your towne the Venetian armie, who forcing the suburbs with great difficultie, distrusted to take it, and began to go away: you called them in against the will of the Prince that represented the person of Cesar: you constrained that Prince to retire into the Castell, and in the furie of your rebellion haue sacked the artilleries & munitions of Cesar: you haue torne in peeces his pauillions displayed in honour of his victories in so many warres and triumphes. These insolencies were not done by the souldiers of the Venetians, but the people of Vincenza haue defiled their loyalty, discouering their violent thirst after the blood of the Almaines: it was not long of you that the Venetian armie tooke not Verona, which they had done, if knowing the occasion, they had followed the victorie: this happened not by the counsell or perswasion of Fracasso, who abused by your flanders, hath expressed clearly his innocencie: it was an effect of your wicked mindes, it moued by a poysoned impression of hatred, which without cause you beare to the Almain name: your offences are so haynous, as there is no place left for pardō or merite: the despite of the iniurie you haue done, maketh double the desire of reuēge: it was not your errors that made you offend, but your wicked inclinations: and therefore to vse clemencie to you, would be both hurtfull & infamous, for that you would returne to your vomite vpon euery occasion: and the harmes you haue receiued, haue not bin for a punishment & scourge of your faults, but for that you would obstinately perseuer in rebellion. And now that the Venetians haue abandoned you, you haue no other remedie to defend you, but to implore the pitie of Cesar, whom you haue betrayed. The Prince was determined not to heare you, following the intention and commission of Cesar, and yet he hath not denied you audience, satisfying the will of the Lord Chaumont: but he will not change the sentence, which since the first day of your rebellion hath remained fixed in the minde of Cesar: he will not receiue you otherwise, then to discretion for your goods, your honours, and your liues: and hope not that he will do that to shew you the more clemencie, but the better to make you serue for example of punishment to such as accursedly breake their faith to their soueraigne Prince.

The seueritie of this answer did not a little amaze the aggriued people of Vincenza, who seeing to suffer a generall priuation of all sence and feeling, began eftsoones with a new estate of feares and sorow, to recommend them to the mercy of him in whom they discerned nothing more ready then a disposition to reuēge: but being repulsed by the same Doctor, rebuking them with wordes more bitter and fierce then the first, they stood more desperate then before, expressing by their lookes which they cast vpon Monsieur Chaumont, how much they hoped in him, and how grieuously wrought in them the sharpe answers of the Doctor: Chaumont encouraged them to obey necessitie, and in giuing themselues wholly vp to the will of the Prince, to seeke to appease his wrath: he comforted them in the singular humanitie and curtesie of Cesar, in whom being a Prince of so noble race, and an excellent Captaine, was not to be expected that he would do a thing vnworthy of his name and vertue: he willed them not to be amased with the seuerie answer that was made, but sayd it serued better for their turne that noble and free mindes

should sometimes burst out sharpe and biting wordes; for that deliuering by that meane some part of their anger, the rigour of their doings was thereby somewhat the more abated; he offered to do all that he could to moderate the minde of the Prince, so farre forth as they would preuent the worst by humbling themselves simply to his discretion: by whose counsell and consideration of their owne necessitie, the poore afflicted Vincensins falling estoones prostrate on the ground, referred absolutely both their honours, liues, and Citie to the power of him, in whom they could yet discern no hope of mercy. Then Monsieur Chaumont began to sollicite for them, declaring to the Prince, that in chastising them he was to respect more the greatnesse and glory of Cesar, then the qualitie of their offence: That he should not set downe such an example to others that were to fall into the like faults, least despairing to obtaine mercy, they would become obstinate to the extremitie: That clemencie had alwayes brought forth to Princes good will, suretie and reputation, where crueltie was the cause of disobedience, distrust, and conspiracie, not taking away (as many vndiscretly beleue) impediments and difficulties, but rather serued as working instruments to redouble them and make them greater. Lastly he told him that it was worthy the vertue of a noble Prince, to forbear to strike when he had power to do it, and not by correction to increase the affliction of such as are sufficiently punished with the remorse of their proper transgressions: his authoritie accompanied with the petition of many others, together with the miserable waylings of the Vincensins, ranged the Prince at last to this moderation, to promise them safetie of life, the disposition of all their goods remaining wholly at his will: a booteie greater in opinion then in effect, for that the Citie was left almost no lesse desolate of men then of goods. The Almaines in this license of warre searching after pray and spoyle, vnderstood that many of the towne and countrey were withdrawne with their goods into two caues in a certaine mountaine neare to Vincensa called the gutter of Masano, where by the strength of the place, and difficultie to enter, they supposed to find securitie, or at least to be free fro the furie of the souldiers. Thither went many troupes of the Almaines to make pillage of the Caues, & being not able after long triall and many harmes, to force such as were within the great Caue, they went to the lesser, where making a vaine experience of their strength, they vsed at last the meane of fires; and by the benefite of the smoake carried it, with the losse of more then a thousand persons: Such are the insolencies of souldiers, when is no authoritie to bridle their furie, and libertie hath law to ouercome discipline.

Vincensa being taken in this maner, greater difficulties appeared in other things, carying more respect and importance then was expected in the beginning: for, not onely Maximilian did not stirre against the Venetians as he had promised, but also the regimets which he had in Italy diminished continually for want of pay: in so much as Monsieur Chaumont was constrained, to stay himselfe vpon the garding of Vincensa, much lesse that he was able to, execute any other enterprise, the incertainties of the Emperour standing as great impediments to his valour, & most preiudiciall to the commo fortune of them, both. Neuerthelesse he determined to go incampe before Legnago, a towne of such speciall regard, that if it were not taken, all that had bene done till that day serued to nothing. The riuer of Adice passeth by the towne of Legnago, & the lesser part of the same which they call the haue is towards Montagnana, where the Venetians not reposing so much in the strength of the towne & valour of the defenders, as in the oportunitie & impediments of the waters, had cut the riuer in one place: and in another portion of the banke where is the greater part of the towne, they had cut it in two places, so as the riuer comming falling through those trenches, and so spread it selfe by many armes into the lowest places, had so couered the countrey about, that standing drowned for many monethes, it was almost become a marish: it hapned that the rashnesse and disorder of the Venetian bands, partly made these difficulties lesser: for, Monsieur Chaumont comming to incampe with his armie at Minerua three myles fro Legnago, & hauing sent before certaine of his horsemen and footmen, who as they would haue passed the last arme of the water which was within halfe a myle of Legnago, they encountred the bands of the footmen which kept the ward of Porto, who were issued out to stop them of passage. But the foote bands of the Gassons and Spaniards rushing resolutely into the water vp to the brest, repulsed them, and pursued them with such valour and furie, that they entred with them pelmell into Porto, very few of the footemen of that place being saued, for that as some were slaine in flying, so the greater part that sought into Legnago, were drowned as they would haue passed the riuer of Adice. This successe caused Monsieur Chaumont to leaue his campe at Minerua, going the same night night to lodge within Porto : and after he had caused to traylor vnder the water, the great artillery which the firme bottome of earth did sustaine, he caused the labourers and pioners the same night to fill vp and choke the trench of the riuer. And knowing that on that side to Porto, Leguaguo was inexpugnable for the largenes of the riuer, so great, that scarcely could they fight on that side, (notwithstanding betwene Leguaguo & Porto for that it is compassed with the hills, it is not so large as below) he commaunded to prepare a bridge for the artillery & greatest part of the armie to passe on the other side : but finding the boats & barks which he had caused to be brought thither, not to suffice for the largenesse of the riuer, he incamped neare the riuer vpon the opposite of Leguaguo, making to passe by the benefit of the boats & barks to the other side of Adice, Capitaine Molard with foure thousand Gascon footemen and fixe peeces of artillery : as soone as they were ouer the riuer, they began on both sides the riuer to batter the bastillion which was vpon the rising of a hill at the point of the towne, on that side aboue : and hauing battred a great part of it, notwithstanding the defendants expressed great office and valour in reenforcing, yet the night following, the treasurer of the Venetian campe, hauing more feare of his enemy then hope or confidence in his owne people, withdrew himself suddely into the castell with certaine Venetian Gentlemen. As soone as it was day and their retiring vnderstood ; the Capitaine of the footemen that guarded the bastillion, rendred it to Molard, their liues and goods saued, which neuertheless was not obserued, for that when he was come out, he and his footemen were stripped by the souldiers of the campe : a licence contrary to the law and reputation of armes. By the example of the bastillion the towne was immediatly put to sacke by Capitaine Molard, & the bands of footemen who guarded another bastillion made on the other point of the towne, fled through the marish, leauing their armour and weapons in entring the water. Thus Leguaguo by the cowardise of such as were within it, was conquered with a more ready facilitie and speede then either was expected or imagined, the cowardise on the one part giuing as great oportunitie to the victory, as the valour of the other side. The castell made no greater resistance then the towne, for, the bulwarkes and defences being executed the day following by the artillery, & beginning to vndermine one side of a tower with intention afterwards to giue fire to it, they within fearing the perill which yet was but in demonstration, yelded themselues with condition that the Gentlemen of Venice remaining in the power of Monsieur Chaumont, the souldiers should depart with a white rod in their hands : fortune in this victorie mixed the felicitie of Monsieur Chaumont with some bitter composition, for that in that place he had aduertisement of the death of his Vncle the Cardinall Amboise, by whose great authoritie and regiment with the French king, he, hauing bene already raised to high promotions and honours, hoped still to be lifted vp higher, and receiue farre greater aduancements : such a busie humour is ambition, for that in whom it ruleth, it makes them hard to be contented with things that they haue, since that which they haue gotten doth not content them, so long as they hope to haue better : for that the Almans had not then sufficient souldiers to leaue within Leguaguo, Chaumont resupplied their garrison with an hundred Launces & a thousand footemen, and so giuing licence to the Grisons and Valesiens (footemen mercenarie in this seruice) he prepared to returne with the residue of his army to the Duchy of Millan, following the commandement of the king, who would no more entertaine so great expences. Of this armie, for that the prouisiōs on Cesars part answered not the promises that were made, there came no effect of importance (their fortune offering to bring to passe the things that either their policie could not foresee, or their valour durst not attempt.) Neuertheless the king sent a new commandement to Chaumont to stay yet for the whole moneth of Iune, for that Cesar, being then come to Yprinch, no lesse replenished with difficulties according to his custome, then perplexed with plots & hopes, made instance that he should not depart, promising from houre to houre that he would passe into Italie. About which time the Almans desiring to recouer Marosiquo, Citadella, Basciano and other peeces thereabouts, to make the descending of Cesar more easie on that side, M. M. Chaumont with his armie encamped at Lungaro vpon the riuer of Bagnillon, to the end to stop the Venetian companies for entring into Vincenza (very weake in garrison) & that they should not oppose against the Almans : but, being there aduertised that the Venetians were retired to Padoa, the Almans ioyning theselues of new with him, they went to the Torricelli vpon the high way that leadeth fro Vincenza to Padoa, & fro thence leauing Padoa on the right had, they marched to Citadella with no little discōmoditie of victuals, being troubled by the light horsemen that were within Padoa, and much more by such as were at Monfeliçe: Citadella yeelded without resistance, by whose example also Marostico, Basciano, with other peeces thereabouts abandoned by the Venetians, came to composition. In so much as things being dispatched on that side, the armies returned to the Torricelli, and leaving Padoa on the right hand, and taking towards the mountaine on the left hand, they encamped about Brento a neare to the mountaine within ten miles of Vincenza: the chief reason why they went to that place, was, for that the Almaines desired to occupie Escalo, a passage very conuenient for the regiments that were to come out of Germanie, & a peece that only of all other places from Trenisa to Vincenza, remained in the hands of the Venetians: from this place the Prince of Hanaw being departed with his Almaines and an hundred French Launces, tooke the way of Escalo, which was xxv. myles from thence: but he could passe no further, for that the peasants and countrey people, bearing an incredible affection to the Venetians, and such as being prisoners sticke not to offer their bodies to torments and death rather then to denie them or to speake ill of them, had taken many passages in the mountaine. And after he had obtained by composition New-castell which is also a passage of the mountaine, he returned to the incamping place about Brento, hauing sent by another way towards Escalo, many of his footemen, who, according to his direction forsooke the way of Basciano, to auoyd Conolo which is a strong passage in the mountaines there, and taking the tower more low by the way of Feliro, they found a very few people within Feliro, which they sacked and burned, and so tooke the way to Escalo, which, with the passage of Conolo, they found abandoned. About that time also the ruines were nothing lesse in the countrey of Friul, for that being sometimes assailed by the Venetians, and sometimes inuaded by the Almaines, now defended and eftsoones pillaged by the Gentlemen of the countrey, this day aduancing, and that day declining according to occasions and times, there was secne in euery place nothing more then dead carcasses of men: townes sacked, and fortresses burned. And as the calamities that a war draweth with it be infinite, so it hapned oftentimes that the places which had bene first sacked by one armie, was eftsoones burned by the other, and except certaine strong peeces, all the residue of the countrey put to miserable destruction. But because in those actions there was nothing done worthy of memory, it would be no lesse superfluous to recount the particularities, then trouble some to vnderstand so many variable reuolutions which brought forth no effect importing the substance of the warre.

Conuention betweene Caesar and the French king.

The time now approching that the French armie should depart, there was made this new conuention betweene Caesar and the French king, that his armie should yet continue for the moneth following, with couenant that the extraordinary expences such as ranne ouer and aboue the payes of the bands which the king had defrayed till that time, should be payed hereafter by Caesar, together with the regiments of the footemen for that moneth. But because Caesar was not then prouided of money, the rate and summe should be set downe of those expences, and the king to make it vp by way of loane to the summe of fiftie thousand duckets: which if Caesar did not repay within one yeare following, together with the other fiftie thousand which were lent him before, the king should resume into his hands Verona with all the territories, and keepe it possessed till he were satisfied. Chaumont hauing the kings commaundement to follow still those warres, turned all his wits and deuises to take Monfeliçe, in which disposition as soone as foure hundred Spanish Launces led by the Duke of Terminy were arriued, who, being sent by the king Catholike to the succours of Maximilian, had according to their custome marched very slowly. The armies after they had passed the riuer of Brento, and afterwarde the riuer of Bagnillon at the village of Purlo within fife myles of Padoa, arriued at Monfeliçe, not without suffering a woderfull scarcitie of victuals and forrages by the incursions of horsemen that were within Padoa & Monfeliçe, who besides those damages, tooke S. Benzoni de Cremo, a Captaine for the French being gone with a verie slender strength of horsemen to view the scouters: this Captaine, for that he was the Author of the rebellion of Cremo, Andrea Gritti respecting more that he was a subiect to the Venetians, then a souldier of the enemies, caused him to be executed presently.

The taking of Monfeliçe.

In the towne of Monfeliçe which standeth in the plaine, is a rising as it were a stonie hill, (by that reason it is called Monfeliçe) which is very high, in the top whereof is a castell, & at the backe of that hill which goeth alwayes lessening, be three waits of wals, the lowest wherof embraceth so much space, that it wel needeth two thousand mē to defend it against a whole army. The enemies abandoned suddenly the towne, wherein the French being bestowed, plated their artillerie against the

the first waite, and after they had well battered it in many places, the footmen of the Gascous & Spaniards began to approach the wall in disorder, striving to enter by many breaches: there were within for the defence of it 700 men, who supposing it had bin an assault appointed & ordered, and seeing their disability to make resistance if the assault had bene followed in sundrie places, after they had made a small defence, began to retire according to an agreement made amongst the selues before, as was beleueed: but they made their retrait in such disorder, that the enemy that began but now to enter, entertaining with them the skirmish and chase, entred pell mel with them at the other two waits and so to the Castell: there the greatest part of them were slaine, and the residue which were withdrawne to the dungeon, offering to yeeld vpon surety of life; were not accepted by the Almaines, whose furie ioyned to their fortune, led them at last to put fire in the dungeon: so as of 700 footmen the executioners reserued verie few, euerie one bearing lesse compassion to their calamities for the cowardise they shewed in their owne defence. There were amongst them fise Constables & Marshals, whereof Martin de Bourg of Tuskaine was the principall, who being parties in the confusion, they found seuerallie the particulat fortune: the crueltie of the Almaines was shewed nothing lesse against the buildings and wals, for not hauing sufficient companies to gard them, they did not onely dismantell the fortresse of Monfelice, but also consumed the towne with fire, holding nothing vnlawful which was within the compasse of their furie to accomplish: after this iourney, those armies did nothing of importance, sauing that 400 French lances run vp to the gates of Padoa, rather declaring their good wil, then doing any actiō worthy so great valour. About this time the Duke of Ferrara departed from the campe, & M. Chastillon with him, whom Chaumont sent with 250 launces for the gard of Ferrara where the people liued in great suspition, for that the bands of the Pope were not farre from thence: the Almaines perswaded much M. Chaumont (vrgeing the treatie that was made betweene them before) to go incampe before Trenisfa, laying afore him that the actions which had bene done with so great expences were of litle importance, if Trenisfa were not taken: for, touching Padoa, there was no hope to be able to haue it: of the contrarie, Chaumont replied that Cesar was not descended against the Venetians with such forces as he had promised, as also such as were ioyned to his armie were reduced to a very small number: that within Trenisfa, where the Venetians had made verie great fortifications, there were strong companies of souldiers: lastly, he alleaged that the store of victuals was worne out of the country, and no lesse the difficultie to bring prouision to the campe from far places, for the continuall vexation of the light horsemen and stradiots of the Venetians, who being aduertised by the diligent espiall of the countrymen of euery litle mouing that they made, and being besides in great number, discovered themselues alwaies in euery place where they thought they might endamage them: these disputations ceased by a new commandement that came from the French King to Chaumont, that leauing in the armie of the Almaines foure hundred launces & fiteene hundred Spanish footmen of the kings pay, besides those that were in garison in Legnaguo, he should sodainly returne with his army to the Duchy of Millan: for that many troubles and dangers began to disclose by meane of the Pope: by reason whereof M. Chaumont leauing the gouernment of those companies to M. Persi, followed the kings commandement: and the Almaines distrusting to be able to do anie thing of importance, put themselues into Lomgno.

The Pope had of long time set downe in his mind an obstinate resolution not only to repossesse the Church of many estates, which he pretended to appertaine to him, but also to chase the French king out of al that he held in Italy. The matter that induced this disposition, was either a secret & ancient ill will that he bare him, or else a settled suspition and iealousie which he had nourished a long time, and now was conuerted into extreame hatred: or haply it might be an ambition of glorie to be the deuierer (as he boasted afterwards) of Italy from forraigne nations; to these ends he had absouled the Venetians of the Church Censures: to these ends was he entred into intelligence & strait alliance with the Swissers, making semblance to proceed in those things more for his proper suretie, then for desire to offend another: & to these ends not being able to withdraw the Duke of Ferrara from the deuotion of the French king, he was determined to do all that he could to occupie that Duchie, blazing his deuises with this colour, that he stirred onely for the quarrel of the salt and salt pits: & yet to the end not to disclose the plainnesse of his thoughts vntill he were better prepared, he had continuall negotiations with Albert Pio, to haue agreement with the French king, not sparing to protest openly, though he kept his intentions cōsembled: the king for his part interpreting all his discontentment to come for that he had taken the Duke of Ferrara into his protection, and hauing a careful desire to auoide his ill will, consented to contract with him new couchants, referring himselfe to the capitulations of Cambray; wherein was expressed that not one of the cōfederats should intrude into the things appertaining to the church, & did insert withall such words & clauses as might make it lawful to the Pope to proceed against the Duke of Ferrara so farre forth as concerned the particularity of the salt & salt mines, to which ends the king supposed that the Popes thoughts did chieflie aspire: wherein he made such interpretation of the protection which he had taken of the Duke of Ferrara, as though there was left to him a lawfull libertie to contract with the Pope in that maner: but the nearer the king approached to the demands of the Pope, the further was he estranged and separate from him, inclining nothing the more for the newes he heard of the death of Cardinall Amboise: for, to such as perswaded him to the peace, and tooke their argument vpon this, that his suspicions were now finished, he answered that the same king liuing, the same iealousies did yet endure, confirming his opinion by this, that the accord made by the Cardinall of Pavia had bene violated by the king of his proper deliberation, contrarie to the will and counsell of the Cardinall Amboise: yea such as looked deeply into the intentions of the Pope and his manner of dealings, found that his stomacke and hopes were so much the more increased, and not without occasion; for the qualities of the king being such, as he stood in more necessity to be gouerned, then that he was able or proper to gouerne, it is without doubt that he was much weakened by the death of the Cardinall, since that besides his long experience, his abilitie of wit was great, & stood withall in such grace and authority with the king, and had such power ouer his directions and counsels, that he would oftentimes take vpon him to giue of himselfe a forme & resolution of affaires: a matter which could not be found in such as succeeded him in the gouernment, who durst not communicate with the king in affaires which they thought would displease him, much lesse that they had authoritie to deliberate: besides, reposed not the same faith and confidence in their counsels, and being a bodie of a counsell compounded vpon many persons, and they respecting one another without any great trust in their new authoritie, they proceeded both more coldly and carelesly then either the importance of the present affaires required, or was necessarie against the heat and importunity of the Pope: who not accepting any of the offers that were made to him by the king, required him at last to renounce, not with condition and limitation, but absolutely and simply, the protection which he had taken of the Duke of Ferrara, not weighing to aduance his owne purposes with the kings dishonour: and albeit the king perswaded him much that such a renunciation would bring him great infamie; yet was it in vaine to labour to stay him with words and reasons, whose ambitions were infinite and his intentions full of malice, with which propertie of mind he answered the king, that seeing he refused to renounce simply, he would also take libertie not to contract with him, nor yet to be against him, and not binding himselfe to any person, he would studie to maintaine the state of the Church in peace, beginning euen then to complaine more then euer of the Duke of Ferrara: whose friends weighing wisely with what aduersarie he had to do, perswaded him to giue ouer the working and making of salt, which hee answered he could not do without preiudicing the rights of the Empire to whom the iust iurisdiction of Comacho appertained. Many entred into a certaine doubt & opinion which tooke increasing with time, that Albert Pio the French kings Embassadour, not proceeding sincerely in his legation, stirred vp the Pope against the Duke of Ferrara, for a burning desire hee had (wherein hee continued till his death) that Alfonso should be deposed from the Dukedome of Ferrara: the reason was, for that Hercules, father of Alfonso, hauing had certaine yeares afore of Gilbert Pio the moiety of the dominion of Curpy, giuing him in recompence the borough of Sassola with certaine other landes, Albert feared least in the end the other moiety either by compulsion or corruption would deuolue to him: the experience often happening that the neighbour lesse rich and able yeeldeth to the couetousnesse of the most wealthie and mighty: a matter which in all common weales hath bene seene to minister no small troubles, and therefore it hath not bene thought good that the poore and rich should dwell neare together, for that as in the wealth of the rich man are sowne the seeds of enuy in the mind of the poore man, so of the wants of the poore, and superfluities of the rich are nourished the disorders of a whole people.

But what neuer was the simplicitie and truth of it, the Pope expressing tokens of a person vnappeasable against Alfonso, and hauing a full resolution to leaue warre against him; prepared first to proceed with the authoritie and censures of the Church: wherein seeking to giue some iustification to the grounds of this action, he gaue it out; that he had found among the Records of the chamber Apostolike, the inuestiture of the towne of Comacho; giuen by Popes to the house of Este. These were the publike and manifest behauiours of the Pope; but in secret he solicited to set abroad farre greater mouings, wherein he seemed to haue giuen a good foundation to his affaires, in contracting amitie with the Swissers, and to haue at his deuotion the Venetians, who now were vpon their feet. Besides, he saw that the king of Aragon respected the same end that he did, or at least was not soundly ioyned with the French King: that the forces and authoritie of Cesar were so weakened that there was left no occasion to feare him: and lastly, that he was not without hopes to procure the king of England to stirre. But that which should most haue appeased him, he made to serue most to stirre vp and kindle his humacke, which was the knowledge he had that the French king hauing no disposition to make warre against the Church, nourished a settled desire to haue peace: insomuch as it seemed that it would alwayes remaine in his power to draw him to peace, yea though he had leauied armies against him. The reason of these matters making him rise dayly more insolent, and redoubling openly his complaints and threats against the French king, and Duke of Ferrara, he refused in the feast of the celebration of S. Peter (a day wherein, according to ancient custome, are offered the tributes which are due to the seege Apostolike) to accept the tribute of the Duke of Ferrara; saying, that the euasion of Alexander the sixt, who in marying his daughter, had from foure thousand Duckets, reduced that offering to a hundred, could not take example to the preiudice of that Sea. Besides, he would not afore this time giue licence to the Cardinall of Achx and other French Cardinalls to returne into Fraunce: and vnderstanding that day, that the Cardinall of Achx was gone to take the pleasure of the fields with certaine grayhounds, he entred into a vaine suspicion that he would secretly start away, and therefore sent speedily after to take him, and held him prisoner in the Castle S. Ange. Thus disclosing openly his manifest contention with the French king, and for that cause seeing himselfe so much the more constrained to lay great and assured foundations, he graunted to the king Catholike the inuestiture of the kingdome of Naples, vnder condition of the same tribute, with the which the kings of Aragon had obtained it, notwithstanding he had refused afore to bestow it otherwise then for forty thousand duckets: a rate afore time imposed vpon the French whē he obtained it: in this action the Pope respected not so much the bond which in other inuestitures of the same kingdome, was wont to be made to him to entertaine euery yeare for him, as often as need required, three hundred men at armes for the defence of the Church: as the desire he had to make him his friend, ioyned to a hope that his aides (vpon occasion) might do much to leade him into open contention with the French king: whereof were already discerned certaine seedes and beginnings, for that the king Catholike suspecting much the greatnesse of the French, and no lesse ialous of his ambition, for that not content with the limits of the league of Cambray, he aspired to draw to his obedience the citie of Verona, and besides all this, being pushed on by the memorie of ancient quarels, desired greatly that there might be found some impediment in his affaires: and therefore ceased not to counsell a peace betweene Cesar and the Venetians, which was not a litle desired by the Pope: and albeit he proceeded secretly in those actions, yet he was not able altogether to couer his thoughts: in so much as his armie by sea being false vpon Sicilie, which he sent to assaile the Ile of Gerbes (an Iland anciently called by the Latines the great Sirta) the king was entred into suspicion, and the minds of men that were wel acquainted with his suttleties, were occupied with many doubts.

But as in worldly dealings it oftē hapneth that the thing that is feared least, doth soonest chāce, and hurteth most; so troubles and perplexities began to rise to the French king from those parts which he doubted least, and in a time wherein he had no expectation of any mouing of armes to be prepared against him: for the Pope, betweene whose suttlety and secrecie there was no difference, working alwayes vnder hand, solicited that at one time Genes might be assailed both by sea and land: that twelue thousand Swissers might descend vpon the Duchie of Millan: that the Venetians should take the field to recouer their townes holden by Cesar: and that his owne Armie should enter vpon the country of Ferrara, with intētion to passe afterwards into the Duchy of Millan, if things began to succeed happily to the Swissers: he hoped that Genes being assailed vpon the sodaine, there wold easily arise some mutation or mutinie, both for that there were manie that bare no sound affection to the French, and also that the faction of Fregosa would minister aide, going thither vnder colour to make Duke, Ottavian, whose father and vncle had possessed the same dignitie: that the French men amazed for the commotion of Genes and inuasion of the Swissers, would reuoke to the Duchie of Millan, all the bands which they had with Cesar, and the Duke of Ferrara, which would be a cause that the Venetians should easily recouer Verona, and afterwards set vpon the Duchie of Millan: lastly, that his regiments should do the like after they had made an easy conquest of Ferrara, being abandoned of the French, making a iudgement vpon these computations, that the estate of Millan would haue no abilitie of defence against so many enemies, and so sodaine a warre: he began at onetime the warre against Ferrara and against Genes: and albeit the Duke of Ferrara (against whom he proceeded the more to hasten the execution as against a notorious offender) offered to giue him the saltes that were made at Comacho, with obligation that hereafter there should be no more made: yet (nothing can satisfie a mind possessed with malice) after he had licensed his Embassadors, he caused his armie to march against him, which with the only summons of a trumpet, and no defence appearing, obtained Cente and Picua; which boroughs appertaining first to the Bishopricke of Bologna, Pope Alexander in marrying his daughter, had annexed them to the Duchie of Ferrara, recompensing the Bishopricke with other reuenues. Against Genes were sent 11 Gallies of the Venetians guided by Grillo Contarin, and one speciall Gallie of the Popes, carying Ottavian Fregosa, Ieronimo Dorea, with many other of the banished men of that estate: and by land at the same time, and for the same expedition was dispatched M. Anth. Colonno with a hundred men at armes, and seuen hundred footmen: this Captaine hauing left the pay of the Florentines, and being entertained by the Pope, abode vpon the territories of Lucqua vnder colour to furnish his band, giuing out a brute that he was afterwards to go to Bologna: & albeit M. Chaumont entred into some suspition of Genes by reason of his abiding, yet not knowing that the armie by sea was to come, & the Pope spreading a suttile and dissembling brute that the preparations of the Swissers and houering of M. Anth. were to execute some surprize vpon Ferrara, Chaumont made no other prouision for Genes then a certaine small crue of footemen whom he sent thither.

Marke Anth. marched with his copanies vp to the vale of Visagna within a mile of the wals of Genes, notwithstanding he was not receiued (according to the Popes hopes) either into Serezana or into the towne of Spetia: & at the same time the armie by sea which had occupied Sesfria, and Chianara, was come from Rapalo to the mouth of the riuer Enelle, which falleth into the sea neare the port of Genes: but there were entred into Genes for the French king at the first brute that the enemies approached, the sons of Jo. Lowys de Fiesquo with 800 men of the country, with whom was ioyned the Cardinals nephew of Fimalo with an equal proportion of souldiers, which both assured the towne, & kept suppressed all stirres & commotions: by this succour and prouidence, the Pope & the exiles being deceiued of their principall hope, seeing besides a continuall flocking & concourse of people out of Lombardy and the riuer of Ponant, together with six great Gallies entring the hauen giuded by Pressan, they thought that to tarie longer there could not bring more perill then profit: & therefore both the nauie by sea, and the armie by land returned to Repalle, where in assaying to take Portofino, died Francisco Bolani, a Patron of one of the Venetian Gallies: from thence their armie by sea hoysing saile to go to Ciuitanechia, M. Anth. Colonno doubting his suretie to passe by land for the commotions of the countrey men and popular furie alwayes raging against souldiers that retire in disfaueur, imbarcked himselfe in the gallies with 60 of the best horsmen, sending the residue by land to Spetia, who were all stript aswell vpon the countrey of Genes, as vpon the marches of Lucqua, and frontiers of the Florentines: this attempt was done with verie small honour to Grillo and Ottavian, for that of feare they abstained to charge the vessels of Preian, who being inferior, it was beleueed that before he entred the hauen they wold haue set vpon him with a great aduantage: asloone as they had weyed anker & gone, Preian issued out of the hauen with 7 Gallies and 4 ships, taking his course to pursue the Venetian nauie which was stronger then he in Gallies, but weaker in number of ships: both the one & other fel with the Ile of Elbo, the Venetians in the port of Lugano, & the French in the hauen of of Ferrara, who returned eftsóones to Genes after they had accosted the enimie to the Mount Argentara. About this time the Popes souldiours were entred into Romania vnder the Duke of Vrbyn against the Duke of Ferrara, where hauing taken the towne of Lugo, Vaguacaul, and all the residue that the Duke held on this side Paw, they held the castell of Lugo besieged: and whilest they lay there both in disorder and without effect, being suddenly aduertised that the Duke of Ferrara with the French bánds, and a hundred and fiftie men at armes of his own, with many troupes of light horsemen, was marching to the reskewe of it, they leauied their siege, and leauing in pray to the enemie three píeces of artillerie, they retired to Ymola, nothing being able to assure them whom feare had compélléd to flee. Alfonso taking the aduantage of this occasion, recouered with a wonderfull facilitie all that they had taken from him in Romania: but the campe Ecclesiastike being eftsóones reassembled & reassured, reconquered eftsóones the selfe same places, and immediately after forced the castle of Lugo hauing battred it many dayes: and after the taking of it, their fortune presented to them an occasion of greater successe: for, being no garrison in Modona, for that the Duke being occupied in defending other places where the daunger was nearest, was not able to furnish it of him selfe nor obtaine of Monsieur Chaumont to send thither two hundred lances. The Cardinal of Pauya passing with the army to Frank castell, obtained by composition that citie, whither he was inuited to come by Gerard and Frauncis Maria Rargóns gentlemen of Modona, whose authoritie was so great, as they were able to dispose of it as best liked them. And in this action it was beleueed that they were pushed on more by ambition & desire of innouation, then by any other occasion. The losse of Modona was a warning to the Duke against other harmes, who fearing least the like wold happē to Regge, bestowed present garison there, as also Chaumont, doing after the hurt receiued that which would haue profited more in the beginning, sent thither two hundred launces, notwithstanding he had many impediments for the discending of the Smyssers.

The confederation betweene the French king & the Smyssers, was determined many moneths before, the king continuing his resolution not to augment their pensions, contrary to the counsell of all his Nobles, who aduised him to consider of what importance it would be to make those armies his enemies, with the which he had before atchieued his greatest fortunes: and they already drawn into armes vnder the authority of the Popes promises, but specially made angry with the kings obstinacy in denying their demaunds, were resolved by an vniuersall consent of the Communalities in an assembly holden at Lucerna, to conspire against him: but Monsieur Chaumont looking into the perill of these leauies and stirs, set good gard vpon the passages towards Coma, tooke away from the riuers all boates & barks, withdrew into places of strength all victuals & prouisions, and lastly cut from the milles their instruments to grinde by, leauing nothing that might be employed to the seruice of the enimie, but the riuers and land which he could not remoue. And being vncertaine, whether the Smyssers would make their descending vpon the Duchie of Myllan, or else passing the Mount S. Barnard, to enter into Piemont by the vale of Augusto, and so go to Samona, with intention to endamage Genes, or els from thence passing the Appenn, to make inuasions vpon the Duke of Ferrara; he had also induced the Duke of Sanoy to denie them passage, and for their more impediment, he sent with his consent fíue hundred launces to Turea, not ceassing neuerthelesse to do all that he could to corrupt with presents and promises the chiefe commaunders of that Nation, to draw them from their rising, holding it but iust to obiect practise against them, in whome was so great lightnesse to stirre vpon so small occasion. But in vaine did he labour and sollicite those communalities, whose mindes did not retaine any thing more willingly then the memorie of the kings deniall, being growne from an hatred to a violent desire to be reuenged of the French nation: in so much as the Commons (thinking it to be their proper cause) notwithstanding the difficulties that were in the Pope to send them money, for that the Fookers bankers of Germany, who had promised to defray it for him, shrunke backe for feare to offend Cesar, fixe thousand of them leauied by the Pope entred really into the action in the beginning of September: amongst whome were foure hundred horsemen, halfe armed with shot, two thousand fíue hundred footemen with halfaques, and fiftie harquebusiers, without artillerie or other prouision of bridges or vessels. In this furniture, they marched, turning to the way of Belmsone, and taking the bridge of Tresa, with a garison of fíue hundred French footemen left abandoned, they incamped at Varefa, expecting there (as they said) the Bishop of Sion with new companies. Albeit these beginnings troubled much the mindes of the French, both for an ordinarie feare they had of the Swyssers, and also particularly respecting their owne weakenesse, hauing at that time in Millan a verie small number of men at armes, for that part of them were distributed for the gard of Bressa, Leguaguo, Valegge & Pesquero, 3 hundred launces sent to the succors of the Duke of Ferrara, & 5 hundred being ioyned with the armie of Almain against the Venetians: yet Monsieur Chaumont assembling his forces, & expressing his valour euen amid his hard fortune, marched with 5 hundred launces and 4 thousand footemen, & tooke the plaine of Chastillon within two miles of Varefa, hauing sent to the Mount of Briansa Ioh. la Triunice, to the end that not so much with the bads which he brought with him, which were in very small number, as with the fauour and further strength of the men of the countrey, he might be an impediment to the Swyssers for taking that way. The Swyssers as soone as they were arriued at Varefa, sent to demand passage of Monsieur Chaumont, saying they would go to the seruice of the Church: by reason whereof it was doubted that they would passe to Ferrara, either by the Duchie of Myllan, by which way, besides the impediments of the french companies, they should haue found difficultie to haue passed the riuers of Pauv & Oglia: or els by taking the left hand, and coasting by the hilles below Coma and Lecqua, and passing the riuier of Adda which there is narrow, and not rough, from whence they might haue bene guided by the hill of the countrey of Bergamo and Bressa to the riuier of Oglia: and hauing passed ouer there, they might haue descended either by the countrey of Bressa or by Guaradada vpo the marches of Mantua, which is a countrey large & beareth no places of force to haue resisted them. So great was the reputation of the valour and order of that nation, that in all euents Monsieur Chaumont had no intention to set vpon them, although they made their descending into the plaine, but with his horsemen & footemen ioyned together, and with his field peeces, to accost and houer vpon them to cut off their victuals, and to giue them as many impediments as he could without assaying the fortune to passe the riuers: and in the meane while, for that the places neare Varefa were well furnished with horsemen and footemen, he visited them often times with false alarums, keeping them in breath all the night. At Varefa, where the Swyssers suffered great want of victuals, a new supply of foure thousand came and ioyned with them, and the fourth day after their coming, they marched altogether towards Chastillon, keeping vpon the left hand along the hilles, marching alwaies in cloase ranke, in good order, more respecting to march in safetie then to make speede: They were in euery Squadron foure skore or an hundred, the last ranks being all halfaques and harquebusiers: Their obseruation was such in marching, that much lesse that the enemy could auoid them by any aduantage, but of the contrarie they made a valiant defence against the French armie, which alwaies accosted them, and put them to the skirmish both behind and before, yea, sometimes they would draw out of their squadrons an hundred or fiftie to entertaine the skirmish, sometimes aduancing, sometimes slaying, sometimes retreating, nor that there could be discerned in their doings the least disorder: They thought it no dishonor to retyre, when by giuing of place they might profit them selues and endaunger the enemy. In this order they arriued the first day at the passage of the bridge of Vedan, which was garded by Captaine Malard with certaine Gascoigne footemen, who being driuen backe with the shot of their halfaques, they lodged the same night at Appiana eight miles from Varefa, & Chaumont encamped within Assaron towards the hil of Briansa fixe miles fro Appiana. The day following, they drew along the hils, towards Cantu, Chaumont accosting the alwaies with 200 launces, for that by the sharpnesse or steepenes of the places, the artilleries remained more lower together with the footme that garded the: and yet in the half way either for the damages which the french had giuen the that day (whereof Chaumont made not a litle glorie) or for that such was their resolution, leauing the way of Cantu, and turning more on the left hand, they went retreating by the high places towards Coma, encamping for that night in a suburbe of that citie, and in the villages thereabout: from the suburbe of Coma, they made another lodging at Chiasso three miles more forward, keeping the French men in doubt whether they would returne to Belinsone by the vallie of Lungaro, or draw towards the riuier of Adda; where, albeit they were not furnished with bridges, yet many supposed that their valour would open them a way to passe, necessitie making them to vse planks in steed of bridges. But putting them out of doubt the day following they went and harboured at the bridge of Trese, and from thence retired by troupes into their houses, being reduced into the uttermost extremitie of victuals and want of money: it was beleueed that this retraite so suddaine was done for want of money, for the difficulties to passe the riuers, but much more for the necessitie of victuals, impediments of great importance to hinder both the fortune, the valour, and felicitie of an armie. In this sort the French men were deliuered for this time of a daunger which they esteemed not litle, notwithstanding the king making those things greater then they were in deede, affirmed that he could not but hold it profitable for his affaires to suffer them to passe, making this question, whether of these two things would make the Pope more weake, either to be without souldiours, or to haue an armie that came to offend him, as did the Swysers, whome, with so many forces and so much treasure, he had had all the paine in the world to manage.

The perill of the French had beene farre greater, if at one time they had beene assailed in many places, according to the deuises of the Pope. But as the enterprise of Genes was afore the mouing of the Swysers, so the armie of the Venetians aduanced not so soone as was determined, notwithstanding they had a singular occasion and commoditie, for that the Almaine bands within Vincenza, with whome were the Spanish footemen, and the 500 French launces, being much diminished since the departure of Monsieur Chaumont, the Venetians issuing out of Padoa, recovered without great trauell Este, Monselice, Montagnano, Maresico, and Basciana: and ioyning valour to their fortune, they passed further, and taking aduantage of the retyring of the Almains drawing the way of Verona, they entred into Vincenza which they had abandoned: except Legnagno, they reconquered with this felicitie all those pieces which with so great expences and trauell of the French men, they had lost in the whole sommer: and so they came to S. Martin siue miles from Verona, into which city the enemies retired, their retraite not being without daunger by the doubtfull valour of Luke Malvezzi: who being then their Generall, for that Io. P. Baillon had left their pay, shewed a courage inferior to the reputation of the place which he held: for, the Venetians being come to the village of Torre, the enemies leauing great prouision of victuals in their lodgings, tooke the way to Verona, being followed with the whole Venetian armie, and continually suffering by their light horsemen: and yet the French sustaining valiantly the rearegard chiefly with their shot, they passed the riuer of Appan, and marched without daunger to New towne, the Venetians incamping within halfe a mile of them: who forbearing to followe the day after, with that diligence they did before, for that their footemen were not able to hold chase with the horsemen, they retired in safetie to Verona: from S. Martin, after they had remained there certaine dayes, approaching neare Verona, not without being blamed for the vnprofitable stay they had made, they began to employ their artilleries (which they had planted vpon the other mountaine) against the castell of S. Felix and the next wall: perhaps they made choise of that place for the difficultie to be refortified, and that the horsemen could not execute but with great discomforts.

The Venetian armie contained eight hundred men at armes, three thousand light horsemen, the most part estradiots, and ten thousand footemen with a great trayne and quantitie of payfants that followed: and within Verona were three hundred Spanish launces, one hundred launces of Almaines and Italians, and foure hundred French launces, fives hundred footemen paid by the king, and foure thousand Almaines, no longer vnder the guiding of the Prince of Hanaw, who was dead certaine dayes afore. The people and inhabitants of Verona, were ill disposed to the Almaines, were vp with their weapons in their hands: a matter wherein the Venetians had much hoped, whose light horsemen passing at the same time the riuer of Adice at a foard vnder Verona, runne ouer the whole countrey. The artilleries of the Venetians battred the wall in great furie, notwithstanding the artillerie planted within by the French, and couered with defences, did greatly distresse those that were without, who had no rampiers: Lallance Bergame, a Colonell of the greatest account with the Venetians, was stricken with a shot of the artillerie, of which he died within few daies after. At last the artillerie without hauing done a wonderfull execution and dismantled a great part of the wall, euen to the beginning of the skarpe, and so dismounted and broken their cannons that the artillerie within was of little seruice, the Almaines were not with their feare to lose the Castell notwithstanding it was well rampired. To which losse, to the end the losing of the citie were not ioyned, they determined in cases of necessitie to retyre to certaine rampiers which they had made in a place neare, to beat vpon the sodaine with their Cannons, which they had already planted, the face of the inner part of the Castell, hoping to make such an opening, that the enemies should finde small safetie to tary there. But the valour of those that were within, was farre above the vertue of the other, for that in the Venetian armie were no other bandes of footemen then Italians, who being ordinarily payed euery fortie dayes, followed that seruice more, for that they found in other places very slender preferment, then for any other reason. Besides, the Italian footemen not accustomed to the order of seruice, beyond the Mountes, neither assured in holdes, nor resolute in the field, were at that time almost reiected of euery one that had meanes to furnish their seruice with footemen straungers, specially with Swysers, Almaines and Spaniards. Therefore the towne being defended with a greater valour then it was assaulted, there issued out one night about eightene hundred footemen with certaine French horsemen to charge the artillerie, and the footemen that garded it beeing easily put to flight, they choaked two great pieces, struing to draw them into the towne. The Alarm was sodainly through all the campe, when Zitolo Perouso bringing a reskew of footemen, and making haste more then others to the misfortune that attended him, in fighting valiantly finished his life with great glorie. But Denis de Naldo comming on with the greater part of the armie, the enemy was compelled to reabandon the artillerie and retyre, notwithstanding with great praise, for that in the beginning they brake the garde that defended the artillerie, and after made slaughter of a great part of such as came first to the reskew, and lastly, retyred almost all in safetie. This accident brought great discouragement to the Venetian Captaines, who seeing the inhabitants made no mutinie, and iudging withal, that their abiding there would be no lesse vnprofitable then full of perill for the ill suretie of their campe (their footemen being lodged in the mountaine, and their horsemen in the valley) they determined to retire to their olde lodging at S. Martin, wherein they made so much the more speed, by how much they vnderstood that Monsieur Chaumont would come to the reskew of the towne, hauing already auoyded the perill of the Swysers. At such time as the campe leauied and brake vp, the foragers of Verona accompanied with a great strength, entred the valley of Polente ioyning to the mountaine of S. Felix: but many light horsemen of the Venetians being sent out for reskew, and seasing first of the entrie of the valley, put them all to the sword, or to the fortune of prisoners. From S. Martin the Venetian armie drew to S. Boniface, being fearefull of the comming of Monsieur Chaumont. About this time the garison within Trenisa tooke by composition the towne of Asola neare the riuier Musone, wherein were eight hundred Almaine footemen: the castell also suffring the same fortune. And in the countrey of Friuli, they proceeded with the same variations and cruelties accustomed, not seeming to make warre vpon enemies, but prosecuting on all partes the extreme destruction of buildings, places, and whole countreys. The like calamities also consumed Istria, the libertie of the warre making al things lawfull to the furie of the souldiers, whose insolencies left no other comfort to any sortes of people, then such as may be expected in an vnbridled furie of warre.

Marquis of Mantua captured out of prison.

About this time the Marquis of Mantua was deliuered out of prison by a strange deuice practised by the Pope, whereunto he was induced by an auncient affection which he bare to him before, ioyned to a desire to serue his turne of him, and the commoditie of his estate, in the warre against the French king. It was spread throughout all Italie, that in these respects he was the worker of his deliuerie, and set him at libertie: but it was credibly knowne by an Author worthy of faith, and through whose hands at that time passed the whole gouernement of the estate of Mantua, that his libertie was wrought by an other meane. There was great doubt least the Venetians, either for the hate they bare him, or for the suspicion they had of him, would not hold him a perpetuall prisoner: and therefore after they had bene vsed in vaine manie trials and remedies, it was determined in the Councell of Mantua, to haue recourse to Baiazet Prince of the Turkes, whose amitie the Marquis had entertained manie yeares, by visiting him oftentimes with manie presents and other offices of good-good will and honour. As soone as he vnderstood the calamitie of the Marquis, he sent for the Gouvernour of the Venetian Marchaunts lying at Constantinople, and commaunded him to make him promise that the Marquis should be deliuered. The Gouvernour answered, that it was not reasonable he should promise that which was not in his power to performe, onely he offered to write to the state of Venice, who he doubted not would set downe a resolution conformable to his desire. But Baiazet speaking in the person and authoritie of a tyrant, replied proudly, that it was his will that he should make an absolute promise, whereunto he was constrained to condescend, obeying the will of the tyrant as a law forced and vnrighteous, which he signified with expedition to the state of Venice, who considering that it was not now time to stirre vp so mightie a Prince, determined to set him at libertie. But he, to hide his dishonour, and to reape some fruite of his deuile, inclined to the desire of the Pope, by whose meane being concluded (but secretly) that to assure the Venetians that the Marquis should not moue against them, his eldest sonne should be put into the Popes hands. The Marquis was conueyed to Bologna, where after he had deliuered ouer his sonne to the Agents of the Pope, he went to Mantua, excusing himselfe both to Caesar and the French king by the necessitie he had to go redresse his owne estate, that he visited not their armies to do them seruice, as freeholder to the one and souldier to the other (the French king holding him alwayes in the number of his Pensioners) notwithstanding his intention indeede was to remaine a newter.

The ill successe of things no lesse rashly attempted then vainely profecuted, had nothing diminished the hopes of the Pope, who promising himselfe more then euer of the mutations of Genes, determined to assaile it of new: by reason whereof the Venetians following him more by necessitie, then that they allowed of his furious dealing, augmented their Nauie which was at Ciuita Vecchio by foure great ships, to the which after the Pope had ioyned one of his Gallies with other vessels, and perswading that by the publication and authoritie of his name, the Genowayes would be the more easie induced to rebell, he gaue publike benediction to his banners with ceremonies Pontificall, as though in that manner of celebration were power either to worke effect to his intentions, or to make better his fortune. It was maruelled that now that his thoughts were made manifest and discouered, and that within Genes were many souldiers, and a strong Nauie within the hauen, how he could hope to obtaine that which he was not able to winne when the hauen was disarmed, the garrison varie weake within the Citie, and when there was no doubt at all of him. But as nothing can satisfie the ambition of man, so the minde that hath malice mixed with the desire of glorie, is alwayes made more apt to hope for honour, then able to get it. To the armies at sea which were followed with the banished faction, and also with the Bishop of Genes sonne of Obietto de Fiesquo, were to be ioyned the forces of the land: for Federike Archbishop of Salerne brother to Octavian Fregosa, leauied with the Popes money companies of footmen and horsemen, Iohn de Sasatelle & Remold de Saffere his Captaines hauing commaundement to be readie with their regiments at Bagno, to make an approach to Genes as occasion should require. The warning of a mischiefe brings with it his remedy, & the harme that is looked for before hurte little when it cometh: for in that Citie had bene made mightie provisions both by sea and land, in so much as at the first brute that the Nauie of the enemy approached wherein were fiftene light galleys, three great galleys, one galcasse, and three Biscain ships, the French Nauie lanching out of the hauen of Genes with xxij. light galleys, went proudly to meete them at Portouenere: The diuersitie of vessels was to them a suretie, for that being inferior to the enemies being vnited together in one strength, but at least equall with him in force touching galleys, they might alwayes find safetie in their swiftnesse, and by dispersing, they might make an easie euasion from the ships. The two Nauies approached one another about Portouenere within daunger of artillerie, & after they had exchanged betweene them certaine vollies of shot, they brake off, the Popes Nauie going to Sestrie which is in the coast of Leuant, from whence they presented themselues afore the port of Genes, (Iohn Fregosa entring within the port with a Brigantine) but the town being so straitly garded that the contrary faction could not rise, & the artillerie of the towre of Godisa thundring without ceassing, they were constrained to retire, their fortune being inferior to their valour. Afterwards they sailed to Portouenere, where they spent certaine houres afore it without commendation, vnlesse they fought prayse in an actiō, whereunto they had no possibilitie of power to preuaile: and so beginning to expresse a manifest dispaire of the successes of the whole enterprise, they returned to Cintra Vecchia, from whence the Venetian vessels departing with the Popes consent to returne into their owne seas, they fell distressed at Far de Messina with such a furious tempest, that five of their galleis being lost, the others were cast vpon the coast of Barbarie, from whence, being brused and broken, they fell at last with many harmes with the hauens of the Venetians. The forces that should haue come by land, were not concurrant in this action, for that the companies that were leauied in the countrey of Lunigano, stirred not, iudging it an enterprise full of perill to enter the coast of Leuant, for the preparations which the French had made: And such as were ready at Bagno making excuse by the Florentins that would not suffer them to passe, marched no further: but entring into the mountaine of Modena which yet obeyed the Duke of Ferrara, they assailed the towne of Fauana, which though they found difficult to obtaine at the beginning, yet they compelled it in the end to come to rendering (the mountaine men bearing no mindes to expresse further faith to their Duke, in whom they saw so small apparence or hope of succours.)

Thus till this day did nothing succcede to the Pope of all that he had attempted against the French king: for, neither was there any mutation at Genes as he did assuredly promise himself, neither did the Venetians after they had in vaine assayed to take Verona, hope for any aduancement on that side: neither did the Swissers accomplish any thing, their action being rather in demonstration and shewes then in matter and effect. And touching Ferrara, what by the ready succours which the French had sent, and the oportunitie of the winter already come on, there was no apparence of any daunger: only he had taken Modena, which was no recompence worthy of so great a mouing. But such is the nature of hope, rather to prolong then to satisfie, and guiding a minde vaine & glorious, it nourisheth him in infinite expectatiōs. And touching this Pope (disappointed of so many hopes) we may lay him in comparison with that which is written by the Poets, of Anteus, that being tamed by the forces of Hercules, as often as he was throwen to the ground, so often did appeare in him a greater strength and courage: Such weening had the Pope amid his aduersities, for when he seemed most abased and oppressed, it was then that he did most lift vp himselfe with a spirite more constant and resolute, promising better of his fortune then euer: and yet he had almost no other foundations then of himselfe, and he would openly say, that albeit he was made naked of valiant and loyall armes, hauing no other assured friends then the Venetians, yet for that his enterprises moued not of any particular interest, but of an onely franke desire to set Italie at libertie, he doubted not with the ayde of God to manage them to an issue honorable, happie, and commendable. He could not hope much of the Venetians, for that they were already drained of money, and oppressed with many difficulties and afflictions. And touching the king Catholike, he seemed rather to counsell him secretly, then to ayde him openly, vsing his ordinarie subteltie, to keepe entertained on the other side Maximilian with the French king. And albeit he made him many promises, yet he held them suspended with many conditions and impediments: And for the trauell he had vsed to separate Cesar from the French king, and to make him agreed with the Venetians, it seemed euery day no lesse doubtfull then vnprofitable: for that Cesar, at such time as the Pope had sent out an armie against the Duke of Ferrara, had sent an Herald to charge him not to molest him: & Constantin de Macedonie, being gone in the Popes name to sollicite an accord betweene him & the Venetians, he did not only refuse to heare him, but also giuing to know that he would more firmly knit with the French king, he determined to send into France the Bishop of Gurci to negotiate with him of all their affaires. Also the Electours of the Empire, notwithstanding they bare great inclination to the name of the Pope, and to the deuotion of the sea Apostolike, would not heare speake of the expences: in so much as being addicted only to the affaires of Germany, they were not to do him any great seruice in those actiōs. And lastly, it seemed he could not hope much more of the king of England, notwithstanding he was young and desirous of inuasiōs, and had made profession to affect the greatnesse of the Church, and heard his Embassadors not without some inclination of minde: for that being so farre remoued from Italie as well by land as sea, he was not able of himselfe to embase the French king, hauing withall ratified the peace with him, and by a solemne Embassage sent to that end, receiued the full confirmation. Surely there is no man building vpon so weake foundations, and encountering so many great impediments and aduersities, who would not haue abated and restrained his courage, seeing withall he had meane to obtaine peace with the French king with such conditions as a conquerour could not not in reason desire greater: for the king consented to abandon the protection of the Duke of Ferrara, though not directly (in regard of his honour) yet indirectly to satisfy the Pope, referring it to the arbitration of the law, but vnder the authoritie of such iudges as would haue pronounced according to the Popes will. And albeit he was certaine that he might obtaine this forme of peace to his quiet and honour, yet he added that ouer and besides these, he would haue the king to leaue Genes in full libertie, proceeding in these actions with such an implacable obstinacie, that not one of his dearest familiars durst once aduise him to the contrarie: yea the Embassadour of Florence offering to sound him according to the kings commaundement, purchased by his labour more displeasure then profite: his resolution that way could suffer no counsell to the contrarie, for a messenger whom the Duke of Sauoy had sent to him about other affaires, offering that his Prince (if it so liked him) would interpose in the working of the peace, he cryed out that he was sent to espie, and not to negotiate, committing the messenger to prison, and to be examined with torments: his singular courage carying him euery day into higher weenings, made him also consumed in the difficulties that appeared, that not respecting the impediments nor daungers, & determining to lay aside all his other thoughts sauing such as tended to the taking of Ferrara, he resolved to go in person to Bologna, both to hasten things by his presence, to giue more authoritie to his affaires, and to increase the courage of his Captaines, whose valour seemed farre inferiour to his furie: he assured himself that to take Ferrara his owne forces sufficed ioyned with the Venetians, who laboured to sedde him in that perswasion, for feare least in the end losing all hope of good successe, he came to accord with the French king.

On the other side, the French king, being now made certaine by so many experiences of the affection and intencion of the Pope, and seeing how necessarie it was to prouide against other daungers that might happen to his estates, determined to defend the Duke of Ferrara, and keeping established the amitie he had with the king of Romaines, he resolved to persecute (by his consent) the Pope with armes spirituall, and in the meane while to entertaine and support things vntill the spring, when he would passe into Italie with a puissant armie both by sea and land, to make warre either vpon the Venetians, or against the Pope, as the estate of affaires should require. He perswaded the king of Romaines that he would enter into action against the Venetians, not onely as he was wont to do, but also to ayde him (knowing well his auncient desire) to occupie Rome together with the whole estate of the Church as appertaineth of right to the Emperie: and likewise to dispose all Italie except the states of Millan, Genes, Florence, and Ferrara. By these allurements he ranged him easily to his opinion, but specially that by their authoritie, ioyning with them the consent of the nations of Fraunce and Almain, they might call a generall Councell, wherein they hoped would be concurrant the Spanish regions and the king of Aragon, not daring to do any thing against their will. To these was added another most great foundation, that many Cardinals of Italie and beyond the Mounts, hauing minds ambitious and stirring, promised to make open profession to be the authours of the Councell. The king for the better direction of these things, expected with no small desire the comming of the Bishop of Gurci, whom Cesar had determined to send to him. And in the meane while, to lay a beginning to the institution of the Councell, and to remoue presently from the Pope the obedience of his kingdome, he made summons to all the Prelates of Fraunce to assemble at Orleans in the middest of September. Such were the resolutions and preparations of the French king, not altogether approued by the wise men of his Councell and his Court, who seeing how vnprofitable it would be to giue leasure to the enemy, perswaded him not to deferre the mouing of armes to a new time, whose counsell if it had bene followed, the Pope had bene easily brought to such necessitie, and his affaires so confused, that he had not bene able with that fortune and facilitie to stirre vp against him so many Princes as he did after. But such was the destinie of those affaires, that the counsell of wisemen were of lesse credit with the king then his owne opinion, who seemed to stand confirmed either through couetousnesse which ouerruled him, or by feare that other Princes would be iealous of his greatnesse if he onely made warre against the Pope: or perhaps he abhorred such an action as contrary to the surname of Right Christian, & vnworthy of that profession to defend the Church, wherewith his predecessours had bene honoured of long time.

*The Pope made his entry into Bologna vpon the end of September, with resolution to invade Ferrara as well by water as by land, vsing onely his owne forces & the supplies of the Venetians.

tians: who at his request sent out two fleets armed against Ferrara and they entring to the river of Paw, the one by Fornaci, & the other by the port of Primaro, began to do many damages to the people of Ferrara, as did also at the same instant the Popes companies, who overranne & pillaged the whole countrey, but not coming neare to Ferrara, in which citie was strength of two hundred & fiftie French Launces, besides the Dukes garrisons: for albeit the campe, &c. he was payed for eight hundred men at armes, six hundred light horsemen, and six thousand footemen, yet, besides that they were bodies vntained and taken vp at randon, the numbers were faire lesse, (the Popes hauing by custome to be very ill serued in warres:) Besides Monsieur Chaumont hauing sent, after the losse of Modena, to Regge and Rubiero two hundred and fiftie Launces, and two thousand footemen: Marke Anth. Collonno and Iohn Vitelli were departed from the armie by the Popes commaundement with two hundred men at armes and three hundred footemen, to go to Modena. For these reasons the Pope made instance that of the Venetian armie, which now that the forces of Cesar were so diminished at Verona & euery where, had without great difficultie recovered almost all Friul, he might passe one part of it vpon the countrey of Ferrara, where they had newly recovered Polesina de Ronigno, left abandoned by the necessitie of the affaires which the Duke had about Ferrara. The Pope also expected three hundred Launces Spaniards, who the king of Aragon should send to him vnder the leading of Fabricio Colono whensoever he would demand the, according to the bond & contract of the inuestiture. As soone as they should arrive in his armie, he made his purpose to set vpon Ferrara on his side, & the Venetians to do the like on their part. He perswaded himselfe that as soone as the people of Ferrara saw the armie approach the wals, they would take armes against the Duke, notwithstanding his Captaines told him that the garrison within was both able to defend the Citie, and keepe the people contained, what disposition soeuer they had to run into tumult. Neuerthelesse his desire raging about all reason or counsell, he forbore not to leaue with an incredible care in many places, many bands of footmen: but the Venetians were more slow in coming forward then either the Pope expected, or stood agreeable with the plots he had layd, for that hauing brought by water vpon the marches of Mantua many barkes to make a bridge, the Duke of Ferrara charging them vpon the sudden with certaine French bands, did not onely take them from them and defeate their passage, but also within certaine Creekes of Polesina tooke many barkes and others vessels, together with the treasurer of the Venetian armie. About this time vpon the disclosing of an intelligence which the Venetians practised within Brescia to make it rebell against the French king, the Count Iohn Maria de Martignano was committed to iustice, & payed the price of the practise with the losse of his head. But far more slow in marching were the companies of the Spaniards, who being arrived vpon the frontiers of the kingdome of Naples, refused, according to the direction of their king, to passe the river of Tronto, vnlesse he would first deliuer to his Embassadour the Bull of inuestiture which had bin promised: The Pope on the other side would not present the Bull, but at such time as the bands of souldiers were come to Bologna, doubting least after he had dispossessed himselfe of it, the companies that were promised would not be sent at all: and yet, neither for any declaration that his Captaines could make to him, neither for the present difficulties, did his hope diminish that he was able to carrie Ferrara with his owne strength onely: but as one whose priuate desire was stronger then all the reasonable perswasions that could be made, he looked into all the expeditions of warre with a wonderfull trauell and affection, notwithstanding that at the same time he fell into a great maladie, which (gouerning his bodie contrarie to the counsell of Physicians) he despised no lesse then the other difficulties, promising no lesse to overcome that, then he assured himselfe of the victorie of the warre, hauing this firme perswasion, that it was the consent and will of God that Italie should be restored to libertie by his meane: Such was the greatnesse of his minde, and so much respected his authoritie, that it was dangerous to giue him counsell against his will and liking, and that which in other men might be called furie and rashnesse, was vnder the tetrour of his authoritie holden for temperance and wise proceeding. He brought to passe likewise, that the Marquis of Mantua, whom he had called to Bologna & honoured him with the title of Gonsalomier of the Church, should take pay of the Venetians vnder the name of their Captaine general (the Pope participating for an hundred men at armes, and xij. hundred footemen. This matter was kept secret vpon the request of the Marquis, for this reason, that it was necessarie that he provided first for the stay & order of his own countrey, to the end to withstand the harmes of the French.

Frenchmen. But in trueth this was his meaning, that taking this charge vpon him, not of good will, but by necessitie of the promises he had made, he sought to deferre the execution, the better to deliuer himselfe of it by some occasion or helpe of the time.

The great desire which the Pope had to offend others, was turned into a necessitie to giue defence to his owne things: and this desire had bene yet both more readie and more greater, if new accidents had not contrained Chaumont to deferre his purposes: for after the Venetian armie was broken vp from before Verona, Chaumont being comen as farre as Pesquero to march to the reskew of that citie, determined to returne speedily, and imploy his armie in the recouerie of Modena: in which quarter, his bands that were at Rubiero had taken by assault the towne of Formingo: if he had gone forward in this action; it was thought he might haue easily obtained it, both for that the garrison was slender, the towne not fortified, and the inhabitants nothing brooking the iurisdiction of the Church. But it hapned as he thought to go his way, that the Almaine footemen that were within Verona began to draw into tumult; for that they were ill paid of Cesar, by reason whereof, least that Citie should remaine abandoned, Chaumont was constrained to abide there till he had reassured them, distributing nine thousand duckets for their present pay, and promising the residue the moneth following. In warre one misfortune draweth on another, for he had no sooner giuen order to these disorders, then there hapned an other accident, for that the Venetian bands being retired towards Padoa, and Grotto the gouernor of Leguagno thinking now that the occasion offred to sacke the towne of Montagnana, he caused to march thither all his men at armes and foure hundred footemen: against whome, whilest they of the towne (who could not be without feare of a sacking) made defence, many troupes of the Venetian light horfmen, finding them in disorder, brake them easily to their great harmes, for that the meane to flie was taken from them by the enimie that had battered & beaten down a bridge. By this aduerture Leguagno being almost made naked of men, it is without doubt that if the Venetian bands had put diligence to their fortune, they had made it a glorie of their valour, and a reward of their victorie. But as in all worldly things, so chiefly in actions of warre, fortune continueth not all one: this oportunitie passed away forthwith, for that Chaumont being aduertised of all that was hapned, dispatched thither in great diligence other bands, preserving that by his pollicie, which the enimie had missed to take by their vertue. But by these impediments he lost the occasion to recouer Modena, into the which in this respite of time, were entered many footebands, and many fortifications had bene made with great deuise and studie: and yet for his comming to Rubiero, the Pope was compelled to adresse to Modena that armie that was appointed to go against the Duke of Ferrara: there all his forces being assembled vnder the Duke of Vrbino Captaine generall, and the Cardinall of Pavia his Legate, and vnder Iohn Paule Bailion, M. Anth. Colonne, and Iohn Vitelli, all Captaines of name and authoritie, he made request to giue battell to the enimies: a matter which all his captaines did impugne, as knowing that the forces of the French were without all comparison both greater in numbers, & more approued in yalour: both for that the footemen of the Church had bene leuied in hast, and in the armie was no such obedience and discipline as appertained: and betweene the Duke of Vrbino & the Cardinall of Pavia a manifest emulation and discord, the same extending so farre, that the Duke accusing him of infidelitie to the Pope, led him prisoner to Bologna, either of his proper authoritie, or by the Popes commaundement. But the Pope estiones holding him purged from all crimes and imputation of crimes, held him in better degree of fauour and authoritie then before. Whilest the two armies lay one right against the other, Chaumont lying with his horfmen at Rubiero, and his footemen at Marsaglio, and on the other side, the Ecclesiastikes keeping at Modena in the suburbs of Rubiero, many skirmishes and enterchange of feates martiall passing betweene them. The Duke of Ferrara, who a litle before had recovered without resistance Palisena de Ronigno, ioyning to him the Lord Chastillon and the French launces, recovered without impediment Finale, and from thence entring into the towne of Cenio (which the Pope had taken before) by the Castell that held for him, he sacked it and burned it, preparing himselfe to go ioyne with Chaumont. The Church armies fearing much by these behauiours, retired within Modena, bestowing one part of their footemen in the suburbe that is toward the mountaine. But such is the variation of warre, not caried alwaies with one fortune: the Duke was no sooner remoued then he was constrained estiones to abide for the defence of his owne, for that the
